Now, as I have listened to every speech on the Democratic side of the House, I hear but one note—independence of the Philippines. All of them except the speech of the distinguished chairman of the committee [Mr. JONES] have been arguments in favor of the independence of the Philippines. My good friend the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BAKER] last night delivered a fine speech, and the burden of his song was that we were not giving liberty to these people, and that that was the one sole yearning of any people. He denounced our position as a great wrong. Not only was that stated by him, but it has been stated in substance by every man who has spoken on the Democratic side of the House except the chairman of the committee [Mr. JONES], and his remarks were specifically confined to the details of the bill and the history of it. The speeches on the Republican side have been in opposition to the declaration of independence for these people at this time. I think if we would take the word of the one spokesman of the Philippines upon the floor, the Resident Commissioner [Mr. QUEZON], we could not be mistaken as to what he thinks is the purpose of this legislation. I am going to differ from my good friend from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] when he says that the Resident Commissioner could not have said anything different from what he said, and that he would have lost his high respect for him if he had said anything different. My friends, I think that is a mistake. Do you mean to say that if there were a representative from Canada on the floor of the British Parliament, duty would compel him to demand independence for Canada when it would be better for them to retain the Government they now have, or that a representative from the United States of Australia, had he a seat in the Parliament of Great Britain, must make his fight for Australian independence when probably they would not want it? I say it is the duty of the man who represents the Philippine Islands on this floor to speak what is his judgment, to speak it openly here, just the same as he would speak it with me in private conversation. I do not think that because a man is afraid to speak his own convictions that is a justification for his simply refusing to speak, or, on the other hand, to speak against what his judgment dictates as unwise.

Members are confusing independence and liberty.

It has been asserted that the goal of the Philippines is liberty through independence. You fail to discriminate between liberty and independence. I want to say to the membership of this House that you must not confuse those two terms. The people may have liberty, but not independence; they may have independence, but not liberty. Canada has liberty, but Canada has not independence. Australia has liberty, but Australia has not independence. New Zealand has liberty, but New Zealand has not independence. When I was interrupted the other day with a question about the literacy or illiteracy of the Philippine Islands, after having quoted from the information given to the House by the man who knew about the situation, Mr. MILLER, and the reply was made that those islands had a higher literacy than any country south of the United States; instantly there flashed into my mind the Australian people, where is found the highest per cent of literacy of any country in the world save, perhaps, New Zealand. The people of Australia and New Zealand have liberty, but not independence. New Zealand has a state of literacy that challenges the admiration of the world. She has one of the largest and best universities in the world and one of the largest circulating libraries of any country on the globe in comparison with the number of people to be served. In the United States of Australia, according to a late statement, out of 1,000 people who applied for marriage licenses only 10 were unable to sign their names to the certificate. I doubt whether you could find so high a rate of literacy anywhere else in the world. And yet the United States of Australia, without independence and with the largest measure of liberty, is to-day the birthplace of many reforms. New Zealand is without independence and with the largest measure of freedom. Canada is without independence and with the largest measure of freedom. On the other hand, Mexico has her independence, but what about her liberty? It would appear from recent events that she has the liberty of the jungle. Certain South and Central American countries have their independence, but what about their liberty, when judged by recent history? The Filipino has not his independence, but has a large share of liberty. You who clamor for his independence should make sure that you are not denying him liberty. This liberty has come because they did not have independence, but because of American protection and occupation. Seven hundred and twenty-five towns are already municipal governments, built upon modern American methods, in which the people have their liberty in the election of their officers and through their administration of all their municipal affairs. The Philippine Assembly is an elective body, chosen by the people. [Applause on the Republican side.] The senate or upper house is the council chosen by the American authority, but made up of a majority of Filipinos.

The object of the American occupation is not so much independence for the sake of those who rule, but rather the liberty of those who are ruled. This liberty came to the Filipinos step by step under the direction of the American Government—a chapter in constructive work not duplicated elsewhere in all the world. This people furnished a great laboratory for the American ideal in nation building. It started with the child—the mind of the child. The first step is the school.

When the American came he found less than 1,000 schools among 8,000,000 people, scattered over an island country with more coast line than has continental United States. He found a soil so rich and abundant that conservative statements say it could support as many people as now live in continental United States. In this wonderful field for agriculture he found the most primitive methods employed, which yielded not 1 per cent of its possibilities.

He found at least 40,000 square miles of timber, valuable timber, hardwood. This rich prize must be so guarded by wise conservation laws that it shall be employed for the people's welfare and progress, and not for sharp speculators and exploiters who infest those islands as all other places where opportunity opens its door for their activities.

The American finds promising developments of resourceful mines. But, most important of all, he found there a people, 7,000,000 or more, awaiting the application of modern methods of the western world. These people lived in cities, villages, and in countries. Some were civilized, some semicivilized, and some wholly uncivilized.

The census of 1903 shows that out of the total population over 10 years of age 20 per cent could read and write, while the males of voting age who could read and write was less than 33⅓ per cent. These figures refer to the Christian tribes. There were 1,677,525, or 24 per cent, of Christian population who were 21 or over. Of these 1,137,776, or 68 per cent, were illiterate.

Between 1900 and 1903 there were organized 2,075 schools, mostly primary education.

Besides these schools, which teach the rudiments of education, there are now a great many secondary schools of modern character.

Vocational education is in operation in many parts where school gardening is carried on quite extensively to persuade the inauguration of intensive farming, which opens a wonderful field for that people.

The schools of arts and trades mark another very important movement. Manual training is a wonderfully apt field for these people. There is at least one good institution of this sort in each of the election districts.

The marvelous transition worked by the inauguration of the American system of education approaches metamorphosis. It will require not many generations to completely transform that people in ideals as well as ideas. It will rapidly become a modern country if left undisturbed by the busybody, whose hopes and aspirations can not rise to the plane of a people comfortable and happy in the joy of the full fruition of its own powers realized through education.

This possible goal, within easy reach of the generality of this people, will not be facilitated by the constant holding out of a promise of something they do not want, and at this time could not use if they had it. Such a policy can have but one effect—a spirit of dissatisfaction, of unrest, stimulated by the agitator, whose chief concern is how to increase his own prestige, with little regard, if any, for his people.

Atheletic sports, first inaugurated by our soldiers, finally took hold of the schools of the vicinities. Now, instead of the medieval sports so common in Spanish countries, the modern sports make possible a community interest, by one team playing a visiting team in the presence of a happy crowd. The game is played under rigid rules, where the one slogan is "Play the game, stand by the rules." There is no finer moral discipline in the Philippines, as well as in America, than a well-regulated game, where the law is "Don't foul, don't fumble, but hit the line hard."

One of the most important achievements on the islands is the advance in sanitation. By expert application and the establishment of hospitals, schools for nursing, and better health regulations, better care for the water supply, better disposal of waste, and so forth, by these various applications cholera has been driven out, as yellow fever was from Habana and Panama. Smallpox, that was quite common, has no further terror, since the people are becoming immune by vaccination. The bubonic plague has been driven out. The pneumonic plague and other dangerous maladies have been successfully combated by modern medicine.

The Filipino is said to be a natural nurse when trained. This field opens to both boy and girl. In a material way the occupation by the Americans has made various towns beautiful, clean, and healthy. The coasts have been charted and nearly 100 lighthouses erected. Wharfs have been built, harbors have been improved, and shipping facilities added.

The 120 miles of railroad, much of it in bad state of repair in 1898, has been increased to over 600 miles. The old roads, many of which were mere trails, have been displaced by a thousand miles or more of splendid roads, which will permit rapid travel throughout the country. In this way most of the country is being placed in easy communication. Under this régime the head-hunters must be soon a mere memory.

There still exists some peonage, which, according to Dean Worcester, is rapidly passing by rigid enforcement of laws against it.

These are some of the things which have taken place since 1898. These advances were made to secure Filipino liberty. Whatever might be said of independence, it is impossible to say what would have been the result had not this great Republic entered upon that unselfish work. There is nothing like it in the history of mankind. The administration has been passing over to the Filipino authority in matters of interest just as fast as safety for him will permit. This has been done before his very eyes. It has been without promise of this or that. This bill is but another handle to stir up the busybody, who in turn tries to dissatisfy the native with his protector. It is unwise, unnecessary, and ill-advised. The preamble should go out of the bill altogether.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 27 minutes.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, the record that has been made by the Republican Party in the administration of the Philippine Islands is one of the proudest chapters in its history. I say that as much for the reason that it has not been treated by the Republican Party as a partisan question as for any other reason. I am proud of the fact that the Republican Party, in the inception of the responsibility that was thrust upon it, took up that responsibility with a full sense that it ought not to be considered as a partisan question. In the last declaration made by the Republican Party it was declared that their treatment of this question had always been and should be nonpartisan.

I want to present to this House now a few sentences from the Republican platform of 1900. It declares:

> In accepting, by the treaty of Paris, the just responsibility of our victories in the Spanish War, the President and the Senate won the undoubted approval of the American people. No other course was possible than to destroy Spain's sovereignty throughout the West Indies and in the Philippine Islands. That course created our responsibility before the world and with the unorganized population whom our intervention had freed from Spain to provide for the maintenance of law and order and for the establishment of good government and for the performance of international obligations.

This was the declaration of the Republican Party at the very inception of our government of the Philippine Islands in the year 1900. It was a declaration, as I say, about which we all ought to be proud, and in the spirit of this tremendous responsibility that had come to us throughout all the administration of the Republican Party we have treated it in this broad, magnanimous manner.

There could have been no more splendid initial declaration of principles under which the Philippine Islands were to be governed than was issued by President McKinley in 1900, when he appointed the Philippine Commission, to which was given the powers of government at the commencement of civil government in the American occupation. It has been declared by one of England's greatest statesmen as one of the broadest and most statesmanlike utterances that has ever been made regarding such questions.

President McKinley then said:

> In all forms of government and administrative provisions which they are authorized to prescribe, the commission shall bear in mind that the government which they are establishing is not designed for our satisfaction or for the expression of our theoretical views, but for the happiness, peace, and prosperity of the people of the Philippine Islands, and the measures adopted should be made to conform to their customs, their habits, and even their prejudices to the fullest extent consistent with the accomplishment of the indispensable requisites and privileges of an effective government.

Throughout the government under Republican administrations there was no politics. More Democrats were appointed as governors of the Philippine Islands than Republicans. Everywhere Democrats were appointed in all parts of the administration of the islands indiscriminately. You might go anywhere in the islands and find that the official had been appointed by a Republican administration, although he was a Democrat. It was only sought to secure the best men for the places in the islands, no matter what their politics might be.

We have complained, and we think justly so, of the policy of the Democratic Party with regard to the Philippine Islands. From the commencement it has been governed by partisan considerations. This is strikingly shown by the action of the present Secretary of State. He came here to Washington when the treaty of Paris was pending for ratification before the Senate and when one or two votes would determine whether or not the necessary two-thirds could be secured. Mr. Bryan came here and labored with Senators to secure an indorsement of the treaty of Paris. If that treaty had not been secured—there was no objection particularly urged to it except the fact that we took over the Philippine Islands—if that treaty had not been ratified—and it lay within the power of Mr. Bryan to determine whether it should or not, because it could not have been ratified by the Republicans, who could not control the required two-thirds majority—there would have been no acquisition of the Philippine Islands. And strange and inconsistent as it may appear, soon after that, when Mr. Bryan was nominated for President of the United States, he was nominated on a platform which he dictated and which, in effect, declared for immediate independence of the Philippine Islands, and made his campaign principally on that issue. He declared then over and over again on the stump that they were ready for self-government, and declared over and over again that there was no danger, and that we ought to give them immediate independence. He declared over and over again that we had no right to retain control of the islands, and made the so-called issue of "anti-imperialism" the dominant issue of that campaign.

What the American people thought about it is determined by the result of that election. They declared against the scuttle policy. They declared that it was not possible to turn the islands adrift. They declared that the obligations which we had involuntarily assumed must be met by a manly and honest assumption of our duties.

The idea of neutralizing the islands first appeared as an authorized expression of the policy of the Democratic Party in 1904. Since then it has been a favorite method of disposing of the Philippines by the Democrats. It seems easy to declare that we may enter into an international agreement with other nations by which the neutralization of the Philippine Islands could be guaranteed, as the neutralization of Switzerland and Belgium was guaranteed, but now we hear little of the neutralization of the Philippine Islands. While it might be possible to secure a recognition by other nations of the neutrality of the Philippines, to induce them to join with the United States in guaranteeing their neutrality would be impracticable. It is stated as a fact that already this administration has sounded other nations as to whether or not such an agreement could have been secured, but other nations are not inclined to take upon themselves such responsibilities unless we can offer them special privileges or concessions in the Philippines, and this, of course, we can not do. We have that responsibility, and we must carry it through until we either rid ourselves of it by a voluntary abdication of our power in the Philippine Islands or until they shall be wrested from us by a superior power.

The Democratic platform utterances of 1908 and 1912 declared, in effect, that the United States shall first establish a stable government in the Philippine Islands and then shall guarantee to them their independence. There is in this provision and in this position no ridding of the United States of her responsibilities. If we are now responsible for conditions in the Philippine Islands, we will be responsible for them ever and always, if we guarantee to them their independence. Such a proposition, in my judgment, is utterly indefensible and untenable. Under those conditions the United States would have all the present responsibilities of its position and it would have none of the advantages that may be ours by reason of the islands being part of the territory of the United States.

The position of the Democratic Party has materially changed from the proposition of 1900 in which immediate independence was the issue until the present time when this present bill is up for consideration. A change in sentiment for some reason has occurred during that period. This bill does not declare for immediate independence. It declares only that it is and has been always, as the preamble reads, the purpose of the United States to grant the Filipino people independence whenever a stable government shall be established in the islands. A stable government is established in the islands to-day. There is now a stable government established, and there has been for years. They have secured that already. What further element of a stable government is required? Does it mean a stable government of an independent character? A stable government under which the Government shall demonstrate its capacity to run itself as an independent Commonwealth among the nations of the world? There is no opportunity for that. It would be very much better, more consistent with the ideas of the Democratic Party, if they should say to the Filipino people, as they said in 1900, "We will give you your independence immediately and guarantee that you shall not be interfered with." That would be very much more consistent than their present position. There is no opportunity to demonstrate whether or not government can be secured that is any more stable than the government they have now. The Filipino people think that they are now capable of maintaining not only a stable government but an independent stable government. They believe that they are now capable of maintaining and keeping their independence. No party in the United States agrees with them in that position.

We are under obligations to President Wilson for his influence upon the Democratic Party in many regards. Thanks to him, there has been a higher standard in all departments of this Government than has ever been put into practice in any previous Democratic administration. Thanks to him no such dangerous idea as immediate independence is pressed as a policy of his administration.

It is doubtless due to the influence of President Wilson that no such dangerous experiment should be tried as was advocated by the Democratic Party in their platforms; at least, he understands the situation if his followers do not.

In his lecture which was delivered at Columbia University in 1907, speaking particularly of the Philippine Islands and applying his language directly to them, he said:

> Self-government is not a mere form of institutions, to be had when desired, if only proper pains be taken. It follows upon the long discipline which gives a people self-possession, self mastery, the habit of order and peace and common counsel, and a reverence for law which will not fail when they themselves become the makers of law; the steadiness and self-control of political maturity; and these things can not be had without long discipline.

Again he says:

> Self-government is not a thing that can be "given" to any people, because it is a form of character and not a form of constitution. No people can be "given" the self-control of maturity. Only a long apprenticeship of obedience can secure them the precious possession, a thing no more to be bought than given. They can not be presented with the character of a community, but it may confidently be hoped that they will become a community under the wholesome and salutary influences of just laws and a sympathetic administration; that they will after a while understand and master themselves, if in the meantime they are understood and served in good conscience by those set over them in authority.

That is the mature judgment of a careful statesman upon this particular question. If that rule shall be applied, then the Philippine Islands will remain for many years under the control and direction of the United States. I know it is very apt to be the case that those of us who think that we ought to be relieved of these responsibilities shall take the easy course, in the belief that perhaps they could get along if they were to set up an independent government of their own; but if we are careful, and if we are just with ourselves, we certainly will not be deceived concerning the matter.

I want to call attention now to a statement of the conditions that existed in the Philippine Islands at the time of the American occupation. This statement was made by Dr. Heiser, who went there to take charge of the sanitation and medical supervision of the islands. He went there as a scientist and speaks as a scientist, and I am quoting this from an address delivered by Secretary Redfield, who says of him that he is personally acquainted with Dr. Heiser, that he has met him, and knows him to be a truthful man, and that he describes things as he found them in the islands. Dr. Heiser said:

> Forty thousand persons were dying annually from smallpox, while the number of deaths from beriberi in jails and other public institutions was frightful. With the exception of the water system in the city of Manila, there was not a reservoir, pipe line, or artesian well for the 7,200,000 people of the entire archipelago, and even the water for the city of Manila was known to be grossly polluted. The dead were buried in a most haphazard manner, it being a not infrequent experience to find as many as four or five interred in a grave. The bones of those who had died but a few months before were often ruthlessly cast out to bleach in the sun in order to make room for a more recent death. The city of Manila, which had a population of over 200,000, had no sewer system, and foul human discharges found their way directly into the esteros or canal, of which there are some 23 miles. The water in these was frequently stirred up by the lighters and other craft which are used so extensively in Manila for transportating cargo, with the result that nauseous gases were constantly being liberated.
> There was no food law, and the vilest class of food products was shipped into the country without let or hindrance. Amebic and other forms of dysentery soon affected the troops and others who had come to the Philippines to aid in governmental work. Subsequent experience has shown that these same diseases were responsible literally for thousands of deaths annually among the Filipinos. There was no hospital in the entire islands which had modern surgical equipment, and persons died on every hand of disease which could have been easily relieved. It was not uncommon to find many persons horribly deformed by the scars which resulted from injuries or ulcers that could have been easily cured if skilled attention and facilities had been available at the time when they had their beginning. The prisons throughout the islands were indescribably filthy and neglected.
> The maritime quarantine was conducted upon a basis of graft rather than upon merit, with the inevitable result that an outbreak of plague, cholera, or smallpox in the near-by foreign countries meant the early introduction of the disease into the Philippines. There was no proper inspection of animals before slaughter, and suitable slaughterhouses where this work could have been done were conspicuous by their absence. More than 5,000 lepers were at large throughout the Philippine Islands. A few hundred were taken care of as objects of charity, but there was no attempt to segregate lepers.
> Malaria prevailed in hundreds of towns in the Philippines, without quinine being available to combat it. It was no infrequent experience to find imitation quinine pills being sold at fabulous prices in the stricken districts, and the poor populace had no one to whom to apply with the hope of receiving any relief from this most intolerable condition. Sections of Manila, having a population of 5,000 to 25,000, were built up with houses so closely crowded together that there was no room for streets or alleys, and egress from these sections had, in many instances, to be made by the residents crawling under one another's houses. Manila is located on a tidal flat, and formerly, at high tide, about half of the city was inundated. As this flat land consisted of soft, oozy mud, the conditions can be better imagined than described.
> There was no governmental provision for the insane, and it was no uncommon sight to see these unfortunates tied to a stake, under a house or in a yard, with a dog chain, and it often happened that during fires, which are so frequent in towns built of nipa, these unfortunates were burned because no one thought to release them. Foods and perishable provisions were sold under most filthy conditions, the common practice being to sell them from the ground, so that the dust and dirt of everyone who came to see was soon intimately mixed with the food that was on sale. It was a frequent occurrence to find small rooms, often no larger than 8 by 10 by 8 feet in which from six to eight persons were sleeping. Tuberculosis was responsible each year for perhaps another 50,000 deaths throughout the archipelago. No effort whatsoever was made to teach the people how to deal with this scourge.

And he goes on and tells about the home life of the people and the results of their manners and customs, upon the life and conditions in the islands of the people themselves. He tells what their home life was——

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. GOULDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman what is the date of that report from which he is reading and the date of the visit which the doctor made?

Mr. TOWNER. The doctor went there at the commencement of the American rule.

Mr. GOULDEN. What is the date of the report from which the gentleman read?

Mr. TOWNER. I do not know, but this is made subsequent to the occupation, of course, and is the result of his own investigation and experience.

Mr. GOULDEN. I wanted that for information, as it sounded like something quite recent.

Mr. TOWNER. Fifty per cent of all infants died in infancy. Fifty per cent of all children who were born in the islands under the old régime died before they reached even the age of 10 years. It would be impossible to describe, and I can not take the time to describe, and it would not be pleasant to describe, the conditions that existed in the Philippine Islands at that time. Much has been said about the illiteracy that existed at that time. No one knows what was the illiteracy of the islands. We know, however, that it was very large. There was a census taken in 1902, some time after the American occupation and before it could be very much influenced by American rule, and there were some 6,000 men in the islands who could read and write, but it must be remembered that this did not mean that they could read and write in any one language. There are many languages and dialects spoken in the Philippines. In fact, 74 different dialects were spoken at that time in the islands. Few of those speaking one could understand any other. It was impossible even for those of the same general race to understand those of a different tribe in the same race. There are three different races of people in the Philippine Islands—the Negrito race, which had 21 branches or tribes; the Indonesian race, which had 16 branches or tribes; and the Malay, which had 47 branches or tribes; making 87 different branches and tribes in the islands. Intercourse between them was impossible. Such tribes and peoples of that character could make little progress, unless it was done under such a system as the United States provided. It was unwillingly accepted a great part of the time, unwillingly accepted by a vast majority of the people then, unwillingly accepted by a large majority of the people to-day.

If the American occupation should cease to-morrow in the Philippine Islands, the system of education which we have planted there, as an American system, would cease. Why do I say that? Because already there has been a rising tide of objection among the Filipinos, in anticipation of their independence, against the American school system. We have sought to establish the importance and benefit that would come to them if they had a uniform language, and at their own request have made that language the English language. We have so far succeeded that to-day more people speak English than any other language. But already there is complaint of this program. The Vizcayans, who constitute 40 per cent of the population, think the language should be Vizcayan. The Tagalogs think their language should be the national language. If the Americans should withdraw to-day, the teaching of English in the schools would cease and the tribal tongues would again be substituted. With this would come the old tribal jealousies and animosities, and the great progress toward homogeneity and unity would be lost.

In an address delivered in this House by the present Philippine Commissioner, Hon. MANUEL L. QUEZON, he pays a very high tribute to the national hero of the Philippines, Dr. Jose Rizal. Of that fine character he says:

> The recognition of a national hero in any country is evidence of the national consciousness of the people thereof. The Filipinos have their national hero—Dr. Jose Rizal, who was shot to death by order of the Spanish Government on the 30th of December, 1896. The crime of Dr. Rizal was the crime of George Washington—he loved his people and sought their freedom. He paid for his patriotism with his life, and he died gladly. On the eve of his martyrdom he wrote one of the noblest poems that ever came from a patriot pen. In every town in the Philippine Archipelago the 30th of December is consecrated to Dr. Rizal; he is venerated by every Filipino, and his picture hangs prominently in every home, from the costliest to the humblest. Each and every man in every one of the so-called tribes of the Philippines regards Dr. Rizal as Americans regard George Washington.

In his greatest work, Noli Me Tangere, written but a short time before his death, in 1896, Dr. Rizal says:

> One may accompany the course of progress in three ways—ahead of her, side by side with her, and behind her. * * * We in the Philippines are traveling along at least three centuries behind the car of progress; we are barely commencing to change from the Middle Ages. * * * The strife is on between the past, which cleaves and clings with curses to the waning feudal castle, and the future, whose song of triumph may be faintly heard off in the distant but splendrous glories of a dawn that is coming, bringing the message of good news from other countries.

It would be unreasonable to ask or to expect that a people "barely commencing to emerge from the middle ages" a quarter of a century ago should be able to take and maintain an independent place among the nations of the world.

While that is true, if we take note of the marvelous progress made by the Philippine people during the American occupation we would not be justified in fixing any possible limitations on their capacity for progress. It is entirely within the truth to say that no other people under similar conditions have ever equaled their development in civilization in the same number of years.

I have already quoted from Dr. Heizer as to the conditions existing in the islands at the commencement of the American occupation. Let me now quote from another especially qualified witness as to what has been accomplished since that time. Mr. Daniel R. Williams went to the Philippines as secretary to the commission in 1900. In 1913 he again visited the islands, and in a work recently published he tells of what has been accomplished in the interval between his first and last visit. His summary is as follows:

> Courts with a simplified procedure have been established where justice is neither bought nor sold and where rich and poor fare alike.
> Brigandage and lawlessness have been suppressed and life and property are protected and respected as never before in the history of the archipelago.
> The wild tribes of the islands who took heads and slaughtered each other without let or hindrance in the old days have, under the wise supervision and guidance of Hon. Dean C. Worcester and his corps of heroic assistants, entered upon ways of peace, industry, and public order. It is a work the magnitude of which is only beginning to be appreciated, even in the Philippines.
> An educational system has been perfected which offers to every Filipino child a free public-school education. Nearly 700,000 children are now enrolled, and English, with its store of literary treasure, is rapidly becoming the common language of the people. High schools and normal institutes, housed in modern buildings, are within the reach of all, and a Philippine university, with full literary and professional courses, has recently been organized. Manual-training schools, which teach not only useful trades but also the dignity of labor, are being opened in constantly increasing numbers. Hundreds of Filipino students have been sent to the States at public expense, where they have received and are receiving the best technical training of our colleges.
> Health and quarantine services have been organized whose work in forestalling epidemics, in freeing the islands from plague, smallpox, and other endemic diseases, and in teaching and enforcing sanitation and sanitary living among all classes, would alone justify our occupation. Manila has to her credit a new and complete sewerage system, an extended water service, an up-to-date general hospital, and a bureau of Government laboratories whose investigations into the cause and cure of tropical diseases have given it front rank among the scientific institutions of the world. The lepers of the islands, formerly scattered throughout the community, have been segregated and are now well cared for on the island of Culion. A determined fight, with every chance of success, is being waged against tuberculosis and infant mortality, the dread scourges of these people. The importation and smoking of opium have been prohibited, and a vice which threatened to fasten itself upon the islands is being effectively eradicated. Modern markets, where cleanliness is the watchword, have replaced the unwholesome and death-dealing plazas where food and drink were formerly sold, while artesian wells, furnishing that indispensable requisite for health in the Tropics—pure water—are now to be found in almost every municipality.
> Transportation facilities have been revolutionized. The 120 miles of railroad existing in 1898 have been increased to over 700, with 600 miles in project and under construction. Nearly 2,000 miles of macadam roads have been built, opening up the interior of the country and making it possible for the people to market their products at a profit. The island waters have been sounded, charted, and studded with lighthouses, making navigation something more than a lottery. Great port works have been completed in Manila, Cebu, Iloilo, and other places, furnishing safe anchorage and docking facilities for ocean-going vessels. Interisland shipping has been fostered and encouraged, mail routes have been extended and cheapened, and the archipelago laced with cable and telegraph lines.
> A comprehensive irrigation system, financed by the Government under an arrangement for eventual reimbursement, is being extended to various parts of the islands, with the certainty of enormously increasing the agricultural output.
> A well-patronized postal savings bank is in operation, encouraging habits of industry and thrift among a people noted for their improvidence. A Government agricultural bank is also gradually relieving the lack of capital on the part of landowners.
> Taxation has been equalized, and revenue is now collected according to the means of the individual rather than according to class, as in former times. Despite the wide scope of Government activities the per capita contribution is but two dollars and odd cents, being less than that of any civilized country in the world.
> A stable currency based on gold has replaced the mongrel and fluctuating medium which upon our coming made all business operations a gamble.
> The large friar estates, which were a center of disturbance and discontent, have been purchased by the Government, and are now being sold and leased to the occupants on easy terms.
> A registration act has been adopted (Torrens) which enables every owner of real property to secure a guaranteed title to his holdings to place of the questionable ownership heretofore applicable to most privately claimed lands.
> Forest regulations have been adopted which protect this great source of island wealth from undue waste and destruction, and yet encourage capital in its exploitation.
> A public-land act has been enacted which enables every Filipino to acquire a free homestead, and they are encouraged to do so.
> Church and state have been divorced, and the people relieved of one of their greatest grievances under Spain. Freedom of worship, of speech, and of the press have been guaranteed—privileges which many Filipinos, in their sudden release from old restraints, are inclined to abuse.
> Bilibid, the great island prison, has been transformed from a veritable death trap into an institution which would serve as a model for any country. Criminals are taught useful trades and as a reward for meritorious conduct are transferred to the self-governing and self-supporting penal colony of Iwahig, where every opportunity is given them to become useful citizens.
> Philippine imports have increased from $16,285,044 in Spanish times to $61,667,901 in 1912, and exports from $20,457,279 to $54,784,738. Free trade applies upon all States' products coming to the Philippines, and upon all island products entering the States, except sugar and tobacco, upon which a complaisant Congress placed a limitation at the behest of the Sugar and Tobacco Trusts.
> There has been a general increase in salaries and wages, and the people are better fed, better housed, and better clothed than ever before.
> Baseball and tennis are becoming the national games of the country, and the rising generation not only bids fair to abandon the cockpit as a means of recreation, but to represent a type of physical development heretofore unknown among the Malay people.

This bare statement of accomplishments constitutes a record which should be a source of pride to both the Filipino and to the American. I have little sympathy with attempts to belittle the part either has taken in that splendid accomplishment. Neither shall I attempt to apportion praise. If the Filipino people had not been capable of such development it would have been impossible. It is equally true that but for the labor of as splendid a company of disinterested and noble-minded men as ever served a people, such progress would have been impossible.

Our present duty is to give them, first, all the help the present emergency demands. The European war is a hard blow to the Philippines. They will need our help in order to weather the storm. We should increase the limit fixed on their power to incur indebtedness. At present that limit is $5,000,000, and it has been already reached. It is too small for a growing people, already numbering more than 8,000,000. If they can not sell their bonds, we should guarantee them, and this we can safely do, for their resources are enormous and capable of almost limitless development. If their tariff system needs revision, let us revise it, with regard to their interests rather than our own.

I would not drive capital from the islands by threats or prospect of an immediate or early independence. I would not adopt a policy that would discourage ambitious American youth from going there and joining with the Filipinos in developing the marvelous resources of the islands. I would give the people an ever increasing measure of liberty and home rule until the Philippine Archipelago becomes a great self-governing Commonwealth such as the Australian Commonwealth or the Dominion of Canada. I would make them ready for independence, whether they shall then demand it or not, and I sincerely hope that at such time it will be determined both by them and by us that their interests and ours would be better served by union. But if a severance of relations shall come, I would have our record of service so free from selfish purpose, so clearly in their interest, that the Filipinos will be our constant allies and steadfast friends forever.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, there was an understanding between the gentleman from Iowa and myself that I would close the debate on this side in one speech. Since that time the gentleman from Kentucky has come in, and I do not want to violate that understanding, and I will not, but if there is no objection, I will yield a few minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. TOWNER. It will be a pleasure for me to agree to that.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 12 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it is with great hesitancy that I undertake to delay the committee by any remarks of mine at this time, and I should not have done so if it were not for the fact that heretofore I have spoken on this subject and my support of this bill might be taken by some, who had simply recognized the fact that I was then at difference with the gentleman from Virginia, as a change of position on my part. Certain fundamentals touching the Philippine Islands, it seems to me, can now be accepted by all men. The American people are dedicated to that conduct which shall represent the highest motives and the highest order of disinterestedness in connection with the Philippine Islands. Through no intent of ours did they come, so to speak, under our dominion. No one anticipated it in the beginning and no thoughtful man worthy of American citizenship has desired since the treaty of Paris was made to deal with these people other than with an eye single to their interests. I can not in any way accept the statement made by the distinguished leader of the minority either as reflecting the judgment of the minority party or as reflecting the judgment of the American people. No amount of theorizing as to possible commercial or actual conflict with the nations of the Orient in the far distant future will ever be sufficient to make the American people conclude that they should hold the Philippine Islands permanently as a part of America over the objection of the Filipino people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The one question that has been uppermost in the minds of Americans is, When can we in justice to the Filipinos give them self-government? That is the real issue about which men are divided to-day, some men believing that they have always had the capacity to maintain their own government if left free from foreign interference, other men doubting whether the time would come in many generations when they would be capable of such government.

For my part, I do not believe a man is wise enough to prophesy as to what will happen to the Philippines in regard to their maintenance of a government of their own. But this must happen if we are to keep faith with ourselves and with those people: We must constantly afford them opportunity to demonstrate their capacity in government, and we can never afford them such opportunities without letting them actually try government. In other words, this Government must go forward, from time to time reposing additional power, and with it additional responsibilities, upon the people of the Philippines. That is exactly what is being proposed in the present bill. I opposed the previous bill reported in a former Congress by the Committee on Insular Affairs because of the fact that it undertook to say that at a given time a certain condition of affairs would have arrived, whether it had or not. And I was not willing to legislatively commit myself to the proposal that on a given date in the future the Philippine Islands would be in such a condition that the American people should surrender entire control over that country and over those peoples. If this bill undertook to do that to-day, I would voice my protest against it and would vote against it. But the bill does not. It goes a step beyond anything we have done heretofore, in giving them control over both branches of their national assembly, subject to veto powers in the Governor General and in the President of the United States. Who is here to say that the conduct of the Philippine people in the election of members to the lower house and the conduct of those members in the lower house has not been of such a character as to warrant us in now giving them the added right and the added responsibility of control of the upper body? That is really the question that is involved here. The preamble simply puts into words what is unquestionably the desire of the American people. Men may differ as to how you shall phrase it, men may like one form of language or another——

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. In just a moment. I take it there is no considerable number of men in America but that will admit that the purpose of this Government is to give ultimate independence to those people.

Now, I yield for a question.

Mr. FESS. As a lawyer, would you put a preamble in a legislative enactment?

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, I say to you that I am more concerned in giving voice to the determination of the American people that those people may know it is our determination than I am in the precedents of whether preambles should precede resolutions or bills. [Applause on the Democratic side.] There is something in this proposition more important than simply the question of whether you can find a precedent for a preamble in connection with a bill. And I, for my part, see no objection to that.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will.

Mr. MILLER. Has the gentleman any authority for the statement that this preamble does express the sentiment and views of the American people?

Mr. SHERLEY. I have no more authority than my own opinion, and it is the same authority that the gentleman would have in stating it did not express the opinion of the American people. On the other hand, I have no authority when I vote for a particular law for saying it is the expressed will of the country that that should be the law, but the responsibility is upon me and upon you as an individual lawmaker to interpret as best we can what we believe to be the determination and the desire of the people that we represent.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. It is also true that the American people commended the gentleman's party for inserting that particular thing in the platform?

Mr. MILLER. When? In 1900?

Mr. SHERLEY. I have no desire to be diverted from the really serious questions that are involved here into a dissertation as to whether one man or another is the best judge of the purposes of the American people. I assume, for the purpose of my speech, the belief that the American people do desire to see the Filipino people take their place among the nations of the earth, and, believing that, I legislate upon that assumption.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I was interested in the statement of the gentleman that he would not be in favor of putting the time in the bill at which independence should be granted. I would like to ask the gentleman if the Filipino people would not expect this bill to be followed up by a bill almost immediately giving them independence, and if this Government does not give it to them would it not be subjected to criticism that we have not acted in good faith by those people? Would we not be open to the charge of bad faith?

Mr. SHERLEY. That may be the expectation of the Filipino people. I can not control their expectations and their desires. My responsibility stops when I have undertaken conscientiously to perform as best I may the obligation that rests upon the people of the United States toward those people, and then, having performed it, I can only hope that they will accept it in the spirit that it is given and that it will prove to be as beneficial as those who propose it hope it may be.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman courteously yield for just one more question?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will.

Mr. MILLER. If this is a correct statement of the wishes and views of the American people, what on earth is the use of putting it into a bill?

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, well, the gentleman will understand that it is frequently well to not only give expression privately but officially of the attitude of the Government. You are dealing with a people far away from us, with a memory of a very tyrannical government that was imposed up them. It is perfectly natural that there should be doubts and misgivings among them as to what is to be the real attitude of the American people. There are always those willing to stir men to a belief that the expressions of good will are really lip service and mean nothing. I grant you that simple expressions unaccompanied by deeds are of little avail in convincing any people. But we are absolutely backing our statement as to intent by action that shows to them that what we have said is really what we mean. My own judgment is necessarily faulty, but I had some little experience in the Philippines, not sufficient to warrant me in having any conceited notion as to my superior ability to solve the problem that confronts them and us, but my own judgment, for what it may be worth, is that the real test of the capacity of the Filipinos to govern themselves will come when there have come to full maturity the children that are now being taught through the medium of public instruction the fundamentals of government and of real liberty. I do not think that time is yet at hand. I do not undertake to prophesy how soon it may be. We may have the delight of seeing it earlier than we anticipate, and we may have the regretful experience of seeing it postponed until long in the future.

But the only way we can actually find out the fact is by giving from time to time the chance to those people to so manage their affairs as to indicate whether or not they have learned the science of government. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] is recognized for 27 minutes.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, in closing the general debate upon this most important measure, a measure vitally affecting the interests of 9,000,000 of human beings, I trust I may be pardoned if I say that the majority members of the Committee on Insular Affairs are to be congratulated upon the fact that no Republican who has opposed its passage has assailed or even so much as criticized a single one of its many governmental or administrative features. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Considering the limited debate that was allowed on the bill, does the gentleman expect that in general debate we would take up the individual features of the bill?

Mr. JONES. "The gentleman" most certainly expected that those minority members of the Committee on Insular Affairs who subscribed to the minority report would have informed the House as to which, if any, of the governmental features of this bill they objected. This much, at least, it seems to him, they owed to their Republican colleagues, if not to the entire membership of the House. "The gentleman" further believes that the four hours of general debate allotted the minority afforded full opportunity for those speaking in opposition to the bill to have pointed out at least one of its features which in their opinion was objectionable or in any respect subject to just criticism. I repeat, therefore, that the Committee on Insular Affairs is to be congratulated upon having presented to the House a measure which, so far as this debate has developed, is free from Republican criticism. This is my reply to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. JONES. If the gentleman does not take up too much of my time, I will.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well; considering the fact of the gentleman's discourtesy, I do not care to proceed.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I will yield for a mere question.

Mr. MILLER. It is not for a mere question, but for something in the way of a statement. I think the opportunity ought to be granted for it.

Mr. JONES. No; I will not yield for a statement.

Mr. MILLER. Well, if the gentleman wants to make an assertion like that and then give no Member on this side an opportunity to deny it, all right.

Mr. JONES. There is no man on that side who can deny it. Everybody who has followed this debate knows that no Member on that side has undertaken to criticize a single governmental feature of this bill. The gentleman himself is about the only man who has referred to one of them, and his reference was to the provision relating to an elective senate; and even he expressed his approval of that feature. So, Mr. Chairman, my statement that no one who has spoken in opposition to this bill has undertaken to criticize a single one of its administrative feature is literally true in every respect.

It is true, Mr. Chairman, that its opponents have characterized the bill as a partisan measure. The ground upon which this assertion is based is that the preamble is in accord with the declarations of the last Democratic national convention as to the future political status of the Philippine Islands. If that constitutes it a partisan measure, then I am proud of the fact that it is a partisan measure.

But, Mr. Chairman, I can not understand how gentlemen can seriously contend that because the language employed in the preamble to this bill conforms substantially to that to be found in the Baltimore platform the bill itself is to be denounced as a partisan measure, and for that reason alone to be opposed by Republicans. The Republican platform of 1908 declared it to be the purpose of the Republican Party to give to the Philippine Islands, with certain restrictions and limitations, free trade between those islands and the United States; and a Republican Congress subsequently carried this party promise into effect. Would it have been logical, yea, would it have been honest, for Democrats, believing this concession to be just and right, to have refused to support it upon the sole ground that it was the fulfillment of a Republican promise, and therefore a partisan measure?

I take it, Mr. Chairman, that every political party that deserves the respect and support of its adherents will undertake, when afforded the opportunity, to carry into effect the pledges and the promises made to secure that support; and I do not hesitate to declare that were the Democratic Party to refuse, now that it has the power to do so, to write into the preamble to this bill what it wrote into the Baltimore platform upon the subject of Philippine independence it would deserve the execrations of all honest men. If, therefore, the Republicans in this House refuse their support to a measure the legislative features of which are unobjectionable to them solely upon the ground that the preamble to that bill is in accord with the platform promises of the Democratic Party, they are free to do so.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question right there?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. In the following section it is provided that no person shall be held to answer for a criminal offense without process of law. Is that sufficient to guarantee to those people the right of trial by jury?

Mr. JONES. I do not think so. The bill of rights in this bill does not impose upon the Philippine Government the duty of providing for jury trials. The Philippine Legislature, however, is fully empowered to do so, if in its judgment it is wise to do so.

Mr. BARTLETT. It is not a constitutional requirement, so to speak?

Mr. JONES. It is not a constitutional requirement.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman another question? I have only had opportunity to examine the bill to-day.

Mr. JONES. I will yield to the gentleman, but I would be glad if he would defer his question until we begin the consideration of the administrative features of the bill.

Mr. BARTLETT. All right.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, nobody could have been more astonished, and certainly no one was more pained, than I was when on yesterday my genial and good friend from California [Mr. KAHN] charged in the speech which he then delivered that Gen. Emilio Aguinaldo and his associates actually sold out the liberties of their people to the Spanish for personal gain. This was a most serious charge against the most distinguished of Filipino patriots.

Mr. Chairman, I am aware that this grossly unjust and baseless accusation has often been made in the past by the enemies of Gen. Aguinaldo, but it has been so frequently and so completely refuted that I am astonished that any Member of this House would repeat so unsupported a charge. The gentleman not only made this charge, but he also stated that it was historically true, and when I ventured to challenge his statement, and called upon him to name a single reputable historian who had ever sanctioned it, his reply was that he could name one—Dean C. Worcester. Mr. Chairman, I have since then carefully examined Mr. Worcester's book. I have read everything that it contains upon this subject, and I can not find a line in it which justifies the statement made by the gentleman from California. Mr. Worcester himself says nothing that in the least reflects upon the conduct of Gen. Aguinaldo in connection with the transaction alluded to by the gentleman from California. He quotes at considerable length from a report made by an Army officer named Taylor, but there is not a word in that report that shows, or tends to show, that Gen. Aguinaldo ever appropriated this money to his own use, or that a dollar of it was ever used exclusively for his needs. Let me read from the report itself as quoted in the Worcester book:

From January 4 to April 4 Aguinaldo withdrew from the banks ₱5,786.46 in part interest on the money he had deposited. This was used to pay the expenses of himself and his companions in Hongkong. These expenses were kept at a minimum; the money was drawn and spent by him. If one of the men with him needed a new pair of shoes, Aguinaldo paid for them; if another wanted a new coat, Aguinaldo bought it. Minute accounts were kept, which are on file among his papers, and it is seen from them that his expenses were exceeding his income, which could only be ₱12,000 a year, while he was living at the rate of ₱22,000, with constant demands being made upon him by men who came from the Philippines. Life was not easy under these conditions.

Now let me read what is said upon this subject in other Philippine histories. I read from the work entitled "The Philippines—The War and the People," by Albert G. Robinson. This author says:

A special interest centers around the clause which relates to the money payment to be made by Spain to the participants in the insurrection. This has been made the basis of many representations, or misrepresentations, reflecting upon the honor and the sincerity of Señor Aguinaldo. He has been charged with seeking only his own ends, and with playing a shrewd game for the lining of his own pockets. He has been charged with "selling his country for Spanish gold"—

Mark that this is the identical charge made by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] on yesterday—

The total amount payable was seventeen hundred thousand dollars Mexican silver—equivalent practically to one-half that sum in gold. But only $400,000 Mexican of this was ever paid; and it is upon the receipt and alleged disposition of this amount that there rest the charges of greed and dishonesty on the part of Emilio Aguinaldo. The evidence in the case tends to show that Aguinaldo's conduct was wholly honorable and conscientious.

I now read from the work of Richard Brinsley Sheridan, an English author. He says:

Gen. Aguinaldo has been condemned by the Spaniards, the Americans, and other foreigners at Manila for having accepted these terms. He has been considered by his critics as a traitor to his people and a man without honor, who could be bought. But this opinion has only been formed by those who are ignorant of the man and of his character.

The reasons which induced him to enter into this treaty and put an end to the war which he was then waging against the Spaniards in Luzon was the promise that the concessions which he required for his people would be granted. Of the $400,000 paid, two hundred thousand were deposited in the Hongkong & Shanghai Bank on the 3d of January, 1898, upon a fixed deposit for one year, and $200,000 was paid into the Chartered Bank of India, Australia & China, at Hongkong.

Señor Buencamino, one of Gen. Aguinaldo's chief supporters, told me that such trust had they in Aguinaldo's honor and integrity that they desired the money should be deposited in Aguinaldo's own name. He also said that much as Aguinaldo required the money in his self-imposed exile, he did not draw for his own use a single cent of the deposited money.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I have already stated, my friend from California [Mr. KAHN] asserted that his statement was historically true. I have examined every history of the Philippines that I have been able to secure, and I can not find a word in any of them, including the Worcester book, that supports his charge. On the contrary, they all, with the exception of that book, which is silent upon the subject, characterize these reflections upon the character of Gen. Aguinaldo as absolutely without foundation in truth.

Mr. Chairman, the most striking incident in connection with this debate—perhaps I should say its most remarkable development—has been the extraordinary speech of the gentleman from Illinois, the Republican leader——

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit just a single word?

Mr. JONES. I will.

Mr. COOPER. I wish to say that these charges were made 12 years ago, and I investigated them as best I could at that time, and when I came to open the Philippine debate on the bill I refused to mention them in my speech at all. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. I am very glad that the gentleman, who was at that time the very able chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs, and who reported the bill which is now the organic law of the Philippines, has had the frankness to rise and make that statement. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, as I began to say, the most remarkable occurrence of this debate was the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], the Republican leader upon this floor. He seriously informed the House and the country that he had no doubt in his mind that as certain as that the sun would rise on the following morning a conflict would come between the Far East and the Far West across the Pacific Ocean. The history of the world, the gentleman declared, had taught us that the avoidance of this conflict was impossible. It is true he expressed the hope that it might only be a commercial conflict; but he added that "a fight for commercial supremacy in the end leads to a fight with arms, because," said he, "that is the final arbiter among nations." Therefore, for strategical and other reasons, the gentleman declared that he was opposed to giving the Philippine Islands independence now or at any time.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to say with all the emphasis I can command that even if I believed that the armed conflict which the distinguished leader of the Republican minority tells us is inevitable was not only unavoidable but even imminent, I could never give my consent to the permanent retention of the Philippines. On the contrary, if I believed, as the gentleman has declared that he does, that a struggle for commercial supremacy between the countries bordering on the Pacific Ocean will inevitably lead to an armed conflict between the Far East and the Far West, I would not lose a moment in seeking to so amend this bill as to give to the Philippine Islands complete and immediate independence. I would do this because I wholly dissent from the conclusions of the gentleman from Illinois and because I believe now, as I have always believed, that, so far from the Philippines being a means of strength to the United States, they are a source of positive weakness, and that their retention is a constant menace, an ever-present danger, to the peace and welfare of the American people. That they are a source of weakness rather than of strength to us is not only my belief, but it is the oft-expressed opinion of competent military authorities, and that so well-informed and ordinarily well-poised a gentleman as the distinguished leader of his party upon this floor could hold the opinions he has expressed is nothing less than astounding to me. I do not agree with the gentleman that an armed conflict between the Far East and the Far West is inevitable. But if such a conflict shall ever come the provoking cause will be that the far-away Philippines constitute our most, if not our only, vulnerable point, rather than any question of mere trade rivalry.

Mr. Chairman, it may at least be said of the preamble to this bill that if it never answers any other good purpose its discussion has forced the Republican leader of the minority, amid the plaudits of his followers, into an admission which makes it clear that the present policy of his party in respect to the Philippines is not what it was declared to be by McKinley, Roosevelt, and Taft. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I congratulate the gentleman upon his frankness. His was at least an honest, candid, and courageous avowal.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. But, Mr. Chairman, in what sort of a position does it place the leadership of the Republican Party? In what sort of a position does it place the ranking Republican on the Committee on Insular Affairs, who has had charge of the Republican end of this debate? Where, too, does it leave the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], also a prominent Republican member of that committee, who, when interrogated as to his position by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], declined to say whether or not he favored granting the Filipinos their independence? It is pleasing to know that there is one prominent Republican who has the courage of his convictions and who is willing to tell the exact truth as to the position of his party upon this subject. Now I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, my colleague is not on the floor, and I do not understand that he made the statement which the gentleman from Virginia quotes him as making. I think the gentleman from Illinois expressed his individual opinion.

Mr. JONES. Oh, yes; but that is not very important, since the gentleman's individual opinions usually go with that side of the House. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I may add, too, that the opinions he expressed were warmly applauded by the Republican membership of the House. So that while what the gentleman said may have been but the expression of his individual opinions, it received the approval of his Republican associates, and the fact that he is the acknowledged leader of his party in this House will cause that statement to go forth throughout the land as the authoritative declaration of the Republican Party in respect to the Philippine Islands.

A MEMBER. It has gone out already.

Mr. JONES. Yes; it has gone all over the country. The Washington Post of this morning gave it a prominent place on its first page, a thing it has not done in respect to the proceedings of Congress, so far as I can recall, since the beginning of the European war. I am told, too, by gentlemen around me that the New York papers of to-day give to it a like prominence.

So, Mr. Chairman, I repeat, I am glad to know that there is one prominent Republican at least who has the honesty, the decency, and the frankness to tell the Filipino people the truth as to the position of his party upon this subject. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In a speech which President McKinley delivered in the city of Chicago he gave utterance to words which I commend to the gentleman who represents that city with such conspicuous ability in this House. In that speech President McKinley said:

The War with Spain was undertaken not that the United States should increase its territory, but that oppression at our very doors should be stopped. This noble sentiment—must continue to animate us, and we must give to the world the full demonstration of the sincerity of our purpose.

He proceeded to say—

Are the Republicans, may I ask, who, under the leadership of the gentleman from Illinois, are opposing this bill upon the sole ground that it declares it to be the purpose of the people of the United States to give the Filipinos their independence so soon as they have demonstrated their capacity to govern themselves by the establishment of a stable government, giving to the world the full demonstration of the sincerity of the purpose expressed by William McKinley?

Mr. Chairman, I regret that I have not the time in which to reply to the many misleading and too often wholly irrelevant statements made during this debate by gentlemen who oppose this bill.

I have already said, in regard to the assertion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] that only 15 per cent of the Filipinos were literate, that, on the contrary, at least 75 per cent of them, according to the best obtainable authority, were literate. The gentleman will doubtless recall that he said he made his statement upon the authority of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], but the speech of Mr. MILLER as it appears in the RECORD does not bear out that statement. This is what Mr. MILLER said, according to the RECORD, from which I read:

I said 85 per cent of the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands do not now have an adequate idea of what self-government is, its duties or responsibilities, or what independence really consists of.

It seems, therefore, that the gentleman from Ohio has not produced any evidence to corroborate his remarkable statement. The gentleman from Minnesota says he made no such statement.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Not now. There is one other statement made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] to which I wish to call the attention of the House, notwithstanding that the Resident Commissioner from the Philippine Islands has already commented upon it. The gentleman from Ohio said in reply to a question by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX], as to what was the percentage of literacy in the American Colonies at the time of the American Revolution, that he could not give the exact figures, but that he could inform the gentleman that 29 of the 56 members who a few years later composed the Constitutional Convention were college-bred men, and that he knew of no fairer test of the literacy of that period than the fact stated by him afforded. Accepting his test as to the literacy of a people, I wish to inform him that every one of the 81 members of the Philippine Assembly is a college-bred man. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

During the course of this debate much credit has been claimed for the Republican Party for the public-school system established in the Philippines by the American Government. No one, I take it, will be disposed to deny that the public-school system inaugurated by Americans, but paid for by Filipinos, has proved a great blessing. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] was greatly mistaken, however, when he said that public schools taught by Filipino teachers were lacking in efficiency when removed from the immediate supervision of American educators. This was his statement:

I also wanted to see what was the result to the school of removing American supervision. So I traveled and I saw. I found that wherever American supervision was immediate, was direct, was there on the ground, the work of the teacher and the children and the school was efficient. It was what you might call satisfactory. The spirit was good. The morale was good. Things were shipshape. The atmosphere was such as you would like to see in a school. But, without a single exception, when you removed that immediate supervision and allowed a school in charge of a Filipino teacher to be removed and separated and to exist by itself the decline was immediate and most disheartening.

Oh, I visited so many of the schools that if they had not been named "schools" I would never have known that they were schools, because the supervision was not there, eloquently testifying to the capacity of the Filipino teachers to respond to the ideas that they see and to the utmost importance of the supervision and direction on the part of the American supervising force. This does not mean the Filipino teacher never can be self-reliant; it simply means that, while advancing, he has not yet reached it.

Now, let me read to the House what is said upon this subject by the director of education of the Philippine Islands in a special report bearing date January 23, 1914. Bear in mind, too, that the author of this report, which unquestionably contains the most accurate and trustworthy information obtainable in regard to the public schools of the Philippines, is not an appointee of the present administration. This is what this report says:

It has been the policy of the bureau of education to lay an increasing amount of responsibility upon the Filipino teacher. As a result, where five years ago there were 70 Filipino and 390 American supervising teachers, there are to-day 124 Filipino supervising teachers and 185 American. Moreover, there are a number of Filipinos assigned to work which is at least equal in importance and responsibility to that of the supervising teachers—there are now 29 Filipino provincial industrial supervisors—and this number will be constantly increased. There are at present 120 intermediate schools with Filipino principals. Five years ago there were 208 Filipino and 366 American teachers engaged in intermediate instruction. At the present time there are 430 Filipinos and 148 Americans. Primary instruction, except in a very few classes where special work is being carried on, is entirely in the hands of Filipinos.

It would not be far from the truth to state that the school system as it existed seven years ago, with the exception of certain administrative offices, has been almost completely Filipinized.

Was ever a more responsive and conclusive reply made to any statement than is here made by the director of education to the derogatory and wholly gratuitous statement of the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] has questioned the accuracy of my statement that the Filipinos favor the passage of this bill, and to show that such is not the case he read certain newspaper articles.

I not only declared that the Filipinos, with practical unanimity, desire that this bill shall be passed, but I submit that the evidence upon which I made that assertion is conclusive and overwhelming, the statements of a few interested, prejudiced, and Filipino-hating American newspaper writers to the contrary notwithstanding. I am perfectly aware that because this bill falls short of fixing a definite date for independence it is disappointing to a great many Filipinos, but the number of those who for that reason would like to see it fail of passage is so inconsiderable that it is absurd to say they truly represent the sentiment of the Filipino people.

This bill has not only received the indorsement of the Nationalista Party, which is the majority party in the islands, but resolutions of approval have been adopted by 8 provincial boards, 4 assemblies of municipal presidents, and 247 municipal councils. Out of 71 mass meetings where it was the subject of consideration and discussion, it received the indorsement of 70; and yet certain American newspapers published in Manila, saturated with a hatred of the Filipinos and bitterly hostile to even the thought of granting them independence now or hereafter, grossly exaggerate the importance of the action of a single mass meeting and willfully and deliberately misrepresent and malign the Filipino people as a whole.

This resolution, adopted by the municipal council of Gubat, is substantially in the language of those adopted by 246 other municipal councils:

THE MUNICIPAL GOVERNMENT OF GUBAT SORSOGON, P. I.,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY.

EXCERPT FROM THE MINUTES OF THE REGULAR MEETING OF THE MUNICIPAL COUNCIL OF GUBAT, HELD ON JULY 31, 1914.

By the suggestion of the president, the following resolution was enacted:

Whereas this municipal council has understood that the new Jones bill has been presented to Congress of the United States;

Whereas the Hon. WILLIAM A. JONES, Representative from Virginia, and as a faithful friend of the Filipinos, has framed said bill so that the Filipinos will in the near future have the entire control of the Philippine Government;

Whereas the council believe that the provisions of said bill are the most beneficial that the Filipinos can obtain from the Government of the United States at present, and that this will be the first step to a definite independence of the country;

Whereas the presentation of said bill to Congress was made, due to the energetic efforts of our Representatives in Congress, Hon. MANUEL QUEZON and Hon. MANUEL EARNSHAW;

Whereas the Philippine Assembly, under the leadership of Hon. Sergio Osmeña, has always been the interpreter of the ideals of the Filipinos in this historical epoch of the country: Therefore be it

Resolved, That this municipal council, following the unanimous feeling of the people of these islands in general, by means of this present resolution unanimously adhere to said bill, ratifying once more the faith in the patriotic labor of our Resident Commissioners in Washington and the Philippine Assembly; and be it

Resolver further, That copies of this resolution be sent to the author of the bill, WILLIAM A. JONES, the honorable Resident Commissioners, Philippine Assembly, and the assemblyman of the first district of Sorsogon.

Approved.

I hereby certify to the correctness of the above-quoted resolution.

MIGUEL ESCARCHA,
Municipal Secretary.

Mr. Chairman, there are two municipal councils, it is true, that declined to indorse the bill, but they, together with the one mass meeting of which I have spoken, do not represent public sentiment in the Philippine Islands any more than one swallow makes a summer.

It has been said that no public hearings were had when this bill was under consideration in committee; that the Philippine Resident Commissioner [Mr. QUEZON] was not invited to appear before the committee, in order that he might give to it the benefit of his intimate knowledge of conditions in the Philippines.

It is quite true that the committee decided that no good could be accomplished by holding public hearings. This does not mean, however, that those who were charged with the responsibility of formulating this measure did not avail themselves of every means at their command to secure the best attainable information in respect to the various subjects dealt with in the bill. Naturally, then, Mr. QUEZON was among those most frequently conferred with, and I wish here and now to publicly express the appreciation of the majority members of the committee for his many excellent suggestions and for the invaluable assistance which he in many ways rendered them. I consulted with him most freely as to each one of the more important provisions of the bill, and I wish to testify to my deep sense of obligation for all the intelligent and most helpful assistance which I personally received from him.

This bill does not express in its terms all that he may have desired and hoped for, but I am in a position to say that he accepts it as a definite and decided advance in the direction of a more autonomous government and of proximate and definite independence.

It gives to his people a legislature of their own choosing in both of its branches; it removes the odious restriction upon the right of suffrage, which denies to the Filipino who can not read and write a foreign language all participation in the civil affairs of his country; it enables the Filipinos to make their own laws and to raise and to expend the public revenues, and it provides for the early and thorough Filipinization of the civil service. But above and beyond all this it gives to them a definite promise that so soon as they shall have established a stable government they shall be granted their complete independence. It does not fix a definite date upon the arrival of which independence shall be granted, but it gives to this people a solemn promise and pledge that they shall have it, and it provides the easy means and marks the way whereby it may be secured.

No wonder, then, Mr. Chairman, that the brilliant representative of the Filipino people should have been moved to such impassioned eloquence when pleading with the membership of this House for the passage of this measure.

Mr. Chairman, the passage of this bill will mark the beginning of a new and a better era in the Philippine Islands. It will allay the discontent and remove the disaffection which has resulted from the failure of the United States hitherto to announce definitely and authoritatively their policy with reference to the future political status of the islands. It will inspire the Filipino people with lofty purpose and noble endeavor. It will incite in their hearts and minds the high purpose of demonstrating to the world their desire for national freedom and their capacity for self-government. And it will serve to cement into the strong bonds of enduring friendship that good will and kindly feeling which, thanks to the wise and sympathetic administration of Gov. Gen. Harrison, the Filipino people now entertain for the American Nation. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired; all time has expired; and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk began reading the preamble.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. The Clerk is beginning to read the preamble. Does the consideration of the preamble precede the bill or the consideration of the bill precede the preamble in committee?

Mr. JONES. I do not object.

Mr. MANN. I am not asking the gentleman from Virginia whether he objects or not; I am making a parliamentary inquiry of the Chair.

Mr. JONES. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I thought the gentleman addressed his remark to me.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, if the Chair will permit me——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would be glad to hear from the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, of course a preamble to a bill is not a very usual thing, and yet it is by no means unprecedented. I can not now give the Chair the page, but I think in volume 4 of Hinds' Precedents the Chair will find that when the bill providing for the Jamestown Exhibition, a bill and not a resolution, came before the House the bill was first considered and then the preamble was passed upon at the end of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. I call the attention of the gentleman to Jefferson's Manual, page 160, paragraph 407, which I think settles the thing in the same way.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think so.

Mr. MANN. I know that the parliamentary clerk was of the same opinion.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I desire to suggest this in addition to what I was saying: A few days ago we had a bill here which had a preamble, and that bill was considered in Committee of the Whole. I had the honor to be presiding at that time, and this question arose privately, the Chair being asked by the Clerk, and the Chair directed the Clerk to read the preamble at the beginning. No question was raised and no amendments to the preamble were offered.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman from Tennessee familiar with the provision in Jefferson's Manual referred to by the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I am fairly familiar with it. Here is the only difficulty about that: As I remember that statement, that deals with procedure in the House, and we are proceeding in the committee.

Mr. MANN. This deals with procedure in the committee. It reads in this way:

> To this natural order of beginning at the beginning there is a single exception found in parliamentary usage. When a bill is taken up in committee or on its second reading they postpone the preamble until the other parts of the bill are gone through.

That seems to be conclusive.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I thought that referred to the procedure in the House.

Mr. MANN. It refers to both procedure in committee and in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. It seems to the Chair that that is conclusive, and the Clerk will read the bill.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, before the reading is commenced I desire to make this suggestion: We desire to make a motion to strike out the preamble, and, of course, we desire to debate that motion. Either that debate will have to be had now or it will have to be had at the close of the reading of the bill, and, I presume, would have to be had in the Committee of the Whole. In the last bill considered I made a motion to strike out the preamble to the bill, but it could not be debated at that time, and if we wait until the bill has been finished in the Committee of the Whole there will be no opportunity for discussion of the preamble.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I think he is mistaken in that. After the reading of the bill in the Committee of the Whole, then the preamble will be read and will be subject to amendment, just the same as the rest of the bill, to be reported to the House, and in the House, under the procedure, the disposition of the preamble comes after the engrossment of the bill and before the third reading of the bill, according to the precedents.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is my understanding, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MANN. The question would be, I take it, on agreeing to the preamble.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes; and after the bill has been concluded under the five-minute rule, then the preamble will be read and be subject to debate and amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the understanding of the Chair. The Clerk will read.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. GORDON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Carr, one of its clerks, announced that Mr. PITTMAN had been relieved from further service as a conferee on the bill (H. R. 14233) to provide for the leasing of coal lands in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes, and Mr. SMITH of Arizona had been appointed in his stead.

THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of this act and the name "The Philippines" as used in this act shall apply to and include the Philippine Islands ceded to the United States Government by the treaty of peace concluded between the United States and Spain on the 11th day of April, 1899, the boundaries of which are set forth in article 3 of said treaty, together with those islands embraced in the treaty between Spain and the United States concluded at Washington on the 7th day of November, 1900.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I have just listened with a good deal of pleasure and profit to the speech of the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES], and I was especially attracted to that portion of his speech in which he said that the Republican leader on this side of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], had fairly and honestly stated the position of the Republican minority, and he congratulated him upon his frankness. I wish that the distinguished gentleman from Virginia would now show the same frankness and state the position of his party upon this question. I wish that the distinguished gentleman would rise in his place and say that he is in favor of Filipino independence or that he is opposed to it, in order that we may know where his party stands. I have been listening here now for several days to the different speeches made upon that side of the House, and I have not yet heard anyone say what his position was.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. If the gentleman had done me the honor to listen to me yesterday, he would have heard it, I think.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I did hear some of it; but I will ask the gentleman now whether he is in favor of independence for the Filipinos?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Absolutely.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. When?

Mr. SLAYDEN. As quickly as it can be done. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Oh, yes; "as quickly as it can be done."

Mr. SLAYDEN. I am ready now.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Is your party ready now?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I regret to say that not being in control of the party I can not answer that. Is the gentleman opposed to giving the Filipinos independence?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Absolutely.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Now and always?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. JONES. Does the gentleman ask me that question?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, my reply is that from the day the Philippines came into the possession of the United States up to the present moment I have accepted the teachings of Thomas Jefferson, and followed the mandates of my party upon this subject, and therefore I will state that I believe that the Filipinos are entitled to their independence and that it ought to be given them. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GOOD. When?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. That is no answer. That is the same statement that we have heard over and over again, but I am looking for some man upon the Democratic side of the House who has the courage and frankness that the gentleman from Virginia attributes to the leader on this side of the House.

Mr. JONES rose.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Oh, I can not yield any more unless the gentleman yields me five minutes.

Mr. JONES. I have no time to yield, but I have no doubt that the House will consent to allow the gentleman to proceed for five minutes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Then I will ask unanimous consent that my time may be extended for five minutes in order that the gentleman may ask me a question.

Mr. JONES. Oh, no; the gentleman was to ask me a question.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Oh, no. I did ask the gentleman the question, and he attempted to answer it, and traveled around the same circle that all the rest of them have traveled.

Mr. JONES. Oh, no. I will answer any question that the gentleman desires to submit.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Let the gentleman do it in his own time, and let him answer this question: Whether when he drew this preamble he was doing it for political effect or whether he meant what he said; and if he meant what he said, that the Filipinos should have independence, why did not he write it in the bill?

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Oh, I say that the gentleman should answer it in his own time.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I will state now that I regard that question as insulting.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If the gentleman is so easily insulted as that, perhaps I will insult him again before I sit down. If it is an insult to ask the chairman of this great committee where he stands upon the most vital question——

Mr. JONES. Oh, no.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Then I admit that I am guilty of using insulting language.

Mr. JONES. Your question conveyed an intimation that I regarded as insulting.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Washington yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman professes——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If I were to yield to the gentleman, he would simply travel around in that circle once more, just as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] traveled around. Now, what you gentlemen seek to do is to impress the country with the idea that you are in favor of Filipino independence, but you have not got the courage to say so. You have not got the courage to put it in your bill; you have not got the courage to do anything but attempt to play politics. Now, I am not condemning you gentlemen if you are in favor of Filipino independence. Perhaps you are right; I am not prepared to say you are not; that is certainly a legitimate subject of debate; but we have them, and since we have them I do not want to turn them loose to become the prey of the other nations of the world. But what I am criticizing you gentlemen for, what I am condemning you for, is because you have not the courage of your convictions. You constantly talk about Filipino independence; you make beautiful speeches about liberty for all and self-government, but you do not have the courage to put it in your bill. That is what I am complaining about. Why do not you have the courage to say where you stand? Why does not the gentleman from Virginia do like the gentleman from Illinois? Let us fight out this question on the square.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS] offers an amendment as a new section, as section 2.

Mr. TOWNER. But, Mr. Chairman, section 2 has not been read.

Mr. MANN. I wish to offer an amendment to section 1.

Mr. BURGESS. Let the amendment be read.

Mr. MANN. But we have not passed section 1 yet. I understand this amendment comes after section 1.

Mr. BURGESS. Yes; it is a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Illinois wishes to offer an amendment to section 1?

Mr. MANN. Yes; I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment has been offered.

Mr. MANN. Then I wish to oppose it. I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia one question. Section 1 of the bill refers to the treaty of peace concluded between the United States and Spain on the 11th day of April, 1899, while section 2 of the bill refers to the provisions of the treaty of peace between the United States and Spain signed at Paris, December 10, 1898. Why the discrimination in name? It is the same treaty, is it not?

Mr. JONES. It is the same treaty. One section speaks of the date at which it was signed and the other the date at which the exchange of the ratifications was made. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that these sections, except in one slight particular, are exact copies of the organic law, or rather that the first section is an exact copy of the organic law, and the second a copy of an act of Congress subsequently passed. In other words, the present law is reenacted.

Mr. MANN. Well, it may be that Congress described this same treaty in two different ways in two different acts, which is not desirable, and even less desirable to describe the same document by a different description as to the treaty in two sections, one following the other in the same act. I do not care which it is, but it seems to me if we refer to the treaty of Paris we ought to describe it by the same date, whichever it is to be. Any person reading this would suppose you have reference to two different treaties, if they were not acquainted with the history, because you give two entirely different descriptions to the same document.

Mr. JONES. Well, I will say to the gentleman that this is the same treaty, and that the 11th of April, 1899, is the date on which the ratifications of the treaty were exchanged at Washington. The treaty was signed in Paris on the 10th of December, 1898.

Mr. MANN. I am aware of that fact.

Mr. JONES. There can not possibly be any confusion, because it is one and the same treaty, and there are no other treaties with which it could be confused. These sections are copies of the language used in the organic act and the act of Congress passed subsequent thereto.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman quotes from two different acts of Congress without reflecting upon it at all. A parliamentary body referring to the same document in the same act ought to refer to it so people who are not acquainted with the history of the facts may understand it. I will guarantee there are not 20 Members of this House who read these two items who would know without stopping to think for a while whether it referred to the same document.

Mr. JONES. Well, Mr. Chairman, they do, and therefore I do not think any harm can result. It may be entirely true, as the gentleman says, that without explanation Members here might not know, but it is not possible that there can ever be any serious contention over the matter.

Mr. MANN. I made the inquiry with the idea that possibly the gentleman might change one or the other, so as to use the same description in both places.

Mr. JONES. I think it would be best to let it stand as the law is now.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MILLER. I understood from the statement of the Chair a moment ago that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas was to the second paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. It is a substitute to the section following section 1.

Mr. MILLER. I desire to make a motion with reference to paragraph 1 that is in the bill. Would that of necessity come before the motion to introduce a new section?

The CHAIRMAN. To section 1?

Mr. MILLER. Yes; to section 1.

The CHAIRMAN. That would have precedence.

Mr. MILLER. I have no desire to displace the gentleman from Texas unless I lose my right by so doing.

Mr. BURGESS. That is all right.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to offer an amendment to section 1?

Mr. MILLER. I desire to move to strike out, after the word "treaty," in line 9, the remainder of the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 9, after the word "treaty," strike out the remainder of the paragraph.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I am frank to express at the outset I do not expect the committee to adopt the amendment, and I doubt very much if I myself would vote for it standing by itself. However, there is a very particular and important reason why I have offered the amendment.

An amendment of some such character should be so framed and adopted in the bill as to exclude from many of the provisions of the bill, and particularly from the operation of the preamble, if that is to be adopted, a portion of the territory which we bought from Spain two years after we concluded the treaty with Spain ending the Spanish-American War. The attention of the committee was yesterday invited by the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG] to the situation in respect to certain of these islands that I desire again to call the attention of the committee to, and perhaps to emphasize. There is a wide difference between the extent of the territory which we bought and paid for by the treaty we made with Spain in 1900 and the territory which we acquired by reason of the treaty of Paris in 1898. The territory, however, which we acquired by the last treaty and which we bought is exceedingly small, wholly unimportant to the Filipino people, wholly unimportant to the Philippine Islands as an entity, if they are ever to be independent, but vitally important to certain considerations which I think are important to the American people. Now, the islands which we acquired by that last treaty with Spain was that little group of islands called Cagayan de Sulu, in the midst of the Jolo Sea—a little group of islands almost down to Borneo, in the southernmost corner of the archipelago. Now, there is no advantage to us or anybody to retain this group of small islands, and we should not do it, and that is the reason why my amendment should be adopted, but there is reason why Cagayan de Sulu should be retained by the American Government for the American people. As is evident by a glance at the map, it is a very small and unimportant group of islands. It is inhabited, not by what we ordinarily call Filipinos but by a handful of people who are all Moros, and those Moros asked that they be retained as a part of the United States. Now, if any of you desire to give to a people that sovereignty which they ask for, and which you say they have a right to demand, then their voice should be heard. But that is not the real and more important feature that I want to impress upon the committee.

As stated by the gentleman from North Dakota yesterday, on the greater of these islands—of Cagayan de Sulu—is one of the most remarkable formations to be found anywhere in the world. I made a special trip there at the suggestion of a prominent official who desired to know what the situation exactly was, because he had heard of it and knew something about it. As you reach from the south this particular island you will find the coral reefs are there as elsewhere, but when you land and get ashore you find to your amazement that just inside of a complete breakwater there is a circular body of water, a harbor that is at least 200 feet deep at every point and as deep in some places, probably, as a thousand feet right up to the shore, and all of salt water. A channel into this can be made with a very small expenditure of money, because it is only necessary to go through coral rock. But that of itself is not so remarkable. This lake is about 3 miles in circumference; but to my surprise I found that on the innermost part of it—that part toward the interior of the island, where the cliffs rise from 200 to 250 feet straight up perpendicularly—there was a break, almost a chasm, and on the other side was another lake, almost equal in area, and so deep that we were not able to find bottom anywhere. The circumference of this second lake, I should say, was about 4 miles, and the water is absolutely fresh; and this is the remarkable situation. The two lakes are separated by a perpendicular cliff 250 feet high and probably not exceeding 75 feet in width, excepting at the point where this natural chasm leads through. The inner lake is 15 feet higher than the outer or salt-water lake, requiring simply the construction of one small lock to enable boats of any size or magnitude to pass from the sea directly into a magnificent deep-water harbor of fresh water. The like of that is not to be found anywhere else in the Orient or anywhere in that half portion of the world's surface. The people of maritime experience will readily appreciate the great value in that situation to any commercial nation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for three minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER. By the construction of a lock that deep-water harbor is available to the boats of the world, if we wish to make it so; but it is certainly available to our own.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Why would they go there?

Mr. MILLER. To get the barnacles taken from the boats. It is a most ideal place, almost the only place in the Orient where a condition like that exists.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman inform the committee as to the distance this natural harbor is from some of the leading ports of the Orient?

Mr. MILLER. Of course Manila is the leading Philippine port of the Orient, and the distance between the two is about 600 miles; and I will say also that it is almost on a direct line; it is quite on a direct line of all the steamboat lines now from Japan and upper China to Australia and New Zealand. The route passes right down through here, touching at Zamboanga, and then on down. When the Panama Canal is constructed everybody knows, at least I think all are agreed, that one of the great routes of travel of the world will probably bisect the Philippine Islands, and, passing through, go to regions farther to the west and come within a reasonable distance of this group of islands.

Mr. JONES. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MILLER. Certainly.

Mr. JONES. What island are these lakes on?

Mr. MILLER. Cagayan de Sulu.

Mr. JONES. They were embraced in the original lines laid down in the treaty of the 11th of April.

Mr. MILLER. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but it has not been so considered by the authority of our Government.

Mr. JONES. The lines are on the maps.

Mr. MILLER. I do not wish to enter into a controversy about that now, but they are specifically mentioned in the treaty we made with Spain in 1900. But there is another feature perhaps more important. Whether the Philippine Islands are to continue as a part of the United States or not, the United States expects to have trade relations with the Orient, and for that purpose we must have a naval base.

The Democratic majority on this side have specifically stated, and wisely, in their platform that whatever may be done respecting the removal of our sovereignty from the islands we shall reserve in the islands appropriate regions as a naval base, and among those certainly we should reserve the Cagayan de Sulu. There is a perfect harbor, in which we can place all the warships now under the American flag, where they can have a safe rendezvous, where they can enjoy the priceless privilege of having barnacles removed, and where they will be relatively free from attack. And I will say further that the periphery of the inner harbor, while not wide as distances go, is yet so high and so perfect that it is a reasonably safe protection from the outside.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it does seem to me that we ought to be advised as to this condition, and that we ought to govern ourselves accordingly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Chairman, I make a point that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and ten Members are present—a quorum. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] will proceed.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for one question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. MILLER. Certainly.

Mr. GOULDEN. How near the lines of traffic between the United States and the Orient is that island of which the gentleman was speaking?

Mr. MILLER. The island I am speaking of is really very distant from the lines of traffic between the United States and the Orient. The main line of traffic which our boats and really all the boats sailing the Pacific now take is the great circle to the north, and then they come around, striking Japan, and then down south, striking Hongkong, several hundred miles to the southwest, and then on to Manila. There is another route to the south, striking the middle of the Philippine group at the straits just to the south of Luzon, and then passing on to Manila.

Mr. GOULDEN. What is the population of those islands?

Mr. MILLER. I journeyed around through the interior, but I do not suppose there are a hundred people in all the group.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman indicate what the United States Government paid Spain for the islands it took over under the treaty of 1900?

Mr. MILLER. I have not refreshed my recollection lately, but I think it was $100,000. Twenty million dollars was paid for the Philippine Islands and $100,000 for the group.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I want to speak to the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes.

Mr. MOORE. I ask the gentleman from Minnesota to hold his place and answer a question in my time, if he will.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized to oppose the amendment.

Mr. MOORE. No; I am for the amendment, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] may have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will put that question now, and recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] afterwards. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. MOORE. As I understand the gentleman, the United States paid a consideration for those islands in the Sulu Sea, to which the gentleman has just made reference?

Mr. MILLER. It did.

Mr. MOORE. Under a treaty which had nothing to do with the original taking of the islands?

Mr. MILLER. None whatever.

Mr. MOORE. Therefore we own those islands in fee to-day?

Mr. MILLER. We do.

Mr. MOORE. By virtue of a title ceded to us by Spain for a consideration?

Mr. MILLER. We do.

Mr. MOORE. And it is proposed by this bill to give those islands back to the Filipinos; that is to say, if we take the preamble for the substance of the bill?

Mr. MILLER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. MOORE. Under that arrangement we would give away lands that have nothing whatever to do with Filipino independence?

Mr. MILLER. That is so.

Mr. MOORE. Property belonging to the United States and available, as the gentleman indicates, for a ship-repair station or for coaling-station purposes, in excellence as to fresh water beyond that of any other point in the whole archipelago?

Mr. MILLER. That is true.

Mr. MOORE. Is the gentleman going to use the remainder of his five minutes?

Mr. MILLER. No; I believe I have nothing further to say.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman has traveled over the Philippines. Does he know of any point in those islands that would be more suitable for a ship-repair station or a docking station or a coaling station than those islands, owned absolutely in fee by the United States?

Mr. MILLER. In answer to that, Mr. Chairman, I will say that there are many other points in the islands that would be more accessible than this little group of islands, but none of them possesses the priceless qualification of having a fresh-water harbor.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman hold his place for a moment longer while I make a statement?

Mr. MILLER. I will.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington rose.

Mr. MOORE. I wish to say that a fresh-water station is one of the most desirable things that the Navy can possess. There are very few fresh-water stations along any of the coasts of the United States. There is none serviceable for the Navy on the Pacific coast with the single exception of Mare Island, and that is somewhat in dispute. There is no fresh-water naval station along the whole Atlantic seaboard now available for naval vessels except at Philadelphia, up the Delaware River. Hence it is apparent that if we give away what this cry for independence does not require, lands or islands that we actually possess in fee in the Philippine Archipelago, where at some future time such a station might be sorely needed, we will simply be yielding something that perhaps the necessities of the United States dictate we should hold for ourselves.

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. MILLER. I will yield to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] first.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I wanted to ask the gentleman some questions about these islands. On the Pacific coast we are naturally interested in this subject of naval stations. What are the conditions about the entrance in rough weather? Are the conditions such that in time of storm naval vessels could enter this harbor?

Mr. MILLER. I will say that that is in the typhoon belt, and at certain seasons of the year typhoons are found in that region, although not with the severity that characterizes other portions. But you will observe that it is in the center of the Sulu Sea, and at most seasons of the year the storms are not bad and do not make a difficult situation at all. But at any time, even in stress of weather, during a typhoon, with a proper entrance into this outer harbor, I can see no reason why any boat should not make it.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. That is the point I wanted to ask about.

Mr. MILLER. Now I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM].

Mr. HELM. If I understood the gentleman from Minnesota correctly, he says that the Government of the United States paid $100,000 for the islands he has indicated as being in the Sulu Sea.

Mr. MILLER. For these and the other group I have mentioned.

Mr. HELM. Is it not a fact that the $100,000 was paid for the islands north of Luzon and south of Formosa, in between Japan and the Philippine Islands?

Mr. MILLER. I concede that there is a matter of contention about names, but not possessed of merit.

Now, the Cagayan de Sulu Islands, possessing this peculiar formation which I have indicated, naturally are likely to attract a great deal of attention from the commercial nations of the world.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I very greatly regret that I did not hear the first part of the gentleman's argument in favor of his amendment. Has the gentleman considered the military necessity concerning this point he talks of?

Mr. MILLER. That was the original cause of my visit to the islands, to ascertain some facts bearing on the military situation.

Mr. BUTLER. Has the gentleman in mind what it will cost to defend this position from the land side?

Mr. MILLER. There is no expense in defending it from the land side. The island is so small that from the center you can see the water all around it.

Mr. BUTLER. Have the military men ever suggested this as a desirable point?

Mr. MILLER. They have. The highest official in that department requested that I go there, which I did.

Mr. BUTLER. Has the Navy Department made any expression about it?

Mr. MILLER. I have not had an opportunity to confer with the Navy Department.

Mr. BUTLER. I know the gentleman has been in the Philippine Islands, where I have never been and never expect to be and never want to be, and because he has been there I am asking him for this information. I know that at one time we had concluded to stop at Olongapo, and then I know, after we had expended some of our money there, it was decided that that was not a desirable place.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Has any naval authority ever recommended the establishment of a coaling or naval station at any other point in the whole Philippine Archipelago except in the vicinity of Manila Bay?

Mr. MILLER. I think not. I do not think this point would make an ideal place for a coaling station, anyhow. What I desire to call to the attention of the committee is the peculiar characteristic of this one harbor and its availability for an important purpose, both for the Navy and for commerce.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield further at that point?

Mr. MILLER. Certainly.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The chief advantage, as I understand, of this remarkable formation is that it will afford us the advantages of a dry dock for the purpose of cleaning the bottoms of vessels, without going to the great expense of constructing such a dry dock.

Mr. MILLER. Yes. Now, in reference to what the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] stated, which was reiterated by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM], about these islands not being included, they will find that by the last treaty we made with Spain the Sulu Islands are specifically named. Now, there are no Sulus up in the north. The Sulus are in the south. Whether the word "Cagayan" is to be confined to this group of which I am speaking or is also to be extended to the group up north there may be some controversy, but there can be none about Sulu. I will say that the word "Cagayan" is used both in respect to the northern region of Luzon and also with respect to these islands.

Now, it may be interesting to the membership of the committee to ascertain how it comes that there are these two twin lakes right side by side. Anybody who looks can see that they are the craters of two extinct volcanoes, side by side.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] has told us a good many interesting things about the island of Cagayan, and it seems that he possesses a great deal of information in respect to it; but, unfortunately for him, the island to which he refers and the possibilities of which he has discussed came into the possession of the United States under the treaty of Paris, and is not one of those named in the subsequent treaty, which was negotiated in 1900. I think if the gentleman will do me the honor to come here and examine this map I can show him conclusively that he is absolutely mistaken, and that every statement he has made falls to the ground because his statements of fact are not correct.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

Mr. JONES. It has been said that it is better not to know so many things than to know so many that are not so.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

Mr. JONES. I will; but if the gentleman will come here, I think I can convince him of his error.

Mr. MILLER. I want to say now that the gentleman can not do it.

Mr. JONES. I think I can if the gentleman is honest, as I believe him to be.

Mr. MILLER. The gentleman's misinformation about the Philippine Islands could not convince a 10-year-old baby.

Mr. JONES. Very well, Mr. Chairman; let us see whether or not I convince him. I have in my hand a copy of the treaty as it appears in the speech of the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG] made on yesterday. It reads:

> Spain relinquishes to the United States all title and claim to title which she may have had at the time of the conclusion of the treaty of peace of Paris to any and all islands belonging to the Philippine Archipelago—> lying outside the lines described in article 3 of that treaty, and particularly to the islands of Cagayan, Sulu, and Sibutu and their dependencies, and agrees that all such islands shall be comprehended in the cession of the archipelago as fully as if they had been expressly included within those lines.

Now, Mr. Chairman, here is the line laid down in the Paris treaty. It comes down here and then runs across in this direction. Now, any of the islands of the Philippine Archipelago that are not within these lines are ceded to the United States under the treaty of 1900. The gentleman says the treaty especially mentions the island of Cagayan. The gentleman is mistaken about that. The treaty says the island of Cagayan Sulu, and if the gentleman will come here I will point out to him on the map the name Cagayan Sulu, as plain as it can be printed. It is situated just here. It is Cagayan Sulu that is mentioned in the treaty, and not Cagayan Island. Now, will the gentleman admit his mistake?

Mr. MILLER. No; because in the treaty there is a comma between the word Cagayan and the word Sulu. If the gentleman does not wear glasses that will enable him to see punctuation marks, I can not help it.

Mr. JONES. I notice that there is a comma there in the treaty as it appears in the speech of the gentleman, but on this map there is Cagayan Sulu and Cagayan. The island of Cagayan is near the center of the archipelago and could not possibly have been alluded to in this treaty. So the gentleman is absolutely mistaken, and if he will not admit it I can not help it, but I think every man in this House, including the membership on that side, will admit that the gentleman from Minnesota is mistaken.

Now, I wish to say that, even if I were mistaken in assuming that the gentleman would admit his error, I feel sure that he will do so later on and in his cooler moments. I do not blame him, or, rather, I should say that I can understand how the gentleman would not wish to admit that the statements upon which he founded his argument were incorrect—that he was arguing from false premises. This section simply defines the territory that is embraced in the term "the Philippine Islands." Gentlemen speak of our having what they call a fee simple title to the islands embraced in the treaty of 1900, and say that it is different from the title under which the others are held. That is absolutely untrue. We got the whole Philippine group by paying $20,000,000 for it. It was discovered afterwards that, according to the lines laid down in the treaty, a few small islands of very little importance, with very few people on them, were excluded. In order to acquire title to them all, since Spain did not wish to retain these few islands, President McKinley entered into an arrangement by which we were to get them all, whether embraced within the original lines or not, for the sum of $100,000. So we hold them all by exactly the same title. But if we did not, I can see no reason why the language objected to should be stricken out, since there is nothing in the bill which proposes to dispose of the Philippine Islands. When the time comes, if it ever does come, and I hope it will come soon, when the United States shall grant the Filipinos their independence, they will do so on their own terms and will doubtless reserve such coaling and naval stations and terminals for cables as they may wish to retain. I am confident that no one of them will ever be located on the insignificant little island of Cagayan Sulu.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NORTON. I desire to ask the gentleman if this part of the treaty quoted by the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG] yesterday, appearing on page 17478 of the RECORD, is a correct transcript of that part of the treaty?

Mr. JONES. I do not believe that the punctuation is correct, but I have no copy of the treaty and can not answer the gentleman's question more definitely. But I can say that the War Department, which has jurisdiction over the Philippines, has always regarded the island of Cagayan Sulu as the one specially mentioned. It was specially mentioned because it was so near the line that it was deemed best to do so, I suppose.

Mr. NORTON. The transcript of the treaty on page 17478 reads "Cagayan," then a comma is inserted, and follows the words, "Sulu and Sibutu." Will the gentleman tell the House where the island of Sibutu is?

Mr. JONES. It is so small that I have not been able to locate it on the map. There are 3,000 or more of these islands, and some of them are so small that they have not been put on the map.

Mr. NORTON. Does the gentleman think the treaty of 1900 refers by name to two or three islands?

Mr. JONES. I think it refers to two. I feel absolutely certain as to this, and I think the gentleman himself must admit as much.

Mr. NORTON. Why should one conclude that was the intention if the treaty reads as quoted in the RECORD?

Mr. JONES. Because the island of Sulu, or Jolo, where the Sultan of Sulu resides, is a comparatively large and populous island. It is a very important island. It has always been understood by everybody that that was embraced in the original treaty, and there is no other Sulu Island but that.

Mr. NORTON. Is there not an island known as Sulu Island and another island known as Cagayan Island?

Mr. JONES. There is Cagayan and Cagayan Sulu and Sulu. Sulu is a very large and populous island, where the Sultan of Sulu resides.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I will.

Mr. COOPER. Was the island of Cagayan included in the terms of the first treaty of Paris?

Mr. JONES. Of course it was. It is in the very center of the group.

Mr. COOPER. Then it is excluded from the second treaty?

Mr. JONES. Of course.

Mr. COOPER. Then it leaves the island of Cagayan Sulu as the one included in the second treaty?

Mr. JONES. Of course. Everybody understands it except the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. Chairman, I am informed by gentlemen who are examining the map that the map itself states that Cagayan Sulu is referred to in the second treaty.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is marked on the map as having been acquired by the subsequent treaty.

The CHAIRMAN. The debate on this amendment is exhausted.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the amendment.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman from Minnesota yield for me to make a request to close debate in 10 minutes?

Mr. MILLER. I will, but I may not occupy more than three minutes.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate close on this amendment in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, if I may have the attention of the committee, I think I can clear up the situation in a word. The gentleman from Virginia takes issue with me from the fact that I claimed that the group of islands to which I have referred are the ones we acquired by the last treaty with Spain, and he claims that they were acquired under the first treaty. There are a great many places and islands in the Philippine group that have the name Cagayan. There are many separate islands that have the name Sulu. There is a lot of confusion resulting from a repetition of these names. The treaty which we made the last time reads as follows:

> And particularly to the islands Cagayan Sulu and Sibutu and their dependencies.

Mr. Chairman, no matter how you construe the language, whether it be this group to which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] referred as the Cagayan de Sulu group or the group to which I referred, Cagayan Sulu, they were both included within the wording of the treaty. Both names refer to the islands called Cagayan, inhabited by Moros, and their dependencies. The Cagayan Sulu group is the only one named Cagayan and containing Moros in that region. I will call the attention of the committee to the fact that in the best atlas, prepared by the able Father Algé, which is the foundation of most of the maps published since, aside from those which were prepared by the Coast and Geodetic Survey, the group I have described was called not Cagayan or Sulu, but Cagayan de Sulu or Jolo. It is the contention of the War Department that this group that I have described is in the same position as this group down here called Sibutu. They are inhabited by Sulus, and they were not included in that first treaty. It does not matter which you claim is the parent group, the language of the treaty is "Cagayan Sulu and Sibutu and their dependencies." Sibutu is in the most extreme part of the Philippines, almost down to the Equator. I went down there. It is not in the same situation as these others, except that it is included in the last treaty. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES], I am sure, does not wish to state that the island where the Sultan of Sulu lives is called the island of Sulu. It is the island of Jolo.

Mr. JONES. I asserted that it is sometimes called Sulu and sometimes Jolo.

Mr. MILLER. The gentleman has stated it right.

Mr. JONES. That is what I stated before.

Mr. MILLER. Then, he can not complain if I have given him an opportunity to restate it.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. I will ask the gentleman if it is not true that the Mohammedan Group of Islands, of which the island now known as Jolo is one, was not called the Sulu Group?

Mr. MILLER. There were several groups down there, and their names shifted more or less, but the general name usually applied to all those islands was Sulu Group, as the gentleman suggests.

Mr. TOWNER. Let me call the gentleman's attention to this fact, that the island as platted is called Cagayan Jolo, and then following, in parenthesis, is the word "Sulu," to indicate, as I understand it, that it belongs to the Sulu Group.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. In reading the remarks of the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG] as they appear in the RECORD of yesterday, I find that in that portion of the treaty which he quoted in the RECORD a comma appears between the words "Cagayan" and "Sulu."

Mr. MILLER. There is a comma in the copy put in the RECORD yesterday.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is evidently a mistake, because in the Senate document from which the gentleman has just read I find that "Cagayan Sulu" is all one name.

Mr. MILLER. That is true; and I do not know which is correct. It has no bearing on this, however. There is a comma in one and not in the other, but it does not matter. The point we have to admit is this, that these are two groups of islands inhabited by Moros which we purchased from Spain, and I do not care what names you call them by. We bought them in 1900, and the War Department——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the bill by adding the following as a new section, to follow section 1:

"That it is the purpose of the United States to cease exercising sovereignty over the Philippine Islands as soon as may be with justice to them and honor to the United States, and that it is the preference of the United States to accomplish this purpose by establishing an independent government in said islands; that in pursuance of such purpose and preference the President is respectfully requested to consider the expediency of opening negotiations with the Governments of Great Britain, Germany, France, Russia, Spain, and such other Governments as he may think advisable, with a view of effecting a joint treaty with such Governments, by which it shall be provided that an independent government in the Philippine Islands, when established by the United States, shall be recognized and preserved; that pending the establishment of such independent Philippine government the Philippine Islands shall be neutral territory; that such Philippine government, when established, shall agree that it will maintain equality of trade relations toward all the signatory powers, and that in the event of war between any of the nations of the earth it shall be neutral; that such concessions as may be made by the United States in the establishment of such independent government shall be recognized by all the signatory powers"

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on that.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I will call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that this is an important matter, and it occurs to me that there ought to be some agreement as to a time for debate.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, a point of order has been reserved. I desire to make the point of order that it is not germane. If the gentleman from Texas desires to discuss it, I will reserve the point of order.

Mr. BURGESS. No; I will ask the gentleman to proceed and make the point of order now.

Mr. JONES. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. BURGESS. Five minutes.

Mr. JONES. I will reserve it.

Mr. BURGESS. But I do not care to make a speech if it is not in order. Let the gentleman make the point of order.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, in order to accommodate everybody, I will make the point of order.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman to reserve that point of order until I can ask the gentleman from Texas a question.

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. What is the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas is not germane to the bill.

Mr. OGLESBY. Germane to the bill or germane to the preamble?

The CHAIRMAN. Germane to the bill.

Mr. JONES. It is not offered to the preamble.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, I want to discuss seriously this proposition with all the Members here. I do not offer this amendment for buncombe. I am serious about it. I drew and introduced into this House substantially that resolution in 1904, and I made a speech at great length—in fact, the longest speech I ever made in the House—upon the proposition on January 9, 1906. That was in advance of any platform favoring the neutralization of the islands, and the resolution was introduced some time before anyone else suggested the neutralization of the islands. So that I am in a position to claim credit for that; but, frankly, that is immaterial. I would not care for it, I would not be here now urging it, except I am fully of the opinion that it is the wisest thing for the Filipino people and the United States combined to vote this into the body of the bill.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURGESS. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. I have just read the gentleman's amendment, although I carefully listened to it being read, and it seems to me the gentleman has struck the kernel of the whole situation. The gentleman proposes immediate action——

Mr. BURGESS. That is what I propose.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman proposes that the President shall be authorized at once to proceed to confer with the great nations of the world as to the neutralization of those islands, looking to our ultimately yielding up our sovereignty over there. That is what the gentleman proposes.

Mr. BURGESS. It may interest you to give you a little reminiscence of a personal matter about this. I was first a candidate for Congress in 1900. I went down to Galveston and went into the office of Kleburg—whose brother was in Congress, and a very brilliant lawyer—and he said to me, "BURGESS, what about your Philippine platform in 1900—

"We favor an immediate declaration of the Nation's purpose to give the Filipinos, first, a stable form of government; second, independence; and, third, protection from outside interference, such as has been given for nearly a century to the Republics of Central and South America—

"What do you say to that plank?"

Mr. MADDEN. That would be an extension of the Monroe doctrine to the Philippines.

Mr. BURGESS. I said, "That involves a misconception of the Monroe doctrine, a misapplication of it to the Eastern Hemisphere, and I will not support that." He rose and shook hands with me and said, "I thought you had some sense; I am for you for Congress." He had supported a Republican two years before. That put me on my mettle, and it put me to studying this question; and I evolved after writing and rewriting—this resolution was drawn at least 50 times, and finally I introduced it into the House, and I stand on it now as the best and most practical solution of the Philippine question that is possible to mortal man. I believe that thoroughly or I would not be here urging it now. And I find myself in fine company in that belief.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. BURGESS. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Has the belief of the gentleman from Texas in the sacredness of promises of neutrality changed in the last two months?

Mr. BURGESS. No, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. He is still persuaded that nations beginning to fight will preserve what has been termed a "paper contract"——

Mr. BURGESS. Just a moment there. Neutrality will be very much stronger now than ever before.

Mr. BUTLER. Provided disarmament comes; yes, sir.

Mr. BURGESS. It will be stronger than ever before, and there is more reason for the adoption of this resolution now than there ever was.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. BURGESS. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I take it that the gentleman does not think that the party promise would be made good unless his amendment is incorporated into this bill?

Mr. BURGESS. Well, I think that. I have a letter here which I want to read. This is from a great man and a great Democrat, and you all love him.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BURGESS. I desire to read this letter:

JANUARY 28, 1914.

MY DEAR BURGESS: I remember well your speech on the Philippine resolution in January, 1906, and was very favorably impressed then, and subsequent study has brought the fixed conviction that your resolution is the solution of the problem. It ought to be passed, as it not only accords with the last Democratic platform, but is based on the soundest and wisest principles.

Your friend, CHAMP CLARK.

[Applause.]

Now, if you will take the four platforms you will see the Democratic Party has stumbled——

Mr SLOAN. It usually does.

Mr. BURGESS. But I love it in that it stumbles toward the right. It makes mistakes, but it makes those mistakes toward the right. In the Democratic platform of 1904 it said:

We insist that we ought to do for the Filipinos what we have done already for the Cubans, and it is our duty to make that promise now and upon suitable guaranties of protection to citizens of our own and other countries resident there.

That was the point that stuck in my craw. What protection would the Filipino have in person or property if we adopted the scuttle policy, took away our fleet, and declared their independence and sailed away? They would be worse off than to go on——

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BURGESS. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I did not fully understand the gentleman's amendment. Does it contemplate that the United States shall guarantee that the neutrality of the Philippines be preserved?

Mr. BURGESS. No, sir.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Does it simply mean, then, that the United States itself will agree to respect their neutrality?

Mr. BURGESS. In this joint treaty, all the nations agreeing.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. What does that amount to?

Mr. BURGESS. And upon that we will give them independence whenever we think they are entitled to it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Who is going to enforce that neutrality?

Mr. BURGESS. Who is going to enforce law anywhere?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. But there is always a power, I will state to my friend.

Mr. BURGESS. We have had neutrality treaties for 100 years and very few have been violated. Switzerland to-day is subject to a treaty involving neutrality, and that neutrality has not been violated up to this hour, when the worst war in the history of the world is going on around her.

Mr. BUTLER. But the gentleman knows an army can not very well get into Switzerland and——

Mr. BURGESS. And it will be pretty hard to get around to the Philippines.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURGESS. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Suppose a rebellion should begin in the Philippine Islands under the neutrality proposed by the gentleman from Texas, who would put down the rebellion?

Mr. BURGESS. All the powers who signed the neutrality treaty. That is the explanation.

Mr. STANLEY. Would any internecine strife in the Philippines affect their neuerality so far as trouble between foreign nations is concerned, or affect us in any way?

Mr. BURGESS. I do not think so.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman from Texas explain how it will be possible for anything except a sovereign or an independent government to enter into a compact of neutralization? Does not the whole proposition presuppose or presume that a territory to be neutralized must of itself be an independent government and a sovereign and a party to that compact or contract of neutralization? How can one sovereign, how can the United States, contract for the sovereignty of any other territory other than with the consent of the government of the territory to be neutralized, and how can it consent except that it be a sovereign body?

Mr. BURGESS. There is no proposition of that sort in my resolution.

Mr. HELM. Your proposition here is to neutralize the Philippine Islands, which is not a sovereign country——

Mr. McKELLAR. That can be taken care of in the treaty.

Mr. HELM. And it can not be done.

Mr. BURGESS. I disagree with the gentleman about that.

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman, of course, is sincere in his amendment and believes in the independence that is brought about in this way; then does not it follow that the gentleman is opposed to giving the Philippine Islands independence until all these nations will agree to give neutralization?

Mr. BURGESS. That does not follow.

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman believes in independence without it?

Mr. BURGESS. Let me say that I am a Democrat. I believe in the American theory of self-government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS] has expired.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Texas be extended 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman yield for just one further question?

Mr. BURGESS. In just a moment. Let me answer this gentleman first. I will say to the gentleman from Washington I am a Democrat, and therefore believe in local self-government. I believe that colonies are inimical to this country, and if we do not keep them out it will result in destroying this Republic. I feel very strongly on that line. I would take anything I could get, even an intimation, which I think is here, although it is simply a "whereas" and has not very much strength—it is not in the bill—and if my amendment is voted down, I am frank to say that I will vote for the bill. That is my answer to that question.

Now, I was reading these platforms. The Democratic platform of 1908 says:

> We favor an immediate declaration of the Nation's purpose to recognize the independence of the Philippine Islands as soon as a stable government can be established, such independence to be guaranteed by us as we guarantee the independence of Cuba until the neutralization of the islands can be secured by treaty with other powers. In recognizing the independence of the Philippines our Government should retain such land as may be necessary for coaling stations and naval bases.

That was in the Democratic platform of 1908, and was the first reference to neutralization by treaty. My resolution was introduced four years before. The Democratic platform of 1912 says:

> We favor an immediate declaration of the Nation's purpose to recognize the independence of the Philippine Islands as soon as a stable government can be established, such independence to be guaranteed by us until the neutralization of the islands can be secured by treaty with other powers.

Now, I think it was drawn hastily. It was over at the Baltimore convention. I think my resolution is substantially in accord with that resolution, with that plank in the platform. What does it propose? It proposes to the Philippines, "Here is your chance to get independence. We will try to negotiate a treaty, and if that is negotiated all your troubles will disappear as if by magic." You know and I know that the Filipino people will be more capable of maintaining a separate government when protected by a treaty of neutralization than it would otherwise, and that is the first step, in my judgment, that ought to be taken in any party action. We ought to provide for the neutralization by treaty of the islands. It is all well enough to talk about independence. It is all well enough to preach about the glories of the freeman, and so forth; but how are you going to give them independence? That is the question, and my resolution strikes at the heart of the matter. I submit it to every honest, thoughtful man. It is the best solution I can think of or that perhaps you can think of. If you have a better one, I am ready to accept it.

Mr. FALCONER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURGESS. Yes.

Mr. FALCONER. You just remarked that your resolution conformed to the intention of the plank of the Democratic platform. I would like to ask the gentleman if this bill also conforms to the platform?

Mr. BURGESS. As far as it goes, it does. But there is nothing in this bill as it is presented to you about neutralizing the islands.

Mr. GILLETT. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BURGESS. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. I understand that your amendment suggests that we should give them independence when they are fitted for it. Does the gentleman think that will be in the immediate future?

Mr. BURGESS. I think so. In other words, that is my idea.

Mr. GILLETT. Will you fix the date at which you think they will be fitted for it?

Mr. BURGESS. That is simply my idea. If we can negotiate a treaty of neutrality, I think that will prove an immense impetus toward freedom for the Filipinos.

I think they will be ready to take on a government of their own and run it much quicker in that way than in any other way, and I think if they go on progressing as they have been doing for the past 14 years it will not be more than 10 or 15 years before they can be given absolute independence, predicated on a neutral treaty. That is my view of it.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. BURGESS. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Does not the gentleman think it would be a very great mistake to give the Filipino people their independence without having such treaties as the gentleman mentions in his resolution previously entered into?

Mr. BURGESS. I do.

Mr. McKENZIE. And does not the gentleman believe that he has his proposition reversed? Ought we not first to have the treaties and then independence, rather than independence and the treaties later?

Mr. BURGESS. If the gentleman will notice my resolution, he will see that it says that it is the purpose of the United States to cease exercising sovereignty in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. MOORE. But it does not indicate that that time has now arrived?

Mr. BURGESS. No; it does not; nor does any other platform.

Mr. MOORE. Suppose, then, as some of us fear, that the impression should go abroad in the Philippine Islands that we have granted them independence by the passage of this bill, and one island should bear upon another island, or a more powerful people should fall upon a weaker people. The gentleman would still have a saving clause in his resolution by exercising a protectorate over the archipelago?

Mr. BURGESS. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. In other words, the gentleman would prevent the islands from running amuck in the event of independence being granted to them at any time?

Mr. BURGESS. Yes.

Now, Mr. Chairman, referring to the speech I made in 1906, I want to recite a passage to show that my resolution is in accord with precedents. I read:

> On February 28, 1823, the House passed by an aye-and-no vote of 131 ayes to 9 noes the following resolution:
> "Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to enter upon and prosecute from time to time such negotiations with the Federal maritime powers of Europe and America as he may deem expedient for the effectual abolition of the African slave trade and its ultimate denunciation as piracy under the laws of nations by the consent of the civilized world."
> This resolution was offered in the House by Mr. Mercer, of Virginia. An examination of the debate in the House not only shows no objection to the method by any Member of the House, but a general recognition of the duty of Congress to declare the will of the people for the guidance of the Executive is observed in all the discussions, Mr. Wright, of Maryland, voicing that idea in these words:
> "Sir, this Congress ought to take upon themselves the responsibility of this measure by their positive opinion and leave it no longer a subject of doubt what is the will of the American people."
> On December 23, 1823, Mr. Livingston, of Louisiana, offered the House a resolution that—
> "The President of the United States be requested to negotiate with the Government of Great Britain for the cession of so much land on the island of Abaco as may be necessary for the erection of lighthouses, etc."
> This was adopted without debate or objection. Henry Clay was Speaker; Daniel Webster and many great names in our history were Members. On May 16, 1826, on motion of Mr. Livingston, a resolution was agreed to that—
> "The President of the United States be requested to inform this House whether any arrangement had been made with the Government of Great Britain in consequence of the resolution of this House of the 23d of December, 1823."
> Verily, in those days the House asserted itself. In his message of December 3, 1833, President Jackson says:
> "I have the satisfaction to inform you that a negotiation which, by desire of the House of Representatives, was opened some years ago with the British Government for the erection of lighthouses on the Bahamas has been successful."

And then follows a whole lot more.

Now, that is all I have to say. I believe that this resolution, if put in the form of a law, will bind the American people; that is, the form in which I offer it as an amendment. It has two advantages over the preamble. In the first place, it is not a preamble, but in the body of the law it is substantive law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman desire more time?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentelman from Texas have two minutes in which to finish his statement.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CLINE). The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS] may proceed for two minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURGESS. Second, it provides for neutralization in accord with the platform, in accord with the theory of turning the Philippines loose, free.

Now, I submit, this question must come up. Of course if a man takes the view that my friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] does—and I know he takes it honestly—he will vote against anything that looks to Philippine independence. But, on the other hand, the man who believes that the Filipinos ought to be granted their independence ought to vote for the most sensible thing to give it to them. That is the difference; and if this resolution is in line with your thought and commends itself to your judgment, I hope you will adopt it. I will follow, if it is adopted, by a motion to strike out the preamble. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I am well aware of the great thought which my friend from Texas [Mr. BURGESS] has given to this question. The amendment which he offers is an exact copy of a resolution introduced by him in 1904 originally and which has been reintroduced at each succeeding Congress and has been before the Committee on Insular Affairs ever since I have been a member of the committee. I am in a large measure in sympathy with part of the sentiment of the resolution; but I respectfully submit to the membership of the House that it has no place at this point or at any other point in this bill. This bill which we are now considering—not the preamble—is an affirmative declaration of positive law, providing for an enlargement of the power of the people of the Philippine Islands in the government there and has no reference, so far as the bill is concerned, to the foreign relations of this Government and other Governments as regards the Philippine Islands or any other territory in the world. This proposition of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS] is to take a joint resolution simply requesting the President to do a thing which he already has the authority to do without the legislation and putting it into the vital part of an organic act dealing with the government of those people by themselves. This resolution undertakes to deal with foreign relations of the United States. The bill simply provides for the government of the Philippine people.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman states that the bill is merely an organic act providing for the government of the Philippines; but has the gentleman noticed the title to the bill, which reads:

A bill to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes; that has reference to the preamble. I am speaking now of the bill itself.

Mr. BRYAN. Then, the title given here does not refer to the bill, but to the preamble, which is not a part of the bill?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The title refers both to the preamble and the bill.

Mr. BRYAN. But still the preamble is not a part of the bill. This amendment, fixing the political status of the Philippines, would come under the title of the act, would it not?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The Chair has already held that it is germane. I am not making any question about that. I am simply saying that it is out of line with the theory on which the bill is drawn, entirely. I am speaking now of the bill, not the preamble. The bill provides for the enlargement of the Government of the Philippine people by themselves. The resolution which the gentleman offers as an amendment provides for dealing with international relations by the United States.

Mr. BRYAN. Then does it not follow that if this amendment is not proper after this title, the preamble is out of place after the title?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not think so; and when the time comes I shall discuss the preamble. I do not care to enter into a discussion of it now. If this matter was standing here alone, if this were offered as a substitute for the bill, I do not mean to say I would favor it now in either respect, but there would at least be some logic in that. But to offer it as a vital part of the law which is being enacted is improper. It has no place in this bill. So far as practical action may come in the future, if this bill shall be enacted, when the time comes the President of the United States can, without any act of Congress, open negotiations looking to neutralization; or if that should not be done by the President, and the Congress should in the future deem it wise that that should be done, it could easily pass a resolution suggesting that course to the President; but certainly the gentleman would not desire to place in the legislative part of the bill a proposition dealing with international relations.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] begins I would like to have leave to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If my time has not expired.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the gentleman's time will be extended two minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why is not this Burgess resolution just as pertinent to this bill as the preamble which is on it now?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, if it were in proper form offered as an amendment to the preamble, I would not undertake to say that it was not pertinent to that, although it contains a direction, while the preamble only conains a recitation; but it is offered as an independent section, section 1½, to the legislative part of the bill. You do not want to say by an enactment of law that it is the preference of the United States to do so and so.

Mr. BURGESS. Why not?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. You do not pass a law to say that. That applies to resolutions, not to legislation.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the gentleman will permit, of course I do not know the exact processes of the mind of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS], although I am remarkably well acquainted with him; but I take it that the reason he offered his resolution as section 1½ to this bill is that under parliamentary practice we do not get to the preamble until we get through with the bill. My own judgment about it is that as a parliamentary proposition it would come in as a substitute for the preamble; but it would be like locking the barn door after the horse is gone; and the gentleman has given notice that he proposes to strike out the preamble if his amendment goes in. So that it is practically offered as a substitute for the preamble.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Of course I take it that the House would not desire—certainly this side of the House would not desire—to strike out the preamble to this bill, even if this were inserted. I have not taken that up, because I though it would be proper to take that up later. Let it be borne in mind that this amendment, however, contains a direction; the preamble to the bill is merely recitative.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. As far as the preamble goes, it looks in the same direction that the resolution of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS] looks.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Precisely; that is true; and the only thought that is in the resolution that is not in the preamble is this suggestion of neutralization; and in view of the fact that we are not now fixing any date, there will be abundant time later, under better conditions of world-wide interest, for the question of neutralization to be taken up and considered.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do.

Mr. McKELLAR. If this Congress sees fit to pass a resolution on this subject, why is not this Congress just as competent to pass upon the question as any future Congress at some future time?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Well, Mr. Chairman, I certainly would not reflect upon the competency of this Congress——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Tennessee be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks that the time of the gentleman from Tennessee be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, in answer to my colleague, I will say that the committee has prepared this bill in the light of existing conditions. The question of neutralization belongs to the treaty-making power of the Government. It is within the authority of Congress, and it is no violation of the proprieties for the Congress to pass a resolution requesting or suggesting to the executive powers the idea of entering into negotiations looking toward neutralization. But upon the theory upon which this bill is drawn and because there is no fixed date, why the necessity of taking up the question of neutralization and enacting it into legislation under the world-wide conditions which now exist?

Mr. BURGESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. With pleasure.

Mr. BURGESS. In both the Democratic national platforms there is a demand for neutralization, and without any time limit.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes, that is true; I am familiar with that fact. But I repeat again, because I hope the House will get clearly the thought I have in mind about this, that most assuredly the House will not desire to put into the legislative part of this bill, simply creating an organic law for the Philippine Islands, a proposition that deals with the international relations on the part of the Government of the United States.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will yield.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think it is more important in dealing with the Filipinos to consider form than substance?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is an abstract matter.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says, as a matter of form, it ought not to go in; as a matter of substance, we might put in anything. I want to ask the gentleman which is the more important, to preserve the form or miss the substance?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman asks an abstract question. I have stated my position as clearly as I could state it. I think the gentleman from Illinois would agree with me in the proposition if he had not something else on his mind.

Mr. MANN. I have so often been taken to task myself for endeavoring to preserve form as well as substance, and the gentleman's arguments seem to be directed toward the form, that I wanted to know whether he thought the form should be maintained at the sacrifice of substance.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I have never taken the gentleman from Illinois to task for that.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. STEENERSON. I would like to have the gentleman tell us where in the preamble there is any declaration of policy or intention of the United States as to the Philippines. The title says:

> To declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands.

The first and second clauses of the preamble relate to the past intentions of the United States, and the third clause simple says that it is desirable for the speedy accomplishment of that purpose to give the Philippines such control of local affairs as is not inconsistent with our sovereignty. There is no positive declaration in the preamble as to the intention of the United States as to the future of the Philippines. Why is it left to inference?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I am not discussing the preamble; I was discussing the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. STEENERSON. I would like an answer from the gentleman.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I was not discussing the preamble. The gentleman possibly was not in the Hall at the time the preamble was passed over for consideration at the end of the bill.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to present to the committee more fully the thought that I presented a while ago. The Philippine Islands are not sovereign. They are a dependency of the United States. They are not a nation among nations. For the like reason that an infant can not make a valid contract a people that do not constitute a sovereignty in themselves, that have no power to act for themselves in their own interest or in their own behalf, can not enter into a compact or a treaty.

The amendment presented by the gentleman from Texas predicates the sovereignty of the Philippines, and necessarily is the sequence of a treaty assented to by the Philippines. I ask the gentleman from Texas if the Philippine Islands could to-day make a treaty?

Mr. BURGESS. That is altogether beside the issue.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman answer that question yes or no?

Mr. BURGESS. I want to ask the gentleman from Kentucky a question.

Mr. HELM. Can the Philippine Islands enter into a valid treaty?

Mr. BURGESS. No. Now will the gentleman answer my question? Can not all other countries enter into an agreement to neutralize the Philippine Islands?

Mr. HELM. My position is that they can not; and I will explain why they can not. Such an amendment as is offered by the gentleman from Texas presents and carries with it the idea of the capacity of the Philippines to enter into a treaty. Now, where the committee is liable to be led into an error is this: Neutrality is an act voluntarily entered into on the part of those authorized to act for the territory that is proposed to be neutralized. The United States is a sovereignty; and the Congress of the United States is authorized and can act for it through its treaty-making power under its Constitution. It can enforce its contracts or treaties with other nations. The Constitution of the United States is not in force in the Philippines. It is the one place where the Constitution does not follow the flag. On the other hand, the Philippines have a law-making body of their own, but with limited power. Nations that possess the power—the might—to make another territory do its will, do it by force, and neutralization by force is unthinkable and impossible. But when you come to enter into such an arrangement as the amendment of the gentleman from Texas proposes, it presupposes a condition or state on the part of the Philippine Archipelago as a sovereignty to agree to it or else it is not neutralized. If they can not make or agree to a treaty of neutralization and consent to it, they can not ratify it; and how can they ratify it unless they are a sovereign nation? Therefore I say that the resolution of the gentleman from Texas at this time is not in order.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HELM. Yes.

Mr. QUIN. How can you make them sovereign so that they would have the power?

Mr. HELM. Whenever the United States, which holds and exercises sovereignty over the Philippine Islands, declares them free and independent as a sovereignty, then they are in position to enter into a treaty of neutralization. I challenge any Member on this floor to cite me to the country that has been neutralized which was not at the time of that act sovereign in itself.

Mr. FALCONER. How does a Territory come into the Union?

Mr. HELM. By act of Congress.

Mr. DAVENPORT. And the Congress creates it a sovereignty.

Mr. HELM. It is as simple as A, B, C. Let the gentleman rise on the floor and tell me what country, what territory, was ever neutralized that at the time of its neutralization was not in itself a sovereign entity?

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HELM. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Does not this resolution undertake to do two things at once?

Mr. HELM. It is not a question of what it undertakes to do, but what the Filipinos have the right to do. How can you make a valid contract with a party who is not competent to make the contract?

Mr. FESS. I think the gentleman should wait until I ask the question before he attempts to answer it. This resolution looks to the sovereignty and neutralization of the islands at the same time, does it not?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. It occurs to me that this amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS] is a wise provision, if anything like this is to be the policy of the Government.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY. No; I have not the time. Divine providence has given to every nation and every people enough intelligence to govern itself, although often few of the members of a particular nation or people are capable of self-government. Only in this sense are the Philippines capable of self-government, and only in that sense would one of the Southern States, where there is a majority of negro population, if every male person were permitted to vote and have his vote honestly counted, be capable of self-government. [Applause.] The Philippine Islands will be capable of self-government with the restrictions placed on suffrage by this bill, which provides, first, those who hold office; second, those who are educated; and, third, those who have property. That is confined alone to the Filipino proper, and I think in this the committee was wise. Certainly in all ages and in every government history discloses the necessity of limitation upon suffrage, just as it has been done in the South, and as this bill proposes for the Philippines; and as the population grows denser and social evils more threatening the greater that necessity. So the committee was wise in this particular. But let us see where we are drifting. I want to say that I heard with great pleasure and profit the speech made yesterday by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and if I had not been surprised heretofore at the gentleman's learning I would have thought that he got that speech from one that I put into the RECORD on "Mexico and Asiatic menace." [Laughter.] Certainly it is far wiser either to hold to the Philippines or to give them unrestricted independence. Believing that the Filipinos are not capable of self-government, in the sense that all of them can exercise the ballot, or any great number of them, I see no strength, military or otherwise, in holding the Philippines. Besides, blood is thicker than water, and in the economic struggle to come, with the military struggle that is surely to follow in the awakening of the Asiatic nations, we are not going to have them as our allies. Therefore we ought not to be committed to the policy of giving them independence and defending them without some provision like this amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY. I have not the time. If we "neutralize" that territory by a compact with other nations, it relieves us from such responsibility, and I repeat again, that we ought not to be compelled to exercise a Monroe doctrine over the Philippine Islands. Men may profess faith in the people of those islands to govern themselves. Why, gentlemen seem to forget that as between the Philippine Commissioner on this floor, who is an intelligent man, and the Negritos, the tree dwellers, the head-hunters, and those who live now in a nude condition there is no comparison. Why this Government was compelled to take steps to prevent the Christian Filipinos from robbing the non-Christian Filipinos; and when you find, as you do there, a population of the negro race far below the intellectual possibilities, to say nothing of the physical capabilities, of the negro of the South, you can never hope to make of them a self-sustaining, self-governing population; and I am surprised at any Democrat who would advocate such a policy, especially if he be from the South, where we have disqualified the negro with the grandfather clause. Then, the head-hunters and that class on the other islands will in the end prove to be the prey of the more intelligent ones. I repeat again, certainly the Philippine Islands are capable of self-government if only the intelligent class rules, as is provided for in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURRAY. We have a representative of that class on the floor of this House, but he could not claim to be a fair, low-average representative of the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands. He is even among the shrewdest of the wisest tribe, one of the philosophers, sir, of that island, and under this bill they will, as they ought, control the islands. But we certainly ought to take one or the other of two positions, either that we will keep the Philippines or that we will turn them loose by such method as will not compel us to defend them, because as sure as fate, the economic struggle between the white race on this continent and the Asiatic races will follow in the awakening of that great giant, China, of whom Napolean said years ago, "Let him sleep; do not wake him." But, Mr. Chairman, we have wakened him, and with the awakening he will demand economic advantages and put us to our mettle.

History discloses that the great wars of the world have been fought for the most part either over race supremacy or an economic struggle, which is the basis of the gigantic struggle now going on in Europe, and you have a combination of race and economic necessity of the Asiatics pitted against us; and when that time comes, unless we hold the Filipinos in absolute subjection, they will be against us, and if we turn them loose, with the Monroe doctrine over them, they will immediately begin treaty making with Japan and other nations to which they are closely allied that will involve us in a war which the shrewdness of Japanese statesmen would seek to bring upon us through the Filipinos.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MURRAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Do I understand that the gentleman would make the question of withdrawing sovereignty over the Filipinos by the United States depend upon the ability of the United States to negotiate treaties of neutralization with all the great powers of the world?

Mr. MURRAY. No; but I would try that first. Personally, if the gentleman desires my view, I would try that plan, and if we get that plan we will certainly have the open-door policy in the Philippines. That would certainly make it neutral territory. Having failed, I would turn them loose, sell them, and endeavor to get rid of them forever, that we may never be called upon to engage in a war to protect their independence.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I want to ask this additional question, if the gentleman will permit.

Mr. MURRAY. Very well.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman does not understand that there is anything whatever in this bill as reported from the committee which in any way commits this Government to the extension of the so-called Monroe doctrine over the Philippine Islands?

Mr. MURRAY. It does in the preamble, coupled with the policy declared in the preamble; with the power of local self-government in the second preamble it certainly does.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. After independence is granted and all sovereignty withdrawn?

Mr. MURRAY. It certainly does. If you refer to the second preamble, it says it was not our intention to withdraw that sovereignty.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It says it has been the purpose of the United States to withdraw their sovereignty over the Philippine Islands and recognize their independence as soon as a stable government can be established therein.

Mr. MURRAY. Then would it not be wiser to get a "neutralization" of the territory through the other great nations than to turn it loose?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Oh, that may be; I am not able to——

Mr. MURRAY. Does the gentleman for a moment believe——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. But the power exists already. The gentleman surely does not understand that the adoption of this amendment proposed by the gentleman from Texas virtually destroys the integrity of this bill.

Mr. MURRAY. Why, certainly it does not.

Mr. GORDON. That is the reason the Republicans are for it; that is plain enough.

Mr. MURRAY. Well, sometimes Republicans can be right and sometimes Democrats are wrong. [Applause on the Republican side.] I want to say there are Democrats for this the same as there are Republicans for this, and it certainly ought to be good Democratic doctrine, because it is in line with our party's declaration.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I would be just as much opposed as the gentleman from Oklahoma can possibly be to any bill granting to the Filipinos immediate independence, or independence at any time in the future, which would not free the United States from all responsibility on their account forever thereafter. The gentleman is entirely mistaken if he thinks that this bill contemplates the assumption by the United States of any responsibility for the Philippines after they are given independence. This bill proposes to give to the Filipinos their independence when a stable government has been established by them. When such a government has been established and they are given independence the United States is to withdraw from the islands for all time. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not think gentlemen understand the situation. During the Sixty-second Congress a bill was reported from the Committee on Insular Affairs which provided that the Filipinos should be given their independence upon a certain definite date fixed in that bill. There accompanied that bill a resolution which was introduced by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], and which was also reported to this House, requesting the President to endeavor to secure for the Philippines a neutralization agreement.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That resolution was substantially the resolution of the gentleman.

Mr. JONES. Substantially the resolution of the gentleman, and I may say that it is the purpose of the Committee on Insular Affairs to report that, or some similar resolution, to this House so soon as it seems feasible to do so. It will embody the idea contained in the Burgess resolution. As this bill fixes no date upon which the Filipinos shall be given their independence, the committee did not believe that it was expedient to report such a resolution at this time. In the first place, owing to the greatly disturbed conditions of Europe, it would not be possible to secure consideration for any neutralization agreement at this time.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not think that the Members of the House realize the true character of this resolution. If they do, I feel sure they will not vote for it. I do not believe that any gentleman on this side understanding it will vote for it, nor do I believe that any gentleman on that side will support it if he realizes what is in it. Do you realize, gentlemen, that this resolution provides that upon its adoption the Philippine Islands shall become neutral territory? That is, whether this neutralization proposition materializes or not, the Philippine Islands are to become neutral territory upon the adoption of the resolution which the gentleman from Texas proposes.

Mr. BURGESS. Just a moment; the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. JONES. I think I am not mistaken.

Mr. BURGESS. Oh, yes.

Mr. JONES. I will read the exact language of the resolution.

Mr. BURGESS. Read it.

Mr. JONES. "That upon the establishment of such independent Philippine government"——

Mr. BURGESS. Go back and read——

Mr. JONES (continuing). "The Philippine Islands shall be neutral territory." The establishment of the independent government is to follow the neutralization for which the gentleman's resolution provides.

Mr. BURGESS. Just a moment. I know the gentleman does not want to misrepresent me.

Mr. JONES. I certainly do not.

Mr. BURGESS. And I know he is doing it. The resolution provides for the negotiation of a treaty by which certain things are to be done.

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. BURGESS. And has reference back to that part. It does not mean to declare that it shall be neutral. The gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Mr. JONES. Let me read the resolution. It speaks for itself. It says:

That in pursuance of such purpose and preference the President is respectfully requested to consider the expediency of opening negotiations with the Governments of Great Britain, Germany—

And so forth. The President is "respectfully requested to consider the expediency" of it. He is not directed to do so at all, although if this amendment shall become a part of this bill it will be an enactment of law. He is merely requested to consider the expediency of opening such negotiations——

Mr. BURGESS. That is the language of all such resolutions.

Mr. JONES (continuing)—

With the view of effecting a joint treaty with such Governments, by which it shall be provided that an independent government in the Philippine Islands, when established by the United States—

That is, established at some future time—shall be recognized and preserved.

But it adds——

Mr. BURGESS. There is no "but" there.

Mr. JONES (continuing). That this proposed independent government of the Philippine Islands shall be neutral territory.

There is no other construction to be placed upon it. Now, Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Insular Affairs has always realized that these two propositions should be embodied in two different measures. The President should not be directed in a bill to endeavor to secure the neutralization of the Philippines, but requested in a joint resolution to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] has expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, may I have five minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES. I think that nobody on that side of the House can favor this proposition. This belief is founded upon the fact that it is a more radical proposition, according to its author, than that embodied in the preamble to this bill. The gentleman from Texas has frankly told the House that if he can not get his more radical proposition he will support the less radical one embodied in the preamble to the bill. He thinks the Filipinos would secure their independence sooner under his resolution. I think nobody on this side of the House will want to emasculate this bill in the way proposed by the gentleman from Texas.

As my colleague, Mr. GARRETT, has said, the Committee on Insular Affairs has given a great deal of consideration to this measure. It has certainly given a great deal of consideration to the preamble. It has always favored the presentation to this House of a resolution requesting the President to negotiate a treaty of neutrality with reference to the Philippine Islands if it was possible to do so. But the committee has not reported that resolution to this House as yet, because it did not deem that there was any pressing necessity for it. The committee believes that that resolution can be presented, and it hopes there will be little or no opposition to its passage after this bill has been disposed of. The bill provides for no definite date for independence. Everybody must acknowledge that under the provisions of this bill independence can not take place until the Filipinos have demonstrated their capacity for self-government and until the Congress of the United States, recognizing that fact, passes another measure giving them their independence. When that time comes or when it approaches it is the intention of the Committee on Insular Affairs to report a resolution of neutrality embodying substantially what is in this resolution. I hope that no gentleman who believes in proceeding decently and in order in this legislation will vote for the resolution.

It is suggested by somebody on this side that the Republicans will vote for it simply in order to make the bill appear preposterous. He may be right; but I shall not believe it until gentlemen on that side, who have expressed so much opposition to the preamble to the bill, go on record as voting for a resolution which, according to its author, goes a bowshot further in the direction of early independence than does the preamble itself.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, the pending measure has a preamble followed by an enacting clause, and this enacting clause is followed by the several sections of the bill which it is proposed to enact into law. Every law passed by the Congress of the United States contains an enacting clause in these words:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That—

and whatever follows that enacting clause is supposed to be the law. Of course, lawyers and laymen know that the ordinary definition of a law is that it is a rule of action. A law commands, or prohibits, or authorizes, or directs. But here it is proposed to put after the enacting clause these words:

The President is respectfully requested to consider the expediency of opening negotiations, etc.

So that if Congress should adopt the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Texas and then enact the bill into law it would read like this:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President is respectfully requested to consider the expediency of opening negotiations—

Now, in my judgment, it would not look at all well for Congress to "enact"—that is, to make a law—"That the President is requested to consider the advisability" of doing something or other.

Regardless of what I might think of the wisdom or policy of ultimately passing a resolution containing the substance of the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Texas, I would not cast my vote in favor of inserting the language I have quoted after the enacting clause of a bill.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, this amendment and debate is important not only for the intrinsic merit—and there is some intrinsic merit in the resolution, or proposed amendment, I am sure all of us agree—but it is more important than all because of the fact that it tears from this bill its mask of pretense and false witness.

In the very title of the bill we have this unusual phrase, "A bill to declare," and so forth. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], in his learned way, preceding me, said that everything after the word "That," after the enacting clause, is a part of a bill; and accordingly we have bills "to provide" and bills "to enact," but it is unusual for us to have a bill "to declare." The title of the bill, in part, reads:

To declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands.

I say that statement is false witness and does not state the purpose of the bill. When that provision is put into the title there is deception practiced; there is an attempt to fool somebody.

There can not be any possible legitimate and honest excuse for putting those words into the title unless you do really want to declare the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands. And if you do want to declare the status of the people of the Philippine Islands, according to the title itself, you ought to take up this amendment and consider it on its merits, and, if it is not in the proper form, change the form, and declare the status according to your convictions.

The suggestion was made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] that the proposed amendment would destroy the integrity of the bill. I do not think it would destroy the integrity of the bill; but I think the debate on this amendment does disclose and does enable us to put our finger on the portion of the bill which is pretense, which is not sincerely written, and which bears false witness.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Washington yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. BRYAN. I regret I have not the time now. I have only a short time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] said that he might vote for this if it was made an amendment to the preamble. I see he dissents, but he said he would be willing, perhaps, to consider it. He did not commit himself. But he said if it were in order, or if it were proper anywhere, it would be in connection with the preamble. It is understood that the preamble is no part of the bill, and if you put this proviso or this amendment establishing the status of the Philippine Islands anywhere in the bill it must be only in that portion of the bill which is not a part of the bill.

Why go on with that pretense? Why not amend the title by striking out the totally false portion which I have quoted, so that it will read "A bill to provide a more autonomous form of government for the Philippine Islands"? That would be honest and make it accord with your declaration. You say it is an organic act. You say it is to enable them to govern themselves internally. You say it is not designed to establish the political status of the islands. You say that that is not the purpose of the bill. Then why include it falsely in the title? You can not fool yourselves. Do you suppose you can fool the American people? You may fool the Filipino for a while, but not for long. You pass this farce of a title and preamble to this bill to-day and they will want their "complete independence" to-morrow. Why indulge in this pretense? Why put this preamble into the statutes and into the history of our dealings with these people to stare us in the face for all time to come in handling those islands and to more or less interfere with our proceedings over there, and console yourselves with the sweet unction that not a word of it is binding or has any meaning, but that it is mere rubbish, surplusage, sop?

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Washington yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. BRYAN. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. I want to know if the gentleman is in favor of the permanent retention of the islands?

Mr. BRYAN. I am in favor of the retention of the islands, surely until we can have at least such an assurance or agreement as to international neutralization as is suggested by the amendment; and I believe that that time is so far removed in the future that no human being can see it, no person can discern it, no person can forecast the time when we can make such an agreement as that. The burden we have upon our shoulders in connection with the Philippine Islands involves particularly the warlike nation near to the Philippine Islands, and particularly the future relations of Japan and the United States. Why were all those 16 battleships sent around the world? Were they sent around to Japan merely to say "How do you do"? Were they sent around there in pure frolic or sheer folly? No. They were sent around the world because there was a great emergency on, a great and dire necessity for us to do that particular thing; the genius of statesmanship was demanded, and the man on the job was equal to the occasion. Anyone who does not realize that a threat and a menace is gathering upon the horizon of the Pacific fails to see what is there; having eyes, he refuses to see, he declines to look at the facts of the case.

If Japan ever attacks us, they will strike the Philippines first. Who is silly enough to believe all the great powers will ever agree to help us defend the Philippines against Japan through somebody's dream of international neutrality? Why would any great power agree to send its warships to shoot Japan out of the water if that nation should violate the territorial integrity of the Philippine Islands? It is none of their quarrel or responsibility. Russia tried that once. England is Japan's ally. Germany has wanted the islands herself, and France would laugh at the proposition.

There has never yet been submitted a proposition like the one set forth in this preamble, which winds up with the proposition "complete independence." None of the party platforms have provided for complete independence. They provide for independence with a string to it.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] said that he stood against ever granting them independence. The American people may not be quite ready to swallow that in its entirety and to agree with him that we will never grant them independence, but the American people will approve the statement that we will never give the Philippine Islands "complete independence"; that we will never put ourselves in a position where we will either abandon our moral obligations or let loose the hold that we have there for commercial and other purposes in that great Pacific Ocean. I believe that instead of indulging in vain preambles like this, which are purely rubbish, fake, and pretense, we ought to do everything possible to establish a firm hold on the Philippines and to fortify them against attack with all the ingenuity known to man.

You Democrats who have met some of these problems in the South; you Democrats, who are just as patriotic, of course, as the rest of us, would not turn the Philippines loose for a minute and would not stand for an instant for the policy of bringing upon us the things that would be brought down upon us by the unqualified independence of the Philippine Islands. I think that instead of indulging in this preamble to a bill—just think how silly it is—you ought to let it be known that it is our intention to establish a firm hold out there and not abandon the means that are necessary for a truly stable government in the Philippines and in our island possessions in that greatest of all the oceans. The people of the Pacific coast have the right to expect it. They have the right to demand it.

When Robert Gray, before the National Constitution was adopted——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. BRYAN. Let me have two minutes more, please.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a question if he gets it?

Mr. BRYAN. Yes; I will yield gladly.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I will ask the gentleman if he is in favor of unrestricted immigration from the Philippine Islands to the Pacific Coast States?

Mr. BRYAN. Of course I am not.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Then you would have people tied to us politically without their having the privilege of coming into this country?

Mr. BRYAN. Does the gentleman from Texas favor unrestricted immigration from Haiti?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I do not. I am asking the gentleman a question.

Mr. BRYAN. We do not favor unrestricted immigration from Porto Rico or from Cuba or from any of those places. But when Robert Gray cruised in the Pacific Ocean and established a title to the Oregon country he made it necessary that the United States—that the Government of the United States—take part in the development of the Pacific Ocean. He and his colaborers gave to us a Pacific Ocean destiny by giving us the Oregon country by right of discovery long before the Louisiana Purchase; and, as has already been shown, our islands and possessions are situated there in such a way that we have got to hold on, and hold on strongly. They extend in every direction; they are everywhere in the Pacific. There is no sense in talking about moving our boundary in a little bit and thinking that will give us safety. If we give away the Philippines, then Guam and Tutuila and Wake, then next we will be asked to give away the Hawaiian Islands, and then the Aleutian Islands and Alaska, and foreign nations will then own them all, and we will get into our shell and be safe. Any such policy as that is ridiculous. What will become of the statesmanship and the accomplishments of our fathers. I say we ought to put our battleships into the Pacific Ocean and hold our coasts and our boundaries and our island dependencies, and go forward with a firm hand for the commercial advancement of the country, and the necessary economic conditions ought to be considered.

Instead of passing useless preambles of this kind, which mean nothing in fact, but which will disturb our relations and encourage the Manila politicians to intrigue and revolution and make the nations of the world spurn us as unfit for our duty, let us go forward, giving to these people the same kind of freedom we have been giving them, in greater and greater portions, and let them know that they are not fit for self-government till they learn to love the Stars and Stripes, and then they can have all the self-government that any true American wants. [Applause.]

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Chairman, upon the declaration of war between the United States and Spain it was declared that that war was not waged for territorial aggrandizement or commercial advantage. The speech made by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] seems to suggest a different thought. But I do not wish to discuss this question now. I rise only for the purpose of making a statement in reference to a remark made a moment ago by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY] and another of similar character made yesterday by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. These gentlemen said that no proposal to grant independence to the Philippines with the protection of the United States should be considered. I wish to say that I do not know of anybody who is proposing it. This bill does not propose or contemplate it, the Filipino people are not asking for it, and, so far as I can gather from my acquaintance with the membership of this House, there is not one on either side of the aisle who believes in it. The Filipino people do not ask for independence with the protection of the United States, because that would not be independence. When we ask for independence, we mean that when you are ready to grant us independence we want you to grant us complete, absolute, unrestricted independence, without taking any responsibility upon yourselves, and therefore without power or control of any kind over us. When you give us independence we shall expect to take the full responsibility for our domestic as well as foreign affairs. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I shall not waste much time in a discussion as to whether this proposal should have been considered in connection with the preamble or with the body of the bill—though it is clear to my mind that it ought not to have been offered at this point in the bill—for I want to discuss its merits.

Let no man think that a treaty neutralizing the Philippines would be a medium for relieving the United States of America from responsibility touching those islands. [Applause.] If you want to get free of any responsibility for the Philippines, then you must turn them loose, without regard to whether other nations will respect their independence or not. Why, you have to look behind you no longer than a little over 30 days to realize that one of the great nations of the earth claimed as a justification for its participation in the European war its obligation to uphold a treaty of neutrality that it entered into and which it claimed another nation had wrongfully violated. Does anybody suppose that by undertaking to neutralize the Philippines by an agreement with all the nations of the earth we thereby remove ourselves from all responsibility? Suppose that was done, and after it was done one of the powers party to the agreement chose to disregard it, what position would America be in? It would be in the position either of ignoring its obligations under a solemn treaty or of undertaking a war to enforce the observance of that treaty. Gentlemen, let us not be swept off our feet touching the Philippines. No man here is wise enough to span the future with any legislative enactment that will meet the test of all time. We are going far enough when we carry out our obligations to give to those people opportunity to develop and to show themselves capable in time of taking a place among the nations of the world, without undertaking to say now that we will fix that status before it has arrived and that we will fix the relationship that shall exist between us and them and all other nations.

Mr. BURGESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will yield for a question.

Mr. BURGESS. What about the two Democratic platforms declaring for neutrality?

Mr. SHERLEY. I simply say to you that I am prepared to meet that situation when we get to the point of declaring the independence of the Philippine Islands, and we have not reached that point yet.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; for a question.

Mr. FESS. I agree entirely to what the gentleman from Kentucky has said. But does it not apply to the preamble to this bill?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; I think not, for a very distinct reason. There is an entire difference. We are declaring in the preamble that we propose to travel a certain road, which is the ultimate independence of the Philippine people. If we adopted this proposal we would be declaring that we are now asking that there be a neutralization under certain conditions as to trade and otherwise; and I for one am not prepared to say that I now favor that, or that I would favor it in the future. [Applause.] I am not willing to cross that bridge until I get to it in the process of time. The proposal does not pertain to the matter that is before us. For instance, you state in this proposal that the treaty that shall be entered into for Philippine neutrality shall provide for equality of treatment of all the world. It is quite possible, and it would be showing no more than a certain degree of gratitude if, when the time comes for the Philippines to take their place among the nations of the world, there should be a preferential relationship between the Philippine Islands and the United States of America. [Applause.] Are we prepared now to say that we propose to put that from us, no matter what the condition may be that confronts us at that day? What you are asked to do now is to anticipate the future. Why, if I favored the proposition of the gentleman, I would not and could not favor the bill that is before this House. In that case I would believe that the Philippines had reached a point in the world's history to warrant their taking a place as a nation, and I would propose that, and not simply propose to continue the relationship between that country and the United States of America. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, to me it would not be important whether this amendment were to be inserted in the bill after the word "enacted" or agreed to in a joint resolution after the word "resolved," because in the eye of the law the two words mean the same thing.

If it is the purpose of the majority side of the House at this time to remember their party platform, which they usually forget when brought to a crisis, they will vote for the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS], because they have frequently declared in favor of the proposition, not only in their party platforms, but on the stump in campaigns before the people.

And as in my recollection there is no instance since the Democratic majority was in the last House, and is in this one, where they have voted in accordance with any declaration they have made in the party platform, I do not anticipate that they will vary from their consistency in that respect and vote now in favor of a proposition that is in accordance with the party platform. Hence I assume, as usual, they will vote contrary to the party platform, and vote down the proposition offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The whereas to this bill says:

> That it is the purpose of the people of the United States to withdraw their sovereignty over the Philippine Islands, and to recognize their independence as soon as a stable government can be established therein.

Why, there is a stable government established there now. The government there is as stable as it is in the United States, and if perchance the gentleman should say that that means a stable government with Philippine officials, that would not be possible under the terms of this bill, because the Governor General will still be nominated by the President and will be an American citizen. Here is a proposition to do something in the future, when something happens which now exists, if it is possible to exist at all. Either there is a stable government there now, for which we ought to make a declaration of independence of the Philippine Islands, or else there is no possibility of establishing such a government under the terms of the bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. The vice of the gentleman's position is——

Mr. MANN. Oh, I did not yield to the gentleman from Kentucky to tell me what the vice of my position is.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman is so particular as to the form in which the proposition is stated, I do not care to put it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not need to. I did not interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman will find that when he has interrupted me I have yielded to him without question and without undertaking to state the terms upon which I yielded.

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Chairman, I do not take it at all with good grace, coming from the gentleman from Kentucky, after he asked me to yield, to start in by saying that the vice of my position is so and so. The vice of the gentleman's position is that he does not agree with the majority side of the House to which he belongs. He has never agreed with them on the Philippine question, and now they do not agree with the party platform, and no one can tell what they mean. The gentleman from Virginia or no one else over there will undertake to say what they mean, except in glittering generalities, depending upon the distant future. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, the criticism of the gentleman from Illinois touching the meaning of the language contained in the preamble is more apparent than real. The vice—and I use now in my own time the word that seems to have gotten so much on the nerves of the very sensitive leader of the minority—the vice of the gentleman's contention lies in the assumption that the present bill, if it shall be enacted into law, shall be the only enactment touching the Filipino people and the Philippine Islands. The purpose of this bill is to give to the Filipino people a larger control over their affairs, that we may determine their capacity for even a greater control until we reach the point where they can be given complete control. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And it is not inconsistent with such legislation to declare that the ultimate goal at which we aim is Philippine independence. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That is the common sense of the bill. That is the construction that all men seeking to deal with a great question fairly, instead of hunting for an excuse for a grammatical criticism of the bill, would see by even casually reading it.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I would not to-day vote to give to the Philippines immediate, absolute independence. I do not know that 20 years from now I would be prepared to vote to grant them absolute independence. But, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Oklahoma declare in effect that we are never to give freedom to the Filipino people, and that we are forever to retain the Philippine Islands. This has raised an issue never before injected into the politics of this country, an issue of transcendent importance for us thoroughly to understand. In this connection I invite attention to the words of an acknowledged master of constitutional law, Judge Thomas M. Cooley:

> The Territories. The Constitution was made for the States, not for the Territories. It confers power to govern Territories, but in exercising this the United States is a sovereign dealing with dependent territory according as in its wisdom shall seem politic, wise, and just, having regard to its own interests as well as to those of the people of the Territories. * * *
> In this dependence of the Territories upon the Central Government there is some outward resemblance to the condition of the American Colonies under the British Crown; but there are some differences which are important, and indeed vital. The first of these is that the territorial condition is understood under the Constitution to be merely temporary and preparatory, and the people of the Territories while it continues are assured of the right to create and establish State institutions for themselves so soon as the population shall be sufficient and the local conditions suitable, while the British colonial system contained no promise or assurance of any but a dependent government indefinitely.

Observe that last clause—

> the British colonial system contained no promise or assurance of any but a dependent government indefinitely.

Thus, according to this great jurist, our permanent retention of the Philippine Islands would mean our adoption of the British colonial system. And yet we are a republic, and one of the cardinal tenets of our political faith is that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. [Applause.]

I would like to have some gentleman answer that statement of the illustrious Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Michigan that the territorial condition is understood under the Constitution to be merely temporary and preparatory, and that while that condition continues the people of the Territories are assured of statehood when the population shall be sufficient and local conditions suitable.

Mr. Chairman, the Filipino people differ from us in many ways. They are possessed of domestic and personal virtues. They have intellect and conscience. They have made rapid progress in recent years. But they differ from us ethnologically. They are another race, and they are 10,000 miles away, and yet it is said that they must forever remain subject to us. Is that true? Will they ever be admitted to statehood? Are we to adopt the British colonial system?

Mr. Chairman, the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, made in 1848, at the conclusion of the War with Mexico, contained the following provision:

> The Mexicans who, in the territories aforesaid, shall not preserve the character of citizens of the Mexican Republic, conformably with what is stipulated in the preceding article, shall be incorporated into the Union of the United States and be admitted, at the proper time (to be judged of by the Congress of the United States) to the enjoyment of all the rights of citizens of the United States according to the principles of the Constitution; and in the meantime shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty and property, and secured in the free exercise of their religion without restriction.

That was a promise that some time in the future, in the discretion of Congress, they should be made citizens of the United States. Sixty years passed away before Congress thought that New Mexico and Arizona were fitted for statehood. I do not know when Congress will be prepared to say the Filipinos are fitted for independent government, but as an American, the descendant of a soldier of the Revolution, who died of exposure and was buried beneath the snows of Canada, I shall not declare that the Republic established by that revolution is forever to hold in subjugation millions of Filipinos and Malays 10,000 miles from our shores. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MANN and by Mr. BURGESS) there were—ayes 14, noes 58.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

> SEC. 2. That all inhabitants of the Philippine Islands continuing to reside therein who were Spanish subjects on the 11th day of April, 1899, and then resided in said islands, and their children born subsequent thereto, shall be deemed and held to be citizens of the Philippine Islands, except such as shall have elected to preserve their allegiance to the Crown of Spain in accordance with the provisions of the treaty of peace between the United States and Spain, signed at Paris December 10, 1898, and except such others as have since become citizens of some other country: Provided, That the Philippine Legislature, herein provided for, is hereby authorized to provide by law for the acquisition of Philippine citizenship by those natives of the Philippine Islands who do not come within the foregoing provisions, the natives of the insular possessions of the United States, and such other persons residing in the Philippine Islands who are citizens of the United States, or who could become citizens of the United States under the laws of the United States if residing therein.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. My friend the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES], the distinguished chairman of the committee, this morning stated, referring to me:

> At the time that the gentleman made his statement, when he stated that it was historically true, I asked if he could name a single reputable historian who had ever made that charge against Gen. Aguinaldo, and his reply was that he could name one, and that was Dean C. Worcester. Mr. Chairman, I have since that time carefully examined Mr. Worcester's book. I have read every line that is in his book upon that subject, and I can not find a single line or word in that book which justifies the statement made by my friend from California.

On page 22 of volume 1 of Dean C. Worcester's The Philippines, Past and Present, there is a paragraph which refers to some of the controversies between Aguinaldo and some of his people. The gentleman quoted only a portion of that paragraph. If my friend had looked on page 20 of that volume he would have found the following:

> In August, 1896, an insurrection against Spain had broken out in the Philippines under the leadership of Emilio Aguinaldo, a resident of Cavite Viejo, who had been a school-teacher and was at that time gobernadorcillo of his town.
> It had been terminated by the so-called treaty of Biacnabato, signed in Manila on December 15, 1897.
> This document provided for the surrender of Don Emilio Aguinaldo, supreme chief of the insurgents in arms, and Don Marciano Llanera and Don Baldomero Aguinaldo, his subordinates, together with their soldiers and arms.
> "The excellent señor general in chief" of the Spanish forces was to "provide the necessary means of supporting the lives" of those who surrendered before a certain fixed date.
> In actual practice what was done was to agree to pay them $800,000 in three installments, the first of $400,000, the second and third of $200,000 each.
> Aguinaldo and certain other leaders were to take up their residence outside the islands. Their deportation was duly provided for, and Aguinaldo and 26 of his companions were taken to Hongkong on the Spanish steamer Uranus, arriving there on December 31, 1897.
> On January 2, 1898, $400,000 were deposited in the Hongkong Bank to the credit of Aguinaldo & Co.
> The insurgent leaders remaining at Biacnabato had a meeting under the presidency of Isabelo Artacho, an Ilocano, who was the ranking officer in the absence of Aguinaldo, and requested that the second installment of $200,000 be paid to them. The Spanish governor general, Primo de Rivera, acceded to their request, and they divided the money, although Aguinaldo denied their right to do so, claiming that it should have been sent to Hongkong.

On page 24 of the same work is this statement:

> Artacho, who had received ₱5,000 as his share of the second payment, arrived in Hongkong, and on April 5 demanded ₱200,000 of the insurgent funds, probably under the agreement that he should establish a company in Hongkong for the benefit of the former leaders and not merely of those who had accompanied Aguinaldo. But the leaders in Hongkong had denounced that agreement, and refused to pay.

That bears out the fact that they were quarreling among themselves about the money, just as I stated on the floor yesterday. Now, I will read further:

> He then entered suit before the supreme court of Hongkong, calling upon Aguinaldo for an accounting of the trust funds deposited in his hands for the benefit of Artacho and others, and asked for an injunction restraining Aguinaldo or any member of the junta from handling or disposing of any part of said funds. He filed as evidence copies of the Biacnabato agreement and of the agreement made by the leaders on December 19. This suit was brought not merely in the name of Artacho, but in that of all the exiles who were described as living in exile in Hongkong in accordance with an agreement made with the Spanish Government. Artacho probably had adherents among these men, some at least of whom were utterly weary of waiting in Hongkong and of living upon what was doled out to them. Some at least saw no chance of any other fate than indefinite exile spent in dependence upon the inner group for even the means of existence.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for three minutes in order to finish this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KAHN (reading)—

The suit was in equity and called for an accounting of the trust funds which the complainant recognized were legally in the hands of Aguinaldo. It could be carried on only with great difficulty without his presence and without his account books. Meetings were held, and Artacho was denounced as attempting to extort blackmail, but he refused to yield, and Aguinaldo, rather than explain the inner workings of the Hongkong junta before a British court, prepared for flight. A summons was issued for his appearance before the supreme court of Hongkong on April 13, 1898, but he was by that time beyond its jurisdiction.

He drew out the ₱50,000 from the Chartered Bank, which had become due, according to the terms of the deposit, and perhaps such other sums as could be drawn upon by check, engaged passage for Europe by way of Singapore for G. H. del Pilar, J. M. Leyba, and himself under assumed names, appointed V. Belarmino to succeed to his functions, and gave him checks signed in blank to draw the interest of the sums on deposit to provide for the support of the exiles. He gave as his reason for departure that he was going to remain under cover until Artacho could be bought off, but he intended to go far afield for this purpose, as he gave his destination as Europe and the United States.

That is what Worcester says in this book regarding the doings of the Filipino junta in Hongkong. It seems to me that when an insurgent chief, or a number of insurgent chiefs, sign a treaty to lay down their arms and go into exile for ₱800,000, while the governing power is supposed to be carrying out an agreement to effect certain reforms, it looks pretty much like a sell out. Worcester quotes Maj. J. R. M. Taylor, of the United States Army. Maj. Taylor was an officer in our Army who was fully conversant with the Spanish language.

During the time we were putting down the insurrection in the Philippines we came into possession of many of the state papers of the Filipino revolutionary government, and Maj. Taylor made the translations for this Government. This latter part of the excerpt from the book by Dean Worcester, to which I have referred, is from Taylor's translation of documents on file in the War Department, and is generally designated "Philippine Insurgent Documents." [Applause.]

Mr. QUEZON. Mr Chairman, I wish to say a few words in behalf of Gen. Aguinaldo. I was at one time an officer in the Philippine Army. I was little more than a boy then. I left college in response to the call of my country to fight under her flag. I fought for two years during the Philippine revolution. It was a horrible war, as all wars are. The Philippine Army was scarcely armed, clothed, and fed, and it was facing one of the best-equipped, best-drilled, most gallant armies of the world. I took part in many a battle. For several months I was on the staff of Gen. Aguinaldo, then President of the Philippine Republic and commanding general of its army. Of course I had occasion to know Gen. Aguinaldo well and intimately, and from personal observation I say that he is a man of high character and patriotism.

The revolution against Spain was the outcome of a long peaceful campaign carried on, not precisely for independence, but to secure from the Spanish Crown a more liberal government in the Philippine Islands. The revolution started in 1896, and in 1897 the Spanish governor general at Manila sought to secure peace by entering into an agreement with the Filipino leaders of the rebellion. It was agreed that the demands for governmental reforms should be granted, and that ₱800,000 in Mexican money, which was then the currency of the Philippine Islands, should be given to the revolutionists, as indemnity for the damages done to them and their families on account of that war, and as a payment for the guns that they surrendered, and—as it was agreed they should leave the Philippine Islands—also as a means of providing for their support and maintenance abroad. In view of the fact that the Spanish Government had agreed to grant all the liberal reforms asked for by the Filipinos before the revolution started, no one can question the right, nay, the duty, of the Filipino revolutionists to end a contest which was causing so much loss of life and property to our country, and which evidently, at that time, could not accomplish more than what Spain had promised to concede. Aguinaldo, therefore, and his followers agreed to leave their country and not to return to the land that they had wished to live and die in. But they were willing to make this sacrifice, and to go far from their beloved ones, so that their people might receive and enjoy in peace the liberal reforms that were promised them. If these Filipino exiles, who had fought for their country, and who were to be denied the right to live in it, had in fact used the money paid them by the Spanish Government for their own purposes, can anyone question their right to do so? Could they not properly have divided this money among themselves, that they might comfortably live thereon?

I have no doubt that if the Filipino people had been asked to vote on the question whether or not these men should receive that money, they would have decided that it be given to them. Yet Aguinaldo and his companions did not make such a use of the funds placed in their hands. They deposited the money paid to them—which never reached the total sum promised—in the bank and only used the interest. They lived in Hongkong in almost complete poverty. Why did they do this? Because they did not know whether Spain would or would not actually comply with the agreement. They were accustomed to see promises broken by that Government, and therefore they kept the fund intact for patriotic purposes. They decided that if Spain, after they had left the Philippines, should fail to grant to the people of the Philippine Islands the liberal reforms that were promised, they would, as was their right, use the money to buy guns, and would by force compel the Spanish Government, that had betrayed them, to comply with the agreement.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUEZON. With pleasure.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I just wish to ask a question for information. Why was it considered that it was necessary for Aguinaldo and his associates to leave the Philippine Islands?

Mr. QUEZON. Because the Spanish Government feared that if they remained in the Philippines they would continue to foment revolution. As Spain failed to keep faith, this money was actually used to buy guns.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from the Philippine Islands has expired.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from the Philippines have five minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia how late he expects to run this evening?

Mr. JONES. Not much after 5 o'clock, I think.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. QUEZON. I was saying, Mr. Chairman, that this money, when Spain did not comply with her part of the bargain, when she refused to introduce in the Philippines those reforms that were asked, was used by Aguinaldo to buy guns, and with those guns we helped the United States in prosecuting her War with Spain. Our aim in that war is well known, and I shall not discuss it. But I want to say that we had retaken every town garrisoned by the Spanish, with the exception of Manila, which we were besieging, so that when the United States sent her troops there all she needed was a few thousand men, and with those few thousand men she compelled the surrender of the garrison of Manila.

I want to say another word about Gen. Aguinaldo. As I said before, I know him personally. I had served under him when I was little more than a boy. Gentlemen, Aguinaldo at one time wielded great power in the Philippines. During the revolution, of course, he was the principal military chief, with the powers of a dictator, just as the President of the United States would be a dictator here in case of war. He had all power, both civil and military, in his hands during the war. He had in his pocket the key to the treasury of the then independent Philippine Government, including both that raised by taxation and that received from contributions. He had the confidence of the people. Nobody asked him what he was doing with the money. The time came when he was captured by Gen. Funston. He had then been exercising his authority for more than two years, but when the war was over Aguinaldo was as poor as he was when the war started. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, I want the gentlemen on this floor to bear in mind this fact: I do not wish to make invidious comparisons with others, but I want to ask you how many revolutionary chiefs in other parts of the world who had the opportunity would have done what Aguinaldo did? How many would have been willing to go back to their homes as poor as ever after having had in their possession so much money that they could have appropriated without question? Aguinaldo is poor to-day. He is a simple farmer. Aguinaldo has not even accepted any position from the American Government, although it was ready to give him a good position. He has not even gone into politics. He has not tried to gain political preferment, even through the popular vote.

Why? He wanted to show the world that he fought for his country, not because of desire of personal profit or power, but out of patriotism, and that when he could not fight any longer he could go to his home and lead a peaceful and modest life, the life of a good citizen, working upon his farm, as he is doing now. Thus Aguinaldo has demonstrated that the Filipinos who had known how to fight know likewise how to work in time of peace. I need say no more. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of my amendment.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I do not imagine that any Member who heard the statement of my friend from California [Mr. KAHN] thinks it necessary for me to make any reply thereto. I had read every word read by him very carefully before he read it, and I listened very carefully to his reading, and I submit that there is not one single word in what he has read that justifies the statement that he made on the floor of this House on yesterday.

I will read the statement made by him as that statement appears in the RECORD. He said:

> My friend from Missouri is not familiar with Philippine history. Nearly six months before our entrance upon the scene the leaders of the revolution against Spain had sold out their people.

I asked the gentleman this question:

> Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from California has made some exceedingly derogatory remarks about the leaders and patriots of the Philippine Islands. He has said that they sold out the liberties of their people to the Spanish Government, and that his charges were historical facts. I want to ask the gentleman if he can vouch a single respectable authority for that statement. Does he know of any history ever written of the Philippines that contains any such statement?

His reply was:

> The treaty of Biacnabato speaks for itself. And not only that, but Dr. Dean C. Worcester states the same thing in his work entitled "The Philippines, Past and Present."

Now, I submit that what the gentleman has just read from Mr. Worcester's book does not justify his statement that Aguinaldo and his associates sold out the Filipino people. This morning I read from the works of a number of historians to the effect that the charge repeated by the gentleman on yesterday was a baseless one, and that Aguinaldo's conduct in this transaction was entirely honorable and conscientious. What I charged the gentleman with saying was that Aguinaldo had sold out his people, and he said he could substantiate it from the Worcester book.

Mr. Worcester himself does not say a word on the subject. He simply quotes from the report of any Army officer setting forth in much detail all the facts connected with the treaty of Biacnabato. Nowhere in that report, or elsewhere in the book in which it is contained, is there to be found a charge that Aguinaldo and his associates sold out the people of the Philippines. That is the unsupported and oft-repeated statement of the gentleman from California.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. KAHN. Does not the gentleman know that the treaty of Biacnabato provided for the exile of Aguinaldo and some of his followers, and that he was to receive ₱800,000 on condition of his going away? Can the gentleman imagine George Washington or John Adams or any of the American patriots during our Revolution selling out for ₱800,000, or any other amount, and agreeing to go away?

Mr. BRYAN. And taking the money with them.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman who represents the Philippine Islands here [Mr. QUEZON] has fully explained that occurrence. He has stated that the Spanish authorities agreed that they would grant the reforms for which Aguinaldo and his associates were fighting if they would agree to leave the islands; and, in order to avert further bloodshed, they agreed to expatriate themselves. After they had done so they discovered that the Spaniards had refused to keep their plighted word, and then they used the money that had been given them, not for their personal purposes but to buy arms with which to compel them to live up to the terms of the treaty of Biacnabato. What was there dishonorable in this?

Mr. KAHN. That is not as I understand it from my reading of the account of the transaction as set forth in Dr. Worcester's work.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Chairman, I ask the Clerk to report my amendment.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gentleman from Virginia yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LEVY] is recognized.

Mr. LEVY. I ask the Clerk to report my amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Between lines 9 and 10, page 3, insert the following as portion of section 2:

"That the Government of the Philippines shall reimburse the Government of the United States for all moneys expended by said Government of the United States in the purchase, protection, and government of the Philippine Islands, and said reimbursement shall be made in payments of gold out of any surplus in the Philippine treasury, or by 3 per cent Philippine Government bonds."

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, is that offered as an amendment to section 3?

Mr. MANN. No; it is an amendment to section 2.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman offer his amendment as an amendment to section 2, or as a separate section?

Mr. LEVY. To be added to section 2.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee reserves a point of order.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this bill. I believe it ought to pass, but I do not believe that we should be a benevolent institution. We have expended on the Philippine Islands, in purchase and otherwise, over $200,000,000, and while it will be a long time before they can repay it, I think the Philippine Government ought to recognize their indebtedness to the United States, as a result of which they have their freedom, and they ought in some way to recognize the vast sum of money expended by the Government of the United States. We have been in this business before. For instance, from 1903 to 1909, in our intervention in Cuba, we expended $8,500,000, and we have never received a cent of it back. My idea is that the United States should stop this grand benevolent business of scattering money all over the world.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVY. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE. Does not the gentleman think the Burgess amendment, which we debated at some length, would have covered that exigency?

Mr. LEVY. No; I do not think it would have covered it. This bill will give them more than opportunity to qualify themselves for independence.

Mr. MOORE. Is it the opinion of the gentleman that this bill would take the United States out of the Philippines and leave everything there that we have spent upon the Philippines?

Mr. LEVY. I believe they ought to recognize the indebtedness of their government to us by giving us a bond as an evidence that they owe us the money. I believe the time will come when they will be very rich, when they will be able to repay us what we expended on them.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman did not get the point of my question. I wanted to know whether it was the theory of the gentleman from New York that if we passed this bill and leave the Philippines we will leave behind us everything that we have spent upon them?

Mr. LEVY. No; I want the Filipino people to recognize what the United States has done for them.

Mr. MOORE. How much have we spent in the Philippine Islands?

Mr. LEVY. Two hundred and fifty millions and over.

Mr. MOORE. And we would stand to lose it all if we pass this bill in its present form?

Mr. LEVY. Yes. I will give you a little history in relation to the Filipinos with which, perhaps, few of you are acquainted. I remember once calling on the late distinguished and lamented President of the United States, Mr. McKinley, and I said, "Why did you take over the Philippines?" He said, Well, he was very much opposed to acquiring them; that he did not want to take over the Philippines, but we were in such a position that we could not help ourselves. He further said that this country was under great obligations to Great Britain for the assistance their navy had rendered the United States; that this Government had ascertained that the German Government had made a treaty, or was about to make a treaty, with Spain that in case we did not take over the Philippines they would purchase the archipelago. This would have caused war between Germany and Great Britain, and so we had to take them over to avoid a great conflict. That was the explanation of the distinguished President of the United States, Mr. McKinley. I do not think it does us any good to hold on to the Philippine Islands.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York is not germane.

Mr. LEVY. I think it is germane, Mr. Chairman, and I am willing to discuss the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think that the amendment is germane to the section, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FLOOD of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 18459, relating to the Philippine Islands, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following requests for leave of absence:

Mr. MONTAGUE for five days, beginning September 28, on account of illness.

Mr. FERGUSSON for four days on account of illness.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to these requests?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I want to observe that these gentlemen seem to have a remarkable degree of prophecy in knowing just how long they are going to be ill—one for five days and another for four days. I do not object, however.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS IN THE RECORD.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of land legislation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

COTTON.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House meets on Monday next, after the approval of the Journal I may have consent to address the House for 40 minutes on the subject of cotton.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that when the House meets on Monday, immediately after the approval of the Journal and the disposal of such matters as have to be attended to he may address the House for 40 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I see that the gentleman from Alabama is here He did not want to let me have 15 minutes this morning.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state that, as far as I am concerned, I would like to have the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] have an opportunity to address the House, and also my colleague from Alabama. As I stated this morning, I would like to have the Philippine bill disposed of before anything intervenes, unless it can be suspension of the rules on Monday.

Mr. MANN. I do not see any chance of disposing of the Philippine bill for a week. However, I shall not object to the request of the gentleman from Alabama if he will make it so that I can have 40 minutes also.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I object to all these requests for unanimous consent.

Mr. HEFLIN. I will ask the gentleman to withhold that for a minute.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, it is time that this Congress adjourned [applause], and I am going to object to each and all requests for unanimous consent.

Mr. HEFLIN. I want to say to the gentleman that the South is in great distress. The cotton industry is in a desperate condition. The price of cotton is less than the cost of production. I want to discuss the situation, and surely the gentleman from Connecticut will not deny me that privilege.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to reply——

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. DONOVAN. Then, Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. HEFLIN. I want to serve notice on the gentleman that we will not adjourn, if I can prevent it, until we are heard on the cotton question and some relief is had for the 30,000,000 of people who are now greatly suffering on account of conditions created by the war in Europe.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the regular order has been demanded.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already put the question.

Mr. MANN. But the regular order is to go back into the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the Philippine bill, unless the gentleman moves to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The committee rose regularly and the gentleman from Georgia was addressing the Chair.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a telegram upon the cotton question.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentlemen on that side of the House how many thousand telegrams have been received upon that subject and whether it is the intention to insert them all in the RECORD?

Mr. EDWARDS. It is impossible to tell the gentleman the number, but I have received only one myself, which I desire to insert in the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. I have received a great many myself, and I object.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed to print in the RECORD a letter that I this day addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury in regard to the cotton situation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a letter which he addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject of cotton.

Mr. HENRY. And currency.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Until we can have some debate upon the matter, I object.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 6440. An act to authorize the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Co. and the Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis & Omaha Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River at St. Paul, Minn.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 13 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, October 3, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Court of Claims, transmitting findings of fact and conclusions in the case of Asa G. Gallup et al., heirs of Ada O. Gallup, deceased, v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 1170), was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. WEBB, from the Committee on the Judiciary, under authority of House resolution 234, authorizing the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into and concerning the official conduct of Emory Speer, United States district judge for the southern district of Georgia, submitted a report thereon (No. 1176), which said report was referred to the House Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

By Mr. WHITE: A bill (H. R. 19092) granting a pension to Frank Stires; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 19093) granting an increase of pension to Henry Engle; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By the SPEAKER (by request): Memorial of various merchants, bankers, and farmers of Jefferson County, Okla., favoring a tax of $5 per bale on each bale of cotton raised in excess of 25 bales in 1915; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also (by request), petition of Harry S. McCartney, of Chicago, Ill., proposing that the United States Congress send a memorial to all nations engaged in war, relative to a cessation of hostilities; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also (by request), memorial of the American Truth Society of New York, deploring the crippling of American commerce by the European war and petitioning for relief; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also (by request), memorial of the Kansas City (Mo.) Branch Railway Mail Service, relative to admitting railway postal clerks to Army and Navy Hospital on same basis as enlisted men; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. CRAMTON: Petition of various members of the Woman's Home Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Mayville, Mich., protesting against House bill 16904, for railroad tracks opposite Sibley Hospital in Washington, D. C.; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Also, protest of George Peck, of Martindale, N. Y., manager of Gayety Theater, Washington, D. C., against special tax on theaters; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, protest of Jordan Philip, cashier First National Bank of Hudson, N. Y., against taxation of capital stock and surplus of banks; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. RAKER: Memorial of Lodge No. 360, Fraternal Brotherhood of Maple Leaf, and the Chamber of Commerce of Oakland, Cal., favoring the Hamill bill (H. R. 15139) relative to retirement of aged civil-service employees; to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

Also, resolutions of the San Francisco Labor Council, of San Francisco, Cal., protesting against the landing in the United States of alien Chinese seamen; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

By Mr. REILLY of Wisconsin: Petition signed by numerous citizens of Chilton, Wis., of different nationalities, protesting against the attempt by certain papers to create prejudice in the minds of the American people against Germany and Germany's cause in the pending European contest; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. SLOAN: Petition of numerous merchants and citizens of Wilber, Clatonia, Plymouth, Exeter, Valparaiso, Touhy, Memphis, Ashland, Cortland, Pickrell, Ithaca, Weston, Diller, Jansen, Harbine, Bee, Hebron, Bruno, Geneva, Ohiowa, Swanton, Fairmont, Daykin, Tobias, Friend, Milford, Pleasant Dale, Dorchester, Seward, all of the fourth congressional district of Nebraska, favoring support of House bill 5308, to tax mail-order houses; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. WINSLOW: Petition of the Christian Endeavor Union of Worcester County, Mass., favoring national prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, October 3, 1914.

(Legislative day of Monday, September 28, 1914.)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

EMERGENCY REVENUE LEGISLATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate certain communications, which will be noted in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance. They have to do with the pending revenue measure.

The communications were referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

[Telegram.]

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., October 2, 1914.

Hon. THOMAS R. MARSHALL,
Washington, D. C.:

Proposed selling tax of $1 per horsepower on automobile manufacturers is the greatest menace to the industry in its history, owing to the contracts existing with dealers. Tax can not be passed on to consumers, and will fall as an unjustifiable burden principally upon the States of Michigan and Indiana. Automobile manufacturing is one of the few industries that has kept the spark of industrialism alive in the United States during the long depression the country has been passing through. The automobile manufacturing industry as a whole is in no condition to stand this discriminatory tax. Please get in touch with your colleagues, calling their attention to the gravity of the situation before irreparable injury is done.

NORDYKE & MARMON CO.

[Telegram.]

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., October 2, 1914.

Hon. THOMAS R. MARSHALL,
Washington, D. C.:

As representative of a State now depending upon the automobile industry for a great part of her commercial success, the proposed tax on automobile manufacturers should appeal to you as a most damaging and ruinous act. The burden of the tax would fall on Indiana and Michigan, and we are depending upon you as our representative to prevent any such discriminating legislation. We are confident you will do all in your power to prevent the enactment of this law, which would mean ruination to the most flourishing industry of our State.

STUTZ MOTOR CAR CO.

[Telegram.]

OIL CITY, PA., October 1, 1914.

Vice President THOMAS MARSHALL,
President of the Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Pennsylvania, in annual convention assembled, respectfully protests against the passage of the bill to increase the revenue on intoxicating liquors and tobacco, or in any way meeting the present financial stress by measures which result in the destruction of our national life.

ELLA M. GEORGE,
President.
ADDIE B. PARSELS,
Vice President.
SYLVIA B. NORRISH,
Corresponding Secretary.
MARGARET F. IRVIN,
Recording Secretary.
LEAH COBB MARION,
Treasurer.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I adverted last evening to the indisposition upon the part of the Finance Committee not to take the public into its confidence regarding the work of formulating the deficiency revenue bill, so called, and I criticized somewhat this method of procedure.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I interrupt the Senator for just a moment?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am going to take no time. I will finish in just a few moments.

For the committee to proceed behind closed doors to place a burden upon the industries of the country without giving the people affected an opportunity to be heard strikes me as a most exceptional method of procedure and one inviting the sharpest condemnation. As I stated last night, even my Republican associates are forbidden to enter the committee room of the Committee on Finance while this work of devastation is going on.

Mr. President, I want to protest in very vigorous language to this method of procedure. This is the only place where a Senator can protest. We are not welcome at the committee room of the Committee on Finance; we are forbidden to attend the meeting of the Democratic members of the committee, who are now proceeding behind closed doors. It is regrettable that only through the public prints are the people to be affected apprised of the nature of this proposed Democratic tax.

I received a telegram this morning from Pontiac, Mich., dated yesterday, reading as follows:

PONTIAC, MICH., October 2, 1914.

Senator WILLIAM ALDEN SMITH,
Washington, D. C.:

Senate committee's recommendation taxing owners and manufacturers of automobiles is the most serious blow that could be dealt this industry. We appeal to you to use all honorable means to save Michigan's greatest industry. Also request hearing of manufacturers before Senate committee.

C. W. NASH,
President Buick Motor Co.

I also have a telegram similarly addressed dated Detroit, October 2, as follows:

DETROIT, MICH., October 2, 1914.

Hon. WILLIAM ALDEN SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We respectfully protest against the proposed action taxing owners 25 cents and manufacturers $1 per horsepower of automobiles to use. This seems to be vicious class legislation. No other industry has been singled out for such drastic and confiscatory action. The automobile must be recognized as a public necessity and convenience instead of a mere luxury. The hundreds of thousands of users of automobiles in the United States are entitled to the same fair and just treatment that should be applied to all other owners of property. We urge you to use every effort to prevent the enaction of this legislation.

HUPP MOTOR CAR CO.

I have a similar telegram, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD, without reading, similarly addressed from the Chalmers Motor Co., of Detroit.

The telegram referred to is as follows:

DETROIT, MICH., October 2, 1914.

Hon. WILLIAM ALDEN SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We are vitally interested in the proposed bill of $1 per horsepower tax against automobile manufacturers. We have already been forced to make a reduction in the price of our cars, due to conditions existing abroad, and a tax of $40 per car would reduce the profit to a point where the successful operation of our company would be seriously impaired. We will appreciate your earnest efforts to prevent the passage of this bill.

CHALMERS MOTOR CO.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I have also a telegram from the following automobile manufacturers, who join in sending the following message:

DETROIT, MICH., October 2, 1914.

Hon. WILLIAM ALDEN SMITH,
Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The following automobile manufacturers indorse and join with us in sending this message:

Abbott Motor Car Co.; Anderson Electric Car Co.; Briggs Detroiter Co.; Cadillac Motor Car Co.; Chalmers Motor Car Co.; Commerce Motor Car Co.; Cricket Cycle Car Co.; Day Automobile Co.; Dodge Bros.; Federal Motor Truck Co.; Ford Motor Co.; Grinnell Electric Car Co.; Hudson Motor Car Co.; Hupp Motor Car Co.; Krit Motor Car Co.; Packard Motor Car Co.; R. C. H. Corporation; Regal Motor Car Co.; Saxon Motor Co.; Signal Motor Truck Co.; Wagenhauls Motor Co.; Wahl Motor Co., Detroit; Public Motor Truck Co., Alma; Buick Motor Co., Flint; Cartercar Co., Pontiac; Durant Dort Carriage Co., Flint; General Motors Truck Co., Pontiac; Havers Motor Car Co., Port Huron; Jackson Auto Co., Jackson; National Motor Truck Co., Bay City; Oakland Motor Car Co., Pontiac; Olds Motor Works, Lansing; Reo Motor Car Co., Lansing.

The proposed special tax upon manufacturers of $1 per horsepower on each automobile manufactured and a 25 cents per horsepower tax upon each automobile owner is intensely disturbing to the entire automobile industry. It immediately threatens the existence of numerous companies and the consequent elimination of income to many thousands of employees. Such an overwhelming blow to the automobile industry at this critical time would positively introduce wide disaster, as many manufacturers are now having serious trouble in marketing their product. The fluctuating nature of this industry and the deterrent effect upon sales if this tax were imposed would prevent a realization of the amount anticipated and required by the Government. There are approximately 1,548,350 automobiles owned in the United States, whose owners already pay property and State taxes. The majority of these cars are owned by persons in moderate circumstances, and the use of these cars largely for business purposes makes them practically a necessity. The imposition of a third tax on motor cars and automobile owners is a positive burden amounting to discrimination, and is more than any single constructive and beneficial business should be expected to bear. It is confiscation. The gravity of this proposed step and its far-reaching influences, which, in our opinion, can not have been adequately and thoroughly reviewed, make a hearing in conference on this subject of vital importance, and we respectfully request an early opportunity to lay before you important facts in connection with your proposed plan.

THE STUDEBAKER CORPORATION OF AMERICA.

I also have telegrams from the Cadillac Motor Co., which I ask to have printed, similarly addressed, protesting against this legislation, from the Federal Motor Truck Co., the Maxwell Motor Co., and the Krit Motor Car Co., all of Michigan.

The telegrams referred to are as follows:

DETROIT, MICH., October 3, 1914.

Hon. WILLIAM ALDEN SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Congress surely does not appreciate what would be the effect upon the entire automobile industry if proposed impost were forced. Michigan, in particular, would suffer a staggering blow. The automobile has become a commercial necessity for the whole country, and its manufacture should be encouraged and not crushed. Michigan now depends largely upon the automobile industry for employment, and thousands of Michigan workmen would be injured by such an unjust tax. We earnestly ask you to protect the interest of your home State by vigorously opposing any such legislation.

CADILLAC MOTOR CAR CO.

DETROIT, MICH, October 2, 1914.

Senator WILLIAM ALDEN SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

New proposed tax of $1 per horsepower for motor-truck manufacturers means suicide. Truck manufacturers in America to date have not made a dollar. Trucks are not a luxury; are sold on cost of installation and operation. Any additional tax will have bad effect on truck industry.

FEDERAL MOTOR TRUCK CO.

DETROIT, MICH., October 3, 1914.

Hon. WILLIAM ALDEN SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We vigorously protest proposed tax of $1 per horsepower on manufacturers of automobiles. We should like an opportunity to be heard before the committee.

MAXWELL MOTOR CO. (INC).

DETROIT, MICH, October 2, 1914.

Senator W. A. SMITH,
Washington, D. C.:

We vigorously protest against proposed tax on automobile manufacturers as very drastic and practically confiscatory. Far as we are concerned, this would add $22.50 to our cost per car, and present margin of profits so close we could not continue business unless we raise list price. Earnestly urge you oppose this ruinous legislation.

KRIT MOTOR CAR CO.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, last night I said that this method of perfecting legislation, which will put an additional burden upon the industry of the country, was to be deplored, and that a broader policy should actuate the Government than the one seemingly adopted in caucus and proceeded with in secret.

These Michigan companies employ thousands of men at good wages. If some one must bear the results of your folly, why not distribute the burden equitably? Why should the automobile industry be selected for this further experimental test of Democracy? Why should that industry be called upon to pay $16,000,000 as a tribute to Underwoodism? In my judgment there is no occasion whatever for resorting to this method of taxation. If the money now subject to Treasury order was actually in the Treasury and not in the hands of administration favorites, the necessity for this legislation would not exist.

Plainly the Underwood-Simmons Tariff Act has failed to produce the revenue expected by the authors of that measure, just as we predicted, and the income tax is a sad disappointment to those who expected better results from that inquisitorial method of raising revenue. I think in the western part of Michigan not over 1,400 people were caught in the dragnet of the income tax, and less than 100 pay more than half of it. It has turned out to be a species of class legislation not in harmony with the spirit of our institutions.

I protest against this secret star-chamber attempt to put upon the industries of the country an additional and unnecessary burden. The Committee on Finance should open its doors, put up its window shades, and let the sunlight penetrate the fiscal gloom. Your great party leader who sits at the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue as the head of State before he was elected President expressed his opinion about committees that work behind closed doors, where the public are not admitted, and where access to their plans and purposes is denied. In the sharpest possible way he condemned this practice, as you upon the other side of the Chamber had been wont to do before you accidentally came into full possession of the Government.

To single out a few industries seemingly prosperous and fix a new levy upon them in order to make up a deficit, due to your recklessness and profligacy, will not impress the country favorably.

When your party entered upon the government of this country a year and a half ago it found the Treasury full to overflowing. Factories were humming with the rattle of busy looms, forges glowed with furnace fires, and the ports of our commerce stirred with the pulses of enlarged trade, and improvement in city, town, and hamlet added to the beauty and utility of the land. You struck it down by the same false doctrines that have brought about disaster and ruin and nonemployment whenever they have been the subject of practical application. You found the Treasury full to overflowing and the credit of the country at its highest point.

Yesterday some of my colleagues upon this side of the Chamber pointed to the courage of Mr. Cleveland who, when the Wilson-Gorman Act failed to bring the necessary revenue to meet the expenses of the Government and inspire confidence or stimulate industry, had the courage to issue bonds of the Government to augment the income. You have bonds of the Government lying in your vaults in the Treasury, all prepared and ready for the market. You have seriously considered the question of marketing these bonds to replenish the revenue which you have so recklessly and generously expended.

But, Mr. President, the reason why those bonds are not used in this emergency is because the credit of the Government has been impaired, and it is seriously doubted whether those bonds would sell at such a price as would be creditable to the administration now in power.

Therefore you single out here and there a few of the remaining evidences of prosperity for special attack. You have gone through the whole field of industrial enterprise with a fine-tooth comb in search of a victim. You have swept the horizon with your field glass from the valley of despair, and finally have been obliged to use the microscope to find a prosperous industry that you may lay your hands on in this emergency, and Michigan has been selected for the sacrifice. Why not North Carolina as well? You have singled out one of the great industries in my State in preference to the equally great industries in your States, and by the rankest kind of discrimination you now propose to make what few prosperous concerns remain in the country pay for this Democratic deficit.

When your party came into power there was to the credit of the American laboring men enough money in the savings banks of this country to pay more than half of the combined national debts of the 50 leading countries of the earth. This vast sum to the credit of labor enlivened new industries, where new labor was employed at good wages. Now the hundreds of thousands of idle men and diminishing deposits of labor in the banks of the country warn you that there is danger ahead; that your plan has failed. Instead of having the courage to back up and take a new start, reimposing the duty upon sugar, which Mr. Wilson, a free trader of West Virginia, the author of the Wilson-Gorman bill, characterized as the most appropriate product in our country for customs duties—instead of backing up and giving confidence to that industry, so seriously menaced by your legislation in the interests of foreigners and aliens who live beyond our borders, you go madly on; instead of backing up and putting a duty upon iron ore, you prefer to let the products of Cuba—sugar and iron ore—come in unrestrained, while manufacturers and farmers of other lands prey at will upon our commerce.

Mr. President and Senators, this is wrong; it is unjust; it is unfair; but before you perpetrate this wrong upon the country you should at least raise the curtains of your committee room, open the doors, and allow those who are to be penalized for their enterprise to come in and be heard in their own behalf.

The telegrams which I have read into the RECORD disclose the apprehensions of enterprising people all over m-- State regarding this proposed legislation. I share their apprehension; I voice their indignation; I sympathize with their solicitude. This proposed legislation is un-..merican; it is intensely partisan; it is sectional in its character; it is unworthy of our American traditions; and I beg the members of the Committee on Finance, I ask my honored friend from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], who is a minority member of the committee, and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], who is also a minority member of the committee, to plead with their associates on that committee to give the industries so vitally affected by this legislation an opportunity to be heard.

I desire, Mr. President, to read into the RECORD another telegram, from another concern, addressed to me, and dated Detroit, October 2. It is as follows:

DETROIT, MICH., October 2, 1914.

Senator WILLIAM ALDEN SMITH,
Care United States Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.:

In behalf of the Detroit life underwriters who represent their clients, the Michigan policyholders of old-line life insurance companies, may I request that you urge Chairman SIMMONS, of the Finance Committee, to eliminate proposed stamp tax on life insurance. The people who are providing for their own through life insurance in old-line companies already bear a heavy share of the tax for governmental purposes and any additional tax of this nature must also be borne by them. A documentary tax on new life insurance is a blow at the seed before the plant has begun to grow. It places a burden upon the spirit of protection and saving that becomes operative coincident with its inception. We understand that the proposed tax excludes fraternal companies and mutual fire companies. If this is true, it gives it the color of class legislation. No European Government has imposed any tax on life insurance; then why should this Government, which is not at war, do so?

M. H. ZACHARIAS, President.

Our entire fiscal embarrassment is due to miscalculation and poor judgment. The practical lines which have hitherto been pursued have yielded abundantly the revenue required to conduct the affairs of the Government, but these experimental makeshifts, intended to conceal the real truth, are temporary in their character, and as misleading as they are unwise and unjust, and deserve the condemnation of the country.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I have received many telegrams along the line suggested by my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Michigan], asking that the industries represented shall be heard. They have asked me on many occasions to present their case to the Committee on Finance. It has been my humiliating duty to report that the hearings on this bill were being secretly conducted by the Democratic members of the Finance Committee only; that it had not been possible for me thus far to obtain a hearing from them on a matter which, according to their statements, is a matter of life and death to them financially I have felt, and I still feel, that this is such an important matter that it ought to have all the light possible cast upon it, and that the bill presented to the Senate and by it submitted to the committee is immature, and that it has been improperly considered will appear to any Senator who will read that measure carefully.

Let me call your attention to one instance. The bill provides that a tax of $1 shall be assessed against all passenger tickets between ports in the United States and foreign countries; that is, all tickets costing not to exceed $30 shall pay $1 tax and tickets costing more than $30 shall pay a larger tax. Between the United States and Canada there are boundary waters. There are thriving cities on both sides of those waters and passenger boats ply between them. Take, for instance, the city of Port Huron, across the river from Sarnia. Boats go back and forth between these cities every 20 minutes, I believe—or every little while, at any rate—and the fare is 5 cents. Between Detroit and Windsor the fare is 5 cents for the round trip. I do not exactly recall the rate of fare between Lewiston and Toronto and between other points, but the proposition in the bill is to tax the buyer of a ticket costing 5 cents $1. That is such a monstrous proposition it seems as though it would have attracted the attention even of a Democratic House caucus; that they would have discovered what that meant. I have called attention to this case simply as an example of one of the many, many things in this bill which require the fullest, freest, and most intelligent attention.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask the Senator if it is a fact that the bill passed the House with that provision in it?

Mr. TOWNSEND. It did pass the House with that provision in it, and it is now before the Senate in that condition.

Mr. President, I think the people of the United States are willing at all times to pay whatever tax is necessary for the support of the Government, but they do want to know that it is necessary and equitable, and they do object to unjust taxes, and especially those that are levied without any proper consideration as to the purpose for which the money is to be used and as to the source from which it is to be obtained. Michigan is hard, and to my mind unjustly, hit in the pending bill. She is willing now, as she has been willing at all times, to pay her just portion of the proper and necessary expenses of government, but, sir, she will not submit to rank injustice, and when this secret-made measure makes its appearance in the Senate I shall defend my State against any injustice which may be imposed upon her. At this time I ask, Mr. President, without much hope, however, that they will ever reach the ears or the eyes of the Committee on Finance, that these telegrams may be printed in the RECORD, so far as they may be different from those submitted by my colleague, as I do not care to have any duplications printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The telegrams are as follows:

DETROIT, MICH., October 2, 1914.

Senator CHARLES E. TOWNSEND,
Washington, D. C.:

Proposed additional tax on manufacturers is unfair and inequitable in the extreme. We now pay in taxes $35 on every vehicle we ship. Proposed tax would increase taxation to $75 each, an impossible, burdensome taxation. Please oppose vigorously.

HENRY B. JOY,
President Packard Motor Car Co.

NEW YORK, October 2, 1914.

Hon. CHARLES E. TOWNSEND,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

Auto manufacturers throughout the country protest against tax on autos. Automobiles pay now three taxes. More taxes will destroy industry. National Automobile Chamber of Commerce wants opportunity for hearing. Representative will be at your office in the morning.

CHARLES THADDEUS TERRY,
General Counsel National Auto Chamber of Commerce.

JACKSON, MICH., October 2, 1914.

Hon. C. E. TOWNSEND,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We enter most earnest protest against the proposed tax on automobile owners and manufacturers. It is most unjust and would result in crippling the automobile industry incalculably, for many will be forced out of business, as their machines, having prices established for present season, will not yield a gross profit equivalent to the proposed tax. The measure amounts to confiscation and should be defeated.

JACKSON AUTO CO.

JACKSON, MICH., October 2, 1914.

Hon. CHARLES E. TOWNSEND,
Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We earnestly protest against emergency revenue tax of 25 cents on owners and $1 to manufacturers per horsepower on automobiles produced; many automobiles are sold at no greater profit than $30 each; average profit 30-horsepower cars selling at less than $800, not over $60 to $70. Dealers and consumers will demand that manufacturers stand tax, and as prices are now made for 1915 season, the result will be endless confusion and negotiations, especially as to manufacturers' tax; if subcommittee's recommendation becomes law, will practically put us out of business. We are now employing in Jackson over 600 men and would have to close up. Please do what you can to prevent this iniquitous class legislation; personally have thought gasoline tax of 2 cents, as talked, was the best method. If motor industry is to be singled out for special taxation, hundreds of thousands of stationary motors would then bear their proportion.

BRESCOE MOTOR CO. (INC.),
BENJAMIN BRESCOE.

JACKSON, MICH., October 3, 1914.

Hon. C. E. TOWNSEND,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

If the proposed deficiency tax bill becomes a law you will ruin every automobile manufacturer in America. Taxing us $1 per horsepower takes away over one-third our profits, as we already have outstanding contracts for 90 per cent of our 1915 production and have no possible redress to cover a portion of this unjust burden. This bill is surely a confiscatory attempt to single out the automobile manufacturer to bear the burden of all. All American manufactured goods should be taxed equal and the individual burden made bearable. We request your earnest cooperation to quash this bill at once.

IMPERIAL AUTOMOBILE CO.,
T. A. CAMPBELL, General Manager.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I wish unanimous consent to introduce, out of order, a resolution asking for some information from the Secretary of the Treasury, if it can be done without displacing the unfinished business. It will take but a few moments. I dare say, to act upon the resolution, as I apprehend there will be no discussion of it, except some remarks consuming about three minutes, which I desire to make.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I should like to ask if that would have the effect of displacing the unfinished business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Oh, no; it would not have the effect of displacing the unfinished business unless it continued until the close of the legislative day.

Mr. SMOOT. Did I understand the Senator to say that it was a resolution he wanted to offer?

Mr. VARDAMAN. A resolution asking for some information from the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SMOOT. Has the Senator sent the resolution to the desk?

Mr. CULBERSON. Will it lead to debate, I will ask the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I think not, except simply a few observations which I myself desire to submit.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the resolution be read before unanimous consent is given.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 460), as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested and directed to transmit to the Senate, as soon as practicable, a statement showing the amount of money that would be saved to the Government by withholding for one year from the salaries of officers and employees of the Government, as follows: On salaries of $7,500 and over, 10 per cent; on salaries of $5,000 and up to $7,500, 8 per cent; on salaries of $3,000 and up to $5,000, 6 per cent; on salaries of $2,500 and up to $3,000, 5 per cent; on salaries of $1,500 and up to $2,500, 3 per cent; and on salaries of $900 and up to $1,500, 2 per cent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I merely want to say a word about this matter. The purpose of my friend from Mississippi is evidently to distribute the burdens of government generally throughout the country. In that respect his resolution aims at a different situation than the one I have just described, where the people in one city of my State will be penalized nearly $14,000,000 by this proposed deficiency raid upon the industries of the country. I have no objection to the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I do not think anything in the resolution will penalize the constituents of my good friend the Senator from Michigan. I want to say, Mr. President, in support of the resolution, that I am asking for this information for the purpose of ascertaining just how much would be saved to the Government if the per cent of the salaries mentioned in the resolution should be retained in the Treasury for 12 months. The high cost of living, the depression in business, and the general demoralization of trade throughout the entire country should cause the Congress to hesitate before taking action and to consider carefully what the effect upon the already overburdened taxpayers will be if this additional tax shall be levied.

The Congress has already appropriated more money than it should have appropriated. Little regard has been shown for the Democratic platform promises on the subject of economy. The only possible justification for the large appropriations that have been made to date is that at the time the appropriations were made the country was enjoying an era of unparalleled prosperity. No one anticipated the exigency which has arisen since that time. The war in Europe came as unexpectedly, with all of its horrors and soul-chilling sorrows, as a devastating cyclone from the calm atmosphere of a fleckless sky. But it is not too late for the mistake to be corrected. I think that the appropriations made ought to be cut down just as much as possible, with due regard, of course, for the public service. We all know that a reduction of 10 or 15 per cent in a great many of these enterprises and projects will not materially retard or interfere with the working out and the ultimate completion of the projects.

Of course, each Senator and Representative would like to have his pet project carried to completion. The element of self-interest is always potential in such matters. Many of us felt that way when the rivers and harbors bill was before the Congress; but the emergent condition, the extraordinary situation in which we found ourselves, led us to do the prudent and provident thing of reducing the appropriation something like $35,000,000.

Now, it has been estimated that the deficit in the Treasury will approximate $105,000,000. The reduction in the appropriation for rivers and harbors is nearly one-third of that amount. How easy and simple it would be, how prudent and wise it would be, how greatly it would lighten the burden which now bears so heavily upon the stooped and tired backs of the toilers of this country if we could reduce these appropriations, or, rather, suspend the payment of, say, 10 or 15 per cent of them, and withhold from the officers and employees of the Government a percentage of their salaries for one year in an amount sufficient to save the Treasury from the depletion which this extraordinary war measure is intended to supply.

It has been urged that the officers and employees of the Government do not receive any more salary than they are entitled to and that this reduction would work a hardship upon them. Mr. President, it is not my purpose or desire to reduce their salaries. I do not intend to take from them any more than that which is paid by other people whose toil supports the Government. The laborer in the field, the mechanic in the shop, the artisan, the factory hand, and all the great army of workers in private enterprises are suffering losses on account of the depression in business. The farmers of the South—those patient, untiring tillers of the soil whose labor feeds and clothes the world, maintains its commerce in time of peace, and fights its battles in time of war; that part of the great army of wealth producers who compose 90 per cent of the constituency that I have the honor to represent in this Chamber—have suffered a temporary loss on account of the war in Europe which amounts to more than 50 per cent of the value of their product. The sacrifice is universal and nation-wide, and each should bear his part uncomplainingly. I believe it is the patriotic duty of every officeholder, from the President down to the man whose salary is as much as $900 a year, to make some concession, suffer some sacrifice, for the good of the Republic.

The plan which I propose, Mr. President, is in the nature of a loan to the Government for 12 months by these servants of the Government. I believe the war in Europe will have ceased its devastations and its cruel ravages will be over within that time, and the normal condition restored. There is one thing certain—we can not afford to put any more tax upon the people.

It may be urged by some that the Constitution prohibits a reduction in the salary of the President and of the judiciary of the country. My answer to that is that this is not a reduction. They will be paid their full salaries, but they will be paid at a time when the Government can make the payment without imposing an additional hardship upon those who are least able at this time to bear it.

I think the man who is so devoid of love of country and patriotism as to object to making this contribution to the Nation's welfare in its hour of stress is not fit to hold a public place, and the good of the service would be promoted by the elimination of such a person from the public service. I believe that the officers and employees of the Government will cheerfully make the sacrifice. I do not believe patriotism is dead. I believe they share the spirit embodied in the immortal lines of England's inspired bard:

No easy hopes or lies
Shall bring us to our goal,
But iron sacrifice
Of body, will, and soul.

There's but one task for all;
For each, one life to give.
Who stands if freedom fall?
Who dies if England live?

Mr. President, I hope the resolution may be adopted. The information sought may open the way to a just and satisfactory solution of the problem which confronts us. I can not consent to further taxation. It is not necessary, and I should feel that I had betrayed the people who commissioned me to represent them in this body if I should with my vote add to the burden of taxation which already presses, oh, so heavily, upon the wealth producers of this country.

In this exigent situation the Democracy has an opportunity to show its devotion to the public interests and its solicitude for the welfare of the individual citizen. To me the proper course is clear. Our duty may lead us to undo some of the things we have done; but we should not hesitate to undo what we have done if in the undoing we best serve the American people. Let us—

Stand to our work and be wise—
Certain of sword and pen;
We are neither children nor gods,
But men in a world of men.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. OVERMAN. What is the resolution, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be stated.

The Secretary again stated the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I am prompted to offer a telegram I have received. I am prompted to do it because of the telegrams presented by the Senator from Michigan regarding the proposed tax on automobiles. My telegram does not refer to automobiles, but it refers to the proposed taxing of gasoline. It reads as follows:

HOBOKEN DEPOT, N. J., October 2, 1914.

Hon. J. H. MARTINE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Gasoline should not be taxed for manufacturing and technical use. Price too high already. We use it in quantities for dry cleaning.

A. D. EYRE & CO.

My friend from Michigan is standing up for the automobile, and the friend who telegraphs me is standing up for gasoline, so we will have the machine stagnated, butting in at both ends, if this is adopted.

I am opposed to a tax on gasoline, for the use of gasoline is not confined to automobiles, of which my wealthy friend from Michigan is the fortunate possessor. I have none. Gasoline enters into manufacturing. It enters into the operations of almost every farm. A little gasoline engine, costing from $40 to $60, is pulled up alongside of a stack of wheat and does the threshing; it does the pumping, the churning, the wood sawing, and a million other things. So I think gasoline should stand a little better chance before the Senate than automobiles.

While I am not here to tinker with the present tax on automobiles, yet I think an automobile could stand it very well.

I think my friend from Michigan wants to be fair, however. He is a very delightful and companionable and genial gentleman. I love his pugnaciousness. I know he must feel better now, since he has gotten this campaign speech off his mind and out of his system. He will feel better over Sunday on account of it. He could not let the opportunity go by. We are to have an election in a few weeks, and he had to get in his campaign speech about the tariff, claiming that we had instituted a tariff which failed to produce the results anticipated. Of course it did. We did not have war in Europe then. He was not fair enough to tell the Senate that the imports were stifled and shut off through the unfortunate situation that exists abroad. Oh, no; he told you nothing about that, but simply the fact that our tariff had failed to produce revenue. He went on to tell you that when we came into power here the factories were busy, they were humming all over; and yet we had the uncanny and horrible strike in Lawrence, Mass., under your administration and under your infernal system of tariff taxation. We had strikes all around. The Senator does not say anything about that.

We are not the authors of this necessity, however. We did not make this war, and God knows we all wish it might be stayed and stopped. We are not the authors of it in any sense whatever; but it is apparent, and every fair-minded Senator on the other side will admit, that there is a need of revenue for no reason of our own making. We must not put it on automobiles, oh, no, for some multimillionaire who rides in a lavish one might have to pay a dollar or two a year. How is that going to affect you people in Michigan? Not a bit. You are an ingenious, thrifty set of manufacturers and business men up there. Every dollar we put on automobiles you will charge up to the consumer, the man who buys the automobile. Of course the Senator from Michigan, having two, would have to pay a little more than some poor devil who did not have any.

It is also said that we must not put it on whisky. Now, I am in favor of putting it on luxuries—putting it on whisky, on wine, on beer, on tobacco. But we find rebellion at each of these points. The whisky men write me, on lavish letterheads: "Now, don't think of imposing any more tax on whisky. God knows we have burdens enough."

Two or three brewers come from my State and say: "Oh, don't think of putting it on beer, for beer is the poor man's drink." I think it poor at that, but that is their proposition.

Then we come to the wine producers. The wine producers of Ohio say: "Oh, unholy the thought of taxing wine, for our Savior, you know, dealt out wine, and let it be as free as water." My New Jersey friends tell me it will be ruinous to put it on wine. My New York friends, up at Penn Yan and around there, tell me that it will not do to put it on wine there, because they produce those wines.

I come to my southern, warm, genial-hearted, liberal friends who raise tobacco, and they say: "Do not put it on tobacco." "Why?" "Why, it is the poor man's luxury. He smokes tobacco." Then another man from the South says: "Do not put it on tobacco, because we export tobacco, and we are already hard hit on the cotton question. In God's name, do not put it on cotton and do not put it on tobacco."

In all reason, Mr. President, let us be rational and fair over this proposition. If there is any one group of luxuries that it should be put upon, I say it is wine, whisky, beer, and tobacco. I think no fair-minded man could rebel against that, and I believe we can secure quite enough revenue from that source to satisfy the needs of our Government. If, however, it should become necessary to exact even more, I should not hesitate to impose a stamp tax on checks, bonds, mortgages, deeds, and the like. I believe this would be acquiesced in by the mass of our fellow citizens without any dissatisfaction or any rebellion.

As to the automobile proposition, I say that a machine used for commercial purposes—a dray or a vehicle of that kind—might well be exempt; but a luxurious, splendid equipment in the way of a carriage, such as an automobile is, might fairly and decently and justly have a fair levy of tax.

But I think my friend from Michigan is unjust in his attacks. This horrid financial condition and chaos exists the world over, not here alone. We have weathered the storm, and stand par excellence before the world. The world over, almost to every nation, is in chaos, driven to straits unparalleled and unknown before; and, naturally, as each year advances and as our civilization has gone on nations come closer in touch, and it is not unnatural or unreasonable that we should feel the effects of their strife. But, thank Heaven, we shall weather the storm. The hundred millions of people that make up America, prompted by the holy thought of right and justice, guided and directed to-day by the hand of the President of the United States, Woodrow Wilson, who has but one purpose, and that is justice and fairness to all mankind, will bring us out of this cloud and lift us to a brighter and holier sunshine in the near future that will bless Republican, Democrat, Jew, and Gentile alike.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, of course I am interested in what the Senator from New Jersey has said about what should be done to remedy the deplorable condition of the American Treasury; but is it true that the commercial and industrial stringency is due to the war in Europe? Let us see about that.

I hold in my hand a letter written by a very prominent North Carolinian under date of July 22, 1914. This was before the war in Europe or any rumors of war in Europe, and this is the way he describes the business situation in his own State:

> As a matter of fact, the cotton-mill business has never been in as bad shape in the last 20 years as it is now.

This was on July 22. He said that his chief "chain of mills had been shut down and would be forced to close later unless there was a change for the better; that unless the Democratic leaders ceased their unjustified attacks on business and gave it a rest the administration in Washington would receive a terrible rebuke from the people."

Further on he says:

> The truth of the matter is that the South did not begin to feel the business depression until the last four or five months, but since then business has been falling off good and strong in all lines. The cotton-mill industry has been struggling along, trying to keep its wheels turning, hoping against hope that there would be a turn in the tide for the better, with the result that every available warehouse is filled with manufactured product; but there is no demand for the goods, and it looks like the month of August will find an enforced closing down of our mills.
> I am not sufficiently wise to say where the trouble lies, nor am I fool enough to believe that it just happens that hard times fall under the Democratic administration; so I am forced to the conclusion that the policies of the Wilson administration are largely responsible for the present business depression.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator tell me who that gentleman is?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will tell the Senator whose mills were referred to. I do not know that I am at liberty to give the name of the author of this letter, although I am sure the Senator would know him. The mills to which he refers are the mills of Mr. J. A. Long, of Roxboro. Does the Senator know him?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do. He did not write that letter.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is he an upright man?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes; but he never wrote that letter. I will wager that J. A. Long never wrote that letter.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will ask the Senator from North Carolina if Mr. Long ever wrote him a letter of similar import?

Mr. OVERMAN. He never did, and I will declare again that I do not think he wrote that letter.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I did not say he did.

Mr. OVERMAN. No; of course the Senator did not say he did.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But I said it was his mills that were closed.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. Long has never said so. I should like to know the gentleman who wrote the letter.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Unfortunately, the letter is marked "Personal." I do not know that I am at liberty to give the name of the writer.

Mr. OVERMAN. I would not ask the Senator to give the name under those circumstances.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Then, again, it refers very slightingly to some remarks of one of my honored colleagues on the other side of the Chamber, and I do not want that statement to go into the RECORD.

I will say, however, to my distinguished friend from North Carolina who now addresses me that I did not refer to him.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am very glad to hear that, and I will not insist on the name, of course, but I was satisfied that Hon. J. A. Long, one of the leading men in my State and one of the leading cotton-mill men, never wrote that letter. In fact, I know he did not write it, because if he had written it, it would not have been true, and he is an honest man. I want to say to the Senator——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Let me ask my friend from North Carolina if he has ever received a letter of similar import from Gen. Julian S. Carr?

Mr. OVERMAN. No, sir; I have not.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Do you know Gen. Julian S. Carr to be an honorable, upright man?

Mr. OVERMAN. I know Gen. Carr, and he is an upright and an honorable man.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to say this——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I have reason to believe that the statements made in this letter are true. I was authorized to make use of this information. I have not seen fit to do so except in reply to the very general statement of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE].

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to say to the Senator, if he will permit me further——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. I was down home about that time of the year. I live in a cotton-mill section. The town in which I reside the Senator knows. He has been to my town. He made a very great speech there and impressed our people greatly. They were highly pleased with him and were glad to entertain him and glad to see him there. The Senator knows that I live in that section of the State, and I want to say that when I was there in July I never saw our people as prosperous and as happy as they were at that time. I inquired particularly all around how they were getting on. Everybody said things were prosperous and the people satisfied, and there had not been a better time in the whole history of the State. There was a little cotton mill that was situated in my county that for years had not made any money. I held $500 of the stock. The 1st day of July it paid 6 per cent dividend. That was in my county. I do not know what this gentleman is talking about. He may be a credible and honorable man, and I have no doubt he is, but it may have been that in some of the counties there may have been some bad management in a certain mill.

The Senator talks about J. A. Long's mill. I do not say that mill was not closed down. I do not say he is not telling the truth. It may have been closed at that particular time in order that the hands might take a rest. In July and August frequently the cotton mills shut down for two or three weeks in order to give their employees a rest. They take a picnic and go off on a holiday.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I know it is the custom with the mill owners in North Carolina and elsewhere, whenever the times are hard and Democrats are in power, to give their employees a rest, usually at the expense of the workman.

Mr. OVERMAN. No, Mr. President; the time when the Republicans were in power and when the times were very hard was in 1907, when the cotton mills could not sell anything, and even in the most prosperous times, when they paid big dividends, it has been the custom to shut down during the month of July or August. The cotton mills do it in hard times and in the most prosperous times. It is the custom for the cotton mills to shut down two or three weeks to give their employees a little picnic. They demand it and they ought to have it. They go out and visit their friends in the country where they came from, and they give picnics in the country, and sometimes take a band of music with them and have a good time. It may be that a mill will shut down in July for a week or two, but that is not any criterion to go by.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. This letter does not indicate that it is any picnic that the employees of the cotton mills of North Carolina are enjoying. It indicates that they have not in 20 years been as hard up as they were the four months preceding the war in Europe.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think in 1907 there were no dividends paid by the cotton mills. That is my recollection about it. I know the cotton mills down there have been paying regular dividends during the last year or two years.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They were hit pretty hard in the four or five months preceding the European war, but there was nothing to lay it to but Democratic ascendency, and they kept quiet.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is not my information.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They were hit pretty hard, and if there is any desire to ascertain the exact situation I have an impression in my mind that somewhere in the North Carolina delegation the Senator from North Carolina can find a letter detailing this distress from Gen. Julius S. Carr and Mr. J. A. Long, who, in addition to being a prominent mill owner and banker, has been a State senator in that State.

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes; he is one of the most prominent men we have, and one of the best men in the State.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. He has, I think, protested to certain members of the North Carolina delegation that the assertion that there was any prosperity in the cotton-mill business of North Carolina was an error, and he has carried his protest to Secretary Daniels, also a North Carolinian, the present Secretary of the Navy, and he has written President Wilson and, I think, other prominent officials to the same effect.

Mr. OVERMAN. J. A. Long is a great friend of mine. He has supported me always for the Senate. I think he probably would have written to me if he had written to anybody. He is one of the best friends I have in the State. I have no better friend there.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I ask my friend from North Carolina, who is a very frank, manly man, for whom I have the highest respect, if he will look through his correspondence and see if he can not find a letter from Gen. Carr, supplemented by a letter from Mr. Long, dated about the 20th of July, or thereabouts, in which is set forth specifically and in detail the unfortunate business depression in the cotton business of North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. I would remember it if I had such a letter as that.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the Senator look for it?

Mr. OVERMAN. I will be glad to look for it, but there is no use for me to look.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Senator finds it, he will do me the courtesy of bringing it here?

Mr. OVERMAN. I will hand it to the Senator. I have files of letters from cotton-mill owners, and if the letter is there the Senator shall have it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should deplore any difference of opinion between the Senator from North Carolina and myself regarding this matter.

Mr. OVERMAN. There can be no difference between us on a question of fact, but the Senator looks at it from one viewpoint and I from another. I speak from personal knowledge.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. To say that any industry in North Carolina has prospered under the Underwood-Simmons tariff law and that prosperity prevails throughout the South and did prevail prior to the war in Europe is to make a very bold and, in my judgment, a very questionable assertion.

Mr. OVERMAN. I can only speak as to the mills in my immediate section. Of course, if he wrote such a letter he believed what he wrote to be true, if the Senator has such a letter.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The distinguished gentlemen are not responsible for my statement. I have no letters from them, but I was informed that certain distinguished representatives from North Carolina did receive some letters of this character.

Mr. OVERMAN. I can not answer for anybody but myself, of course.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I hope the Senator will be able to find the letter and that the Senate may know its contents.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Michigan that this question arose at the time the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] made the statement that every mill in North Carolina was running full and that they were never more prosperous in the world than they were at that time. That happened in a discussion in the Senate.

Mr. OVERMAN. I was not present then.

Mr. SMOOT. At the time I called the attention of the senior Senator from North Carolina to the fact that certain letters had been put in the RECORD in the House showing that that was not the case. After that, I want to say to the junior Senator from North Carolina, I received a number of letters from cotton manufacturers of the South along the line just mentioned by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. OVERMAN. Did the Senator receive any from my State?

Mr. SMOOT. They were all from North Carolina, because they were in answer to what had been said in that discussion.

Mr. OVERMAN. How many letters did the Senator get from North Carolina?

Mr. SMOOT. Some four or five.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator show them to me?

Mr. SMOOT. I will be glad to show them to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I am not going to prolong the discussion. I feel that when the Senator from North Carolina has looked through his mail carefully he will be able to find some correspondence which will bear out the statement which I have made, that the business conditions in North Carolina were deplorable before the European war began, and that that condition was due entirely to the enactment of a free-trade customs bill, for which his party is responsible.

Mr. OVERMAN. I know the Senator is very candid, and when he makes the statement he must have some information to the effect that I have such a letter. Why does the Senator state that I have such a letter in my files?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Because I have been so advised.

Mr. OVERMAN. If I have received such a letter, I will look it up, and I will put it in the RECORD.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am informed the Senator was fully advised regarding these deplorable conditions.

Mr. OVERMAN. No; the Senator was not.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator gets so much mail this letter may have escaped his attention.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have no recollection of it; but if I have it, the Senator shall have it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am obliged to the Senator.

FORTIFICATION OF SWEET WINES.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I send to the desk the following resolution, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 461), as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to send to the Senate a statement containing the names and addresses of the manufacturers of sweet wine who use wine spirits or grape brandy in the fortification of sweet wines, together with the number of gallons of wine spirits or grape brandy used by each of said manufacturers in said process of fortification for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914.

Also a statement showing the amount of revenue received by the Government during said period from said wine spirits or grape brandy, and the amount of revenue the Government would have received provided the wine spirits or grape brandy so used had been charged for at the rate of $1.10 per gallon, which is the tax other users thereof are required to pay therefor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CULBERSON. I will not object if it does not displace the unfinished business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has already ruled that if the unfinished business shall be taken up before the conclusion of this legislative day it still remains the unfinished business. If anything shall be taken up and the Senate shall adjourn during the consideration of that pending question, that would become the unfinished business.

Mr. CULBERSON. I desire to give notice that I shall object to any other resolution or anything that shall take the Senate away from the consideration of the unfinished business after this is disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I can not quite understand the solicitude of the Senator from Texas over the displacement of the unfinished business. There is no disposition in the Senate to displace that business, and it can be put back upon motion at any time; the Senate would indorse it.

I have no objection to the resolution offered by the junior Senator from Ohio. I think it is entirely proper. I myself presented a resolution yesterday, which the senior Senator from Texas objected to, as he informed me, because of the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. I spoke to the chairman of that committee, who does not happen to be present now, and he said he has no objection to it. That resolution can lead to no debate. It is simply a request for information which I regard of considerable importance, and I should like very much to have that resolution adopted, in order that the information can be prepared and submitted to the Senate for purposes entirely proper; it is information which the Senate is entitled to receive.

I should like to have the Senator from Texas withdraw the statement he made that he will object to anything further along this line, and that my resolution may also be considered.

Mr. CULBERSON. There are two or three Senators present in the Chamber ready to speak on the unfinished business. We have been in session since 12 o'clock, for an hour and a quarter, listening to matters foreign to the unfinished business, and I must insist on the regular order after the pending resolution is adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request for the consideration of the resolution offered by the Senator from Ohio? The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 361) to correct certain errors in H. R. 12045, H. R. 12914, H. R. 13542, H. R. 14234, H. R. 14738, H. R. 15692, and H. R. 16294, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 6440) to authorize the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Co. and the Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis & Omaha Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River at St. Paul, Minn., and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

H. J. Res. 361. Joint resolution to correct certain errors in H. R. 12045, H. R. 12914, H. R. 13542, H. R. 14234, H. R. 14738, H. R. 15692, and H. R. 16294 was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, after the election two years ago I announced publicly that I proposed to do everything that I possibly could to make this administration a success. I believed in the integrity of purpose and the lofty patriotism of the President and of the purposes of the Democratic Party to legislate for the best interest of the country as they saw it, and I announced that every measure which appealed to my judgment as a good measure would have my support. I have tried to follow that course during the last 18 months. I have supported quite a number of measures proposed by the administration. Those that did not appeal to me I opposed. I expect to continue that course.

I hoped to be able to support the present bill known as the Clayton bill. I voted for the measure when it passed the Senate. I do not consider it in any sense a party measure. It, to my mind, has no element of partisanship in it, or at least it should have none. I voted for the measure when it came up in the Senate for reasons that have been given already by several of the speakers. I was not satisfied with it. I voted for it with very great reluctance. Many good things—that is, to my mind—were left out of it. Some good things were put in it. Some things that I was in favor of were not put in it, but I voted for the measure, hoping that when it went to conference the good provisions that we put out would be put back, and the good things that we put in would be left in it—the bad omitted—and that we would get a good measure.

What I had hoped, to my mind has not been done. The good things that we cut out have not been restored. Many of the good things that we put in have been left out, and some bad things that we cut out have been restored. So I find that it is impossible for me to vote for the conference report.

This measure also, in my judgment, violates the Democratic platform and gives the lie to their campaign of denunciation. That is not a reason for my voting against it, however. This feature of it was pointed out very clearly on yesterday by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. He called attention to the declarations of the Democratic platform denouncing the Republican administration for not enforcing the criminal features of the Sherman law, and yet in this conference report the criminal provisions have been eliminated entirely, so that it will not be a question of the enforcement of the criminal provisions of the law, but it is a question of eliminating those provisions.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. JONES. Yes; although——

Mr. OVERMAN. I know the Senator does not mean to be unfair in his statement; but it is not true, and I want to set him right. The Senator was talking about the Sherman law and said all the penalties had been extracted from it.

Mr. JONES. Oh, no; not the penalties extracted from that law, but I said that the penalties were extracted from the Clayton bill. I say that we cut out a great many good things that I hoped would come back in conference.

Mr. OVERMAN. I simply wanted to correct the Senator, because I understood the Senator to say that the conference report had stricken out the penalties of the Sherman antitrust law.

Mr. JONES. No; I am very glad, if the Senator understood me that way, that he interrupted me, because I did not intend that at all.

In my judgment the conference report, if enacted into law, will multiply litigation, render uncertain the Sherman law, and furnish a harbor of refuge to those interests seeking to hamper and destroy honest competition and honest business.

I do not know as to the invisible government, to which the junior Senator from Minnesota so eloquently and impressively refers; but I do know that somewhere, somehow, something controls and directs legislation as never before for the benefit and protection of those elements in our national life against which the country and political parties have been crying out.

I agree fully with the Senator in his eloquent and earnest plea against one-man power and for independence in legislative action. I am not sure but that I agree with him that the President does not know the effect of this legislation as proposed in this conference report. I do believe, however, that the President can be justly criticized for assuming to know what is in it and putting the seal of his approval upon it before it is considered and discussed in the legislative branch. Never in the history of the country have such legislative methods been pursued as during this Congress. Legislative measures of the greatest importance have been prepared in secret and in a partisan way and then submitted to the Executive. They are then bottled and sealed with the Executive approval and passed through another body, which I must not mention here, under "gag" rule and without opportunity for amendment and presented to us in the original package. This legislation has taken that very course. It had the approval of the President when it passed another body. It was amended here. Some good things were taken out; some good things were put in. The bill went to conference. Many good things were taken out; others were left out; and some bad things were inserted. It was then submitted to the President, bottled up and sealed with his approval, and presented here for action. The trouble with these methods is that approval is given to proposed legislation before discussion instead of after discussion. If the discussion of this conference report could have been had before the Executive approval, I have so much confidence in the President as to believe that he would not approve it. For not taking this course he is justly subject to severe criticism. It is well enough for the President, as the leader of his party, to point out the objectionable features of pending legislation that may come to his attention, but as President of the United States he should not approve proposed legislation in its details before consideration, discussion, and action by the legislative branch of the Government.

The Executive fiat, "This is good legislation," will not satisfy the people, especially when such legislation is condemned by men whose honesty and integrity can not be questioned and who have given the best years of their lives to the study of the questions involved. Good intentions and honest purposes will not excuse the perpetration of such a fraud upon the people and honest business as this legislation will be. Its specific defects have been so fully and clearly pointed out that I am not going to take the time of the Senate further, but shall proceed to consider briefly some other matters to which I desire to refer.

Mr. President, this administration is nearly half over. Congress has been in continuous session for more than 16 months. When we adjourn, if we ever do, the President, in classical diction and elegant phrase, will felicitate the people upon the things done by his party and assure them of the great benefits that have come and will come to them through the laws passed. The mind treatment will be given. The laws passed will be declared good, and this will be held sufficient, no matter what the effects may really be. The jobless man, the marketless farmer, and the bankrupt business man will be told in all seriousness that they are only in a "psychological" state and to be of good cheer; all is well.

When the people voted for a change they expected something better than they were then enjoying. What has been the result? What has been done? What promises have been fulfilled? Who has received any real benefit? What ills have been cured? Has suffering been relieved? Have those who really needed help been helped? To whom has come relief from the high cost of living? Has more employment come to labor? Have better wages been paid? Is the farmer's home more comfortable? Has he a better market, and does he receive better prices for his products? Are we better governed? Has economy been practiced? Have useless offices been lopped off? Has merit been better rewarded? Have crimes been more swiftly and surely punished? Has justice been meted out more certainly and equitably? Are conditions better than they were? Are they, in fact, as good as they were before the change? The answers to almost if not all of these questions come from each one's actual experience or are within the knowledge of all, and from them will come the people's verdict.

The administration says, "We have done well." Self-commendation is easy, but it is not convincing or conclusive. Let us look at the record. What has been done and its results, actual or probable, will determine whether all is well or not. The last administration was charged with violating its platform promises, although no President insisted more strenuously upon the fulfillment of platform promises than Mr. Wilson's predecessor, and the last Democratic platform closed in these words:

Our pledges are made to be kept when in office as well as relied upon during the campaign.

On August 15, 1912, during the campaign, the President said:

Our platform is not molasses to catch flies. It means business; it means what it says. It is the utterance of earnest and honest men who intend to do business along those lines and who are not waiting to see whether they can catch votes with those promises before they determine whether they are going to act upon them or not * * * and they who talk one way and vote another are going to be retired to a very quiet and private retreat.

These were brave words. They have the right ring. They were no doubt uttered honestly and sincerely. The people relied upon them and had a right to do so, but if they have been mere words, if the deeds done do not square with them, then the people will be fully justified in retiring the Democratic Party "to a very quiet and private retreat."

You promised to revise the tariff, and you have done it; but you promised that in revising it you would not hurt or injure any legitimate industry, and that you would increase prosperity, destroy the trusts, and reduce the cost of living. Not one of these benefits has come from your revision, and, to be fair, I shall have in mind and apply my statements to the period before the commencement of the war in Europe and the abnormal conditions which that has brought about. Your tariff policy had been in effect long enough when that broke out to show what it would do and teach the people what they might expect from it. It helped no one except the importer and the foreigner who was selling more freely in our markets. You added nothing to the worker's wage, nor did you decrease the cost of his necessities. Many were deprived of work, and their ability to purchase the necessaries of life was diminished. You brought no better prices to the farmer for his products, but in many instances they were actually reduced. His markets were diminished by curtailment abroad and by foreign competition at home. Merchants saw their sales decrease and their profits vanish. Railroads lost their business, were threatened with receiverships, and sought permission from the Interstate Commerce Commission to increase their freight charges in order to avert industrial disaster. According to the Bureau of Railway Economics, the operating income of 35 eastern railways for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1914—long before any war was thought of—was $74,002,581 less than for 1913. What was the matter? Lack of business. Imports of foreign goods and farm products steadily increased and exports steadily decreased.

During the first seven months of the year 1914 our imports under the Underwood tariff law were $122,445,540 more than for the corresponding period in 1913 under the Payne tariff law. Much of these imports could have been produced here by our labor and from our resources, and by reason of their importation American labor and American products were displaced. During the same seven months in 1914 we exported $126,347,697 less of our goods than for the same period in 1913. In other words, our home market was invaded by foreign goods, and at the same time we lost much of our foreign market. There was a total loss under the Democratic tariff in our foreign trade—before the war, mark you—of $248,793,237, compared with a similar period under a Republican tariff, notwithstanding its alleged imperfections. No wonder industry was halting; no wonder business was depressed; no wonder labor was idle prior to the outbreak of the war. It follows as the night follows the day that you can not purchase the products of foreign labor and foreign farms without injury to your own labor and your own farmers. And it takes no great degree of intelligence to know that if our sales abroad decrease it must bring injury to our laborers and producers. Government revenues decreased over $32,000,000 in our customs receipts before the war interfered with normal conditions. The customs receipts for the last nine months of the Payne tariff law were $238,730,196.45, and for the first nine months of the Underwood law $206,533,913.18, or a decrease of $32,196,283.27. With revenues decreasing and appropriations increasing with peace throughout the world, no wonder we must begin to tax the people directly to run the Government. These are the results of your tariff revision. It is no prophecy, but a fair statement of the facts known to all. These conditions are not what you promised; they are not what the people expected and not what they desired, and, in my judgment, they will change the law under and by which they were brought about at the very first opportunity.

Your platform expressed regret that court decisions had deprived the Sherman law of most of its efficiency, but you have done nothing in your much-heralded antitrust measures to amend or strengthen it. You have now concluded that the law is strong and efficient, and you have tried only to supplement it, and have done that very weakly and imperfectly. You have been careful to declare that nothing in the laws passed shall be construed to affect or impair the Sherman law. And yet, Mr. President, the conference report that we have now before us will, in my judgment, if adopted, weaken the Sherman law and make its application and meaning hereafter uncertain, only to be determined at the end of years of litigation.

Your platform declared for an amendment to the Constitution limiting the President to one term and pledged your candidate to this principle. A resolution for such an amendment passed a Republican Senate last Congress, but neither you nor your President has done a single thing toward fulfilling that promise.

Your platform denounced the appropriations made by the Republicans as lavish, and demanded a return to simplicity and economy. You have not only failed to keep that pledge, but you have not tried to keep it, and the appropriations made by this Congress will exceed by many millions those of any other Congress in the history of the Republic, while many urgent Government needs have been neglected and the estimates of the departments urged as absolutely necessary have been arbitrarily rejected while needless and unnecessary appropriations have been made.

As just one example, Mr. President, I want to state here that the Department of Commerce urged the very great necessity of a $30,000 appropriation for a drag in the waters of Alaska in order to protect life and property from the dangers that exist in some of those channels of trade. That was denied, and yet we appropriated without a murmur over $400,000 to secure additional land for the public-building site in the city of Richmond.

The fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, was the last year appropriated for by a Congress and administration wholly Republican, and, exclusive of the river and harbor bill, the appropriations amounted to $995,799,462.72, while for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, notwithstanding your denunciation of the Republicans and your promises of economy, you have already appropriated, exclusive of the river and harbor bill, $1,089,408,777.26, and more to follow.

With pension appropriations decreased by $11,500,000 by reason of the decrease in the number of the Nation's defenders, with appropriations for the Panama Canal much less by reason of the completion of that great work, still the appropriations by this Democratic administration exceed that last made when the Republicans were in full control by over $100,000,000, and a river and harbor bill and other appropriations are still to follow. With a decrease of over $32,000,000 in customs revenues during the nine months following the passage of the Underwood tariff law, and a probable increase of $150,000,000 in the annual appropriations, it is no wonder that $100,000,000 additional taxes must be collected from the people. This or an issue of bonds was inevitable without any war in Europe, and demonstrates the incapacity of the Democratic Party to administer this Government in the interest of the people.

Your platform demanded a reduction in useless offices with salaries that drain the substance of the people. You not only find no useless offices, but you have created a multitude of new ones. Salaries have been increased, and the legislation you have passed will require an army of officials, spies, sleuths, inspectors, and Government agents, who must be supported at the people's expense. No Congress in the history of the Republic has created so many new offices as this one.

Your platform promised a wise, systematic, and comprehensive system for the improvement of the waterways of the country, but in whatever you have done you have followed the old system in a much worse form than ever before, and the bill you have presented is more vicious than any of its predecessors.

As a confession of your incapacity you propose to place $20,000,000 in the hands of the Secretary of War to distribute as he sees fit under the stress of the great political pressure that will be brought to bear upon him, and such a measure has been passed.

Your platform promised to foster the growth of the merchant marine, but your administration refuses to enforce the little step taken by Congress in the tariff law for this purpose, and you have deprived our merchant marine of any advantages that should have come to it from the building of the Panama Canal. Your emergency legislation is a mere makeshift and liable to involve us in trouble with warring nations.

Your platform approved and pledged you to the civil-service system, to the end that merit and ability shall be the standard for appointment. You have attacked that system at every opportunity. Deputy marshals, income-tax collectors, commercial attachés, and other Government officials have been by law expressly exempted from the operation of the civil service, and a determined effort has been made to exempt all post-office employees, in order that this great service might be made the prey of politics and the spoils system.

Your platform pledged the people of Alaska and the District of Columbia that their offices should be filled by bona fide residents. This promise has been repeatedly and flagrantly violated.

Admitting the misuse of delegated power a wrong, you have surrendered to the secret caucus, adopted and practiced alleged Cannonism in its worst form, stifled individual opinion, forsaken independent representative action, and followed grudgingly, but nevertheless fully and submissively, the Executive will and mandate rather than the people you were selected to represent, and enforced it by "gag" rules, adopted more frequently than by all the preceding Congresses.

Your platform declared that every American citizen residing or having property in a foreign country must be given the full protection of the United States Government, and that his constitutional rights should go with him and protect him throughout the world, but you have seen American citizens wantonly murdered and their property destroyed, and the only relief suggested to those surviving was to leave their homes and their property and come back to the country that apparently could afford no protection to its citizens beyond its borders.

Your platform promised that coastwise ships should go through the Panama Canal free from tolls, but you expressly repudiated that promise, and at the instance of the transcontinental railroad lines and to secure the good will of nations having no cause of complaint against us, you repealed the law which a preceding Congress had enacted, and proclaimed to the world our national perfidy and dishonor.

This, Mr. President, is a part of your record when in office on the platform that was not "molasses to catch flies."

For 20 years the Democratic Party has been the special friend of the farmer. It has sought his favor and support, bewailed his hard lot, assured him of the beneficence of its policies, and denounced the Republican Party as his enemy and oppressor. In the last campaign it appealed to the farmer most effectively from the stump and by positive and specific platform promises. The object of special solicitude then, the farmer has been its special victim of attack and neglect. This is no idle statement. It is an indisputable fact. It was sought to reduce the cost of living. How? Avowedly by reducing the price of the farmer's products. The Simmons-Underwood tariff law ruthlessly neglected and sacrificed his interests. While a moderate reduction was made on manufactured products in the hope of preserving industry, the whole tariff was taken off many of the products of the farm regardless of effects. He was told to "root, hog, or die." When he had just reached the point where he could see a fair return for his toil and effort and risk competition was encouraged from Belgium, Canada, Argentina, Australia, Germany, China, and other countries, and under the normal workings of that tariff law up to the first of last August and before the war the prices for his hay, butter, potatoes, wheat, corn, oats, barley, hogs, cattle, sheep, horses, beets, eggs, poultry, and other products had been held down or greatly reduced by competition from other countries, and he read in the figures of imports of farm products longer hours of toil for himself, diminished markets for his products, and fewer comforts for himself and family. The Democrats always told him that the tariff gave him no protection. When he sees corn from Argentina, potatoes from Bermuda, barley, oats, and wheat from Canada, eggs from China, dairy products from New Zealand, Australia, and Belgium, and other farm products from these and other countries coming in now when they never did before and in such quantities as never before, he knows that the tariff did and does protect him directly as well as indirectly.

In this connection I saw in an editorial in the Washington Post this morning the following statement of imports of farm products:

> Compared with 1913, when the Payne-Aldrich law was in effect, the increases in imports for the 11 months of the fiscal year 1914 were as follows: Cattle, $11,968,347; corn, $9,774,179; oats, $7,984,053; meat and dairy products, $30,453,388; vegetables, $4,791,525; wool, $30,136,171; and wheat $1,473,040.
> Those figures support in detail the general statements I have just made.

In the campaign the free use of the Panama Canal by our coastwise shipping was held out as a great boon to the farmer. He was told it would bring him cheaper transportation, and of course that would be a substantial benefit. President Wilson, in one of his speeches, referring to this matter, said:

> We do not want the railroads to compete with themselves, because we understand that kind of competition. We want water carriage to compete with land carriage, so as to be perfectly sure that you—farmers—are going to get better rates around the canal than you would across the continent. * * * and what I am most desirous to see is the farmers of the country coming forward as partners in the great national undertaking. * * * Everything that is done in the interest of cheap transportation is done directly for the farmer as well as for other men.

Mr. Wilson was right in his campaign. A free and unfettered waterway would be of great benefit to the farmers whose products must be hauled by land as well as by water. It would mean lower freight rates by rail as well as by ship. Stump speeches and platform promises were forgotten and the repeal of the toll-exemption provision was ordered. Congress obeyed, and the canal instead of being an unfettered competitor of the railroads was burdened in their interest. Transcontinental railroads have been protected at the expense of the farmer and other producers of the country, and the Panama Canal instead of being a regulator of freight rates has been made an instrument by which the railroads of the country will increase the burden of taxation not only upon the farmer but upon all the people.

The farmer's produce is carried to market largely by the railroads. An increase in the freight rates increases his burden. The railroads of a large section of the country a short time ago sought permission of the Interstate Commerce Commission to raise their rates. Pressure from every source was brought to bear to bring this about. An early decision was urged so that if the increase was granted it would be imposed upon the large crop of the present year. What was the attitude of the President? Was he for the farmers and producers of the country or was he for permitting the railroads to increase the taxes upon the people? The press of the country, under date of June 1, carried an account of the general weekly meeting of the correspondents with the President, at which he talks freely with them, and in it this statement was made:

> President Wilson indicated to-day that he would not be dissatisfied if the Interstate Commerce Commission allowed the railroads the 5 per cent freight rate increase they are seeking. * * * Mr. Wilson left no doubt in the minds of those who talked to him that he was in favor of the increase.

And, Mr. President, this occurred long before the war was ever thought of.

This was not the treatment the farmers had a right to expect from a Democratic administration. Instead of an increase in railroad rates, if any change were to be made, they had a right to expect a decrease. In its platform the Democratic Party said:

> We favor legislation which will assure such reductions in transportation rates as conditions will permit.

Of course this did not promise reductions, but this was the impression it was intended to convey, and the times and conditions then under Republican policies would warrant a decrease rather than an increase, and it was only after a Democratic administration was assured that conditions began to change so as to threaten the railroads with the necessity for an increase. All lines of business had become depressed, and it was hardly fair that the railroads should be permitted to shift their burden entirely upon the farmers and the rest of the people. Efforts have not ceased to secure this raise. War has come across the water. The distress that had come to the railroads prior to June 30 may be aggravated as is the distress in other lines of business. They are taking advantage of the situation. A few days ago several railroad officials called on the President. They impressed him with their need. He wrote a letter expressing his sympathy and now, armed with this, they have applied to the Interstate Commerce Commission for a rehearing. And this administration, pledged to the people's interest, seems to be willing that when all industries are depressed the railroads may insure their prosperity by taxing the people by increasing freight rates. Surely farmers and business men did not expect this when they voted the Democratic ticket two years ago. Nor can this situation be blamed to the war. It was on us before, and is the result of Democratic legislation.

Special hope was held out to the farmers in the last campaign by the Democratic Party in a matter of great consequence to the farmers. One of his great needs is long-time loans at a low rate of interest. Systems of rural credit have been adopted in other countries that have resulted in great good, and our farmers were getting interested in that subject. Recognizing this the Democratic Party said in its platform:

Of equal importance with the question of currency reform is the question of rural credits or agricultural finance.

And the President, in his message of December 2, 1913, said, in addressing Congress:

I present to you in addition the urgent necessity that special provision be made also for facilitating the credits needed by the farmers of the country. * * * What they need and should obtain is legislation which will make their own abundant and substantial credit resources available as a foundation for joint, concerted local action in their own behalf in getting the capital they must use. It is to this we should now address ourselves. * * * We must add the means by which the farmer may make his credit constantly and easily available, and command when he will the capital by which to support and expand his business. We lag behind many other great countries of the modern world in attempting to do this. Systems of rural credit have been studied and developed on the other side of the water while we left our farmers to shift for themselves in the ordinary money market. You have but to look about you in any rural district to see the result, the handicap and embarrassment which have been put upon those who produce our food.

Legislation of this kind would be of real substantial benefit to the farmers, collectively and individually. The currency act was passed. What has been done on this question "of equal importance with the question of currency reform"? Under a Republican President a commission was appointed to go to Europe and study the systems and conditions there. It made its investigation and submitted its report. All the data necessary for the solution of the question were available. If the Republicans had continued in control, the question would have been taken up and legislation worked out. Nothing has been done. Why was this question not settled in the currency act? That would have been the time to take it up. When we were caring for the bankers it would have been well to help the farmers. Nothing was done except to permit the banker to loan money to the farmer on his real estate at a high rate of interest. Nothing more was done because the President opposed it. He did not want a rural-credit provision put in the currency act, and assured Members of the House, through Representative UNDERWOOD, that if it were not put in this bill he would do all in his power to have it passed this session, pursuant to the platform promise. After the passage of the currency act the Democratic members of the House and Senate committees got together, held hearings, considered the report of the commission, and agreed upon a bill which it was hoped would establish a rural-credit system under which the resources of the farmers might be made available for improvement and development. Did the President favor its passage? Did he urge early action? Did he use in behalf of the farmer the great power which he has so freely used in behalf of finance and big business? Not at all. He killed the bill. The bill prepared and introduced on behalf of the subcommittee did not suit him, and the Democratic caucus, which has been the pliant instrument to insure the execution of the Executive will, rejected this as a part of the legislative program.

In the Washington Post of May 13 appeared an article headed:

House under whip—Caucus heeds the President and writes program—Antitrust bill dominant—Prohibition and woman suffrage barred for this session—Representative RAGSDALE charges Chief Executive with bad faith in refusing to accept rural-credits legislation on schedule—Meeting is one of stormiest ever seen in Capitol—UNDERWOOD promises to bring in gag rules—Democrats of the House in caucus last night, at the bidding of the President, adopted a program for the rest of the session which practically obligates them to devote their time exclusively to antitrust legislation and the annual appropriation bills.

In this article was the following:

RAGSDALE ASSAILS PRESIDENT.

While many individual Democrats sought to be heard last night, the most obstreperous of all was Representative RAGSDALE, a member of the Banking and Currency Committee, who had his heart set on rural-credits legislation at this session. He made an impassioned speech, in which he said the President had refused to accept the rural-credits bill because the subcommittee of the Banking and Currency Committee would not draft it according to the President's dictation. The President, he said, demanded the withdrawal of all governmental aid from rural-credit banks and the subcommittee insisted upon the Government sponsoring the banks.

"The President would not include the bill in the program because the subcommittee did not do his bidding," said Mr. RAGSDALE. "We were promised when the currency bill passed that rural-credits legislation would be put through at this session. The farmer has lost out, as I expected."

The press at this time was full of similar reports, and there is no question that the foregoing is a correct statement of the situation. The bill was shelved. No further attempts were made to pass it. The legislation was dropped and another plank in the platform that was not "molasses to catch flies" was disregarded after it had served its purpose. If the President had said the word, it would have been taken up, considered, amended, put in proper shape, and passed. Every effort is made to aid "big business," to remove its fears, dispel its dangers, and tide it over feared and threatened troubles by emergency measures passed under whip and spur, but no relief, no assistance is given to the farmer. He must be satisfied with the "psychological" treatment.

The farmer is interested in good roads. Their importance is more and more realized. They would be of substantial benefit to every consumer and every producer. Money spent by which larger loads can be hauled to or from market at greater speed means money in the pockets of the men who do more than any others in the production of the wealth of the country and in supplying its necessities. It means more schoolhouses, better churches, more comfortable homes, and more contented and patriotic citizens. The Democrats recognized the sentiment for good roads, and in their platform promised national aid in the improvement and maintenance of the post roads of the country. An 18 months' session of Congress is about to close, and no relief is in sight. No message has come urging this important matter. It is no part of the program. A bill did pass the House, a sort of makeshift, and went to the Senate committee. That committee reported only a short time ago and presents an entirely new proposition, one permitting the States to borrow money and expend it for good roads. Whatever the merits of this proposition, it is plain that nothing is to be done. No attempt is being made to pass it this session, and it will be easy to kill it next session. What reason is given for not enacting some legislation of this kind? Some of the friends of the President who are interested in this legislation have been told that there is no money. That is the plea offered to many meritorious measures, while others neither urgent nor necessary are passed.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. JONES. I do not like to refuse to yield, but I should really prefer to conclude these remarks.

Mr. THOMAS. I merely wish to say this: The Senator has just given us the comforting assurance that after an 18 months' session the Senate is about to adjourn. I am delighted to hear that statement, and I could not forbear interrupting to ask the basis of it.

Mr. JONES. The Senator evidently was not here when I began, because I said "when we adjourn, if we ever do"; I have no assurance about it.

The people want economy, but they do not count that economy which by withholding a few thousands imposes a burden of hundreds of thousands. Again, the farmer sees a platform promise made in his interest neglected and disregarded. A Republican Congress will take the reports of the commission of the Sixty-second Congress and work out this problem for the benefit of all.

What has this administration done for the farmers? Nothing; but it has done much to them, as they all know. A mere "sop" was thrown to them in the Clayton Act when it was declared that the existence of agricultural organizations for mutual help and not for profit and lawfully acting to carry out its legitimate objects should not be held or construed to be contrary to the Sherman law. The farmers never asked any such declaration. They did not need it, and they will not be fooled by it. It was the law before the act was passed, and no court ever has held or would hold otherwise.

There is a strong feeling among our people that our immigration laws should be made much more stringent. While we sympathize with the poor and needy of every land, we must look to our own preservation and the preservation of our own institutions and ideals, and, as a matter of self-defense, we must protect ourselves from those of other nations whose mode of living, aspirations, ideas of government, ideals, and beliefs are inimical to those which have made us great. While recognizing that ignorance is not necessarily a badge of dishonesty, viciousness, or undesirability, our people are satisfied that on the whole the higher the average of education and intelligence of our people the better for their happiness, stability, and progress. Our farmers and our laborers especially have strongly urged the passage of more stringent immigration laws. In the Sixty-second Congress a bill was passed meeting the sentiment of the country, but it was vetoed by the President, and became quite an issue in the campaign of 1912. It was thought the views of Mr. Wilson were certain and well known. In his History of the American People, volume 5, page 212, he says:

The census of 1890 showed the population of the country increased to 62,622,250, an addition of 12,456,467 within the decade. Immigrants poured steadily in as before, but with an alteration of stock which students of affairs marked with uneasiness. Throughout the century men of the sturdy stocks of the north of Europe had made up the main strain of foreign blood which was every year added to the vital working force of the country, or else men of the Latin-Gallic stocks of France and northern Italy; but now there came multitudes of men of the lowest class from the south of Italy and men of the meaner sort out of Hungary and Poland—men out of the ranks where there was neither skill nor energy nor any initiative of quick intelligence—and they came in numbers which increased from year to year, as if the countries of the south of Europe were disburdening themselves of the more sordid and hapless elements of their population, the men whose standards of life and of work were such as American workmen had never dreamed of hitherto. The people of the Pacific coast had clamored these many years against the admission of immigrants out of China, and in May, 1892, got at last what they wanted—a Federal statute which practically excluded from the United States all Chinese who had not already acquired the right of residence; and yet the Chinese were more to be desired, as workmen, if not as citizens, than most of the coarse crew that came crowding in every year at the eastern ports.

On September 5, 1912, after his nomination for the Presidency, he is reported in the papers to have said, in an address before the Association of Foreign Language Newspapers in New York City, September 4:

I am speaking to you as also Americans with myself, and just as much American as myself, and if we all take the American point of view, namely, that we want American life kept to its standards, and that only the standards of American life shall be standards of restriction then we are all upon a common ground, not of those who criticize immigration, but those who declare themselves Americans. * * * Of course, if the immigrants are allowed to come in uninstructed hosts and to stop at the ports where they enter and there to compete in an oversupplied labor market, there is going to be unhappiness; there is going to be deterioration; there is going to be everything that will be detrimental to the immigrant.

From these statements the people had a right to believe that the President was in sympathy with the sentiment of the country and with the bill which had passed Congress and which the Immigration Commission and practically every disinterested and thoughtful student of the question believed would accomplish the very result which he says should be accomplished by restriction and without injury to any specially deserving people. What is his attitude now? A bill passed the House and came to the Senate and was referred to a committee which, after much delay, reported it favorably. Rumors were heard and statements made from time to time that the President was opposed to the bill and that it would not become a law. The Washington Post on February 17 contained an article headed:

WILSON TO VETO IT—HE DOOMS THE LITERACY TEST IN AN IMMIGRATION LAW, BUT CONGRESS GOES AHEAD.

The article says:

President Wilson will veto the Burnett immigration bill if it comes to him for signature with the so-called literacy test contained in it. * * * Prospects are that the bill will pass the Senate as reported from the committee, but the measure never will become law, according to close friends of the President.

The Boston Transcript has an article in its issue of February 17, relating to the immigration bill, in which it is said:

Prospects are that the bill will pass the Senate as reported from the committee, but the measure never will become law, according to close friends of the President.

Other newspaper statements of the same date could be quoted to the same effect, and it has been suggested in several articles that the Democrats in Congress have been urging other legislation to prevent a vote on the immigration bill.

The New York Tribune of June 8 had a dispatch under a Washington date line of June 7, as follows:

The haste with which the Democratic members of the Interstate Commerce Committee launched the administration antitrust legislation in the Senate by reporting the bill for a trade commission has led to the suspicion that the President and some, if not most, of his followers are trying to evade the dilemma presented by the immigration bill.

And in another body, in the consideration of a provision in the appropriation bill for the Immigration Service, it was said that it is "of vast importance to prevent the Immigration Service from being cramped, even if we are forced to allow the cold hand of death to be laid by order of the President on the immigration bill."

No efforts have been made to pass it. The President's will is law and it will not be passed. No such legislation can be hoped for through the Democratic Party. The farmers and laborers who expected this legislation through that party have trusted in a "broken reed."

Mr. President, with reference to this particular matter, I have some data of considerable interest. The labor organizations, farmers' organizations, various patriotic societies, and so forth, are very anxious about this measure. They do not understand why it has been pending here in the Senate with a favorable report and nothing done. They do not know what the attitude of the President is. They have seen the newspaper reports to which I have referred, and they do not know whether to believe them or not. They have been endeavoring to learn from an authoritative source the attitude of the President with reference to this very important measure.

I have here a copy of a letter, under date of June 22, 1914, sent to the President by Mr. H. M. Walker, chairman of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Engineers' Joint Protective Board, New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad, calling attention to these reports in the papers, and asking the President, if possible, for a statement with reference to his attitude regarding this measure. I ask that I may print it in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, that order will be made.

The letter is as follows:

DORCHESTER, MASS., June 22, 1914.

President WILSON,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

Mr. PRESIDENT: The "press" reports being more or less conflicting about your attitude toward the immigration bill gives us some apprehension over the outcome of the bill if the Senate passes it unamended with the illiteracy test in the same form as the bill passed the House on the 4th of February. Our organization, in convention held June, 1914, in Washington, D. C., officially indorsed this bill, and its representatives have appeared personally before the House Committee on Immigration and urged the passage of the bill with the illiteracy test in it.

Organized labor generally has advocated the need of placing some restrictions upon immigration. Competition between the employed and unemployed grows fiercer year by year, and we believe that the time has arrived when our Government must close its doors against the influx of illiterate immigrants until such time, at least, as our Nation's educational institutions may be able to educate the illiterates now within its dominion. One of labor's "corner stones" is education, and its attitude on this question must be inflexible if our social stability is to be preserved.

You are quoted as saying that you favored "reasonable restriction," and in behalf of the members of this organization and labor in general, I respectfully urge you to construe the illiteracy test as being the most reasonable restriction to be put upon immigration and to use every honorable effort to make the bill a law.

Very respectfully, yours,

H. M. WALKER,
Chairman B. of L. F. & E. Joint Protective Board,
N. Y., N. H. & H. Railroad.

Mr. JONES. I have here also a copy of another letter sent to the President, which was called forth by an advertisement, of which the following is a copy:

Licensed and bonded. EDWARD HORVATH LABOR AGENCY,
New York, October 4, 1913.

S. E. & H. L. SHEPERD CO., Rockport, Me.

GENTLEMEN: Foreign laborers are now available in this city for less wages than you can secure men for in your State.

Are you in need of any? If so, we can offer for immediate shipment any number of them of any desired nationality. Trusting to hear from you, we are,

Very truly, yours. M. ENGEL, Manager.

As I say, this advertisement led to communications being sent to the President with reference to this important measure, and I ask that I may insert them in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be done in the absence of objection.

The letter is as follows:

President WOODROW WILSON,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

Mr. PRESIDENT: It is reported that you are holding up the 60-page immigration bill containing legislation recommended by the Congressional Immigration Commission, after four years' searching investigation and so ably argued for by President Gompers, Secretary Morrison, John Mitchell, and others.

The 40-volume report of the Immigration Commission completely corroborated organized labor's contention that the present enormous influx of illiterates lowered wages, lengthened hours, increased insanitation, multiplied mine explosions and industrial accidents, and seriously interfered with the uplift work trade-unionism is doing.

Last year 1,427,227 aliens entered this country. Only 18,000 of these were "farmers." Such a number, when they could not speak our language, and a large part could not read any, was bound to injure the working people already here, whether native or foreign. It is no wonder labor agencies advertise workers "of any nationality" at "less wages" and for longer hours than any workers here will work for. Mr. President, the working people and their families need this legislation. It is needed for the protection of the aliens inveigled to come as well as us. You said during the campaign that the "standards of American life should be the standards of restriction" and that we must look at the question "from the standpoint of Americans." On behalf of a large number of workers and an organization with a considerable membership, I earnestly urge that you help put this needed illiteracy test law, that the American Federation of Labor has indorsed so often and our officials have so unanswerably argued for, upon the statute books this session, for we were led to believe by your friendliness and that of your party and your own words that you were in favor of such legislation.

Very truly, ——— ———.

P. S.—Inclosed please find resolution adopted by our organization.

Mr. JONES. The only acknowledgment received by these parties of these various letters and telegrams which they sent to the President was an acknowledgment from the Secretary to the President, merely stating that if the bill comes before the President for official action it will have his very careful consideration. I ask to print in full that letter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, May 13, 1914.

Mr. G. G. SHUMWAY,
Falls City, Nebr.

MY DEAR SIR: Permit me to acknowledge the receipt of your telegram of May 12, and to assure you that if the bill to which you refer comes before the President for official action it will have very careful consideration.

Very truly, yours, J. P. TUMULTY,
Secretary to the President.

Mr. JONES. It seems that these letters were finally referred to the Department of Labor, and upon a printed form the Acting Commissioner General acknowledged receipt of one under date of April 22, 1914:

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
BUREAU OF IMMIGRATION,
Washington, April 22, 1914.

Mr. THEODORE B. WARDWELL,
Secretary-Treasurer Worcester Div. 64, B. of L. E., 11½ Hammond Street, Worcester, Mass.

SIR: The receipt of your letter dated April 16, 1914, addressed to the President, in relation to the Burnett immigration bill, is hereby acknowledged.

Respectfully,
F. H. LARNED,
Acting Commissioner General.

Under date of May 1, 1914, on a carbon written letter, apparently a carbon copy, made when other letters were written, I presume in the interest of economy—the saving of something to the Government—carbon copies were used in answering these communications, acknowledgment of one of these letters to the President was made by the Department of Labor. The letter is signed by the Acting Commissioner General of Immigration. I ask that it may be inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MYERS in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
BUREAU OF IMMIGRATION,
Washington, May 1, 1914.

Mr. E. L. BEAN,
1156 Jefferson Street, Paducah, Ky.

DEAR SIR: The bureau is in receipt of your letter dated April 14, addressed to the President, in relation to the Burnett immigration bill, and has placed the same in file, with other papers relating to the same subject.

Very truly, yours,
F. H. LARNED,
Acting Commissioner General.

Mr. JONES. In this connection I also desire to call the attention of the Senate to an interview in the Cincinnati Times-Star of September 19, written by Gus J. Karger, staff correspondent, and purporting to give a statement made by the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], who is the chairman of the Committee on Immigration. I will not read all of this article; it is not all a quotation from the Senator from South Carolina.

The correspondent goes on to say the general impression seems to be that because of the breaking out of hostilities in Europe this will solve the immigration question, and we will not need any legislation; but he says:

SMITH WILL PUSH BILL.

But with the return of Senator SMITH a different view has been presented. During his absence Congressman JOHN L. BURNETT, of Alabama, chairman of the House Committee on Immigration, tried in vain to interest the Senate in the pending bill. The House passed it more than six months ago, the Senate committee has approved it, but the Senate itself, taken up with other measures, some of them of an alleged emergency character, declined to take the measure from the calendar. The pending Burnett-Smith immigration bill is pretty much the same as the one that passed Congress when William H. Taft was President. Mr. Taft vetoed it because of the literacy test it provided. There has been a good deal of speculation as to whether President Wilson wouldn't take the same attitude, his private utterances and many of his writings before he became President of the United States, lending themselves to speculation of that character. In the Congress the opposition to the measure has been of decidedly uncompromising character and all over the country sentiment with regard to it has been sharply divided. Leaders of Congress were quick, therefore, to interpret the European situation as obviating the necessity of action at this session of Congress. The bill was "loaded," politically, and they would cheerfully avail themselves of any pretext for postponing its further consideration.

But Senator SMITH declares that they must meet the issue, and that they must meet it before adjournment of this session of Congress. He disagrees entirely with the interpretation of the immigration situation which has been adopted by these students of conditions that are to result from the war in Europe "As soon as peace has been restored," he argues, "Europe will dump untold thousands of her people on the United States. Nor will the best elements of European society be attracted here. Much of the riffraff will seek admission to this country. We must be on the qui vive now, as we never were before. There will not be much immigration to this country while the war is in progress, but once it is terminated the rush will be bigger than ever, and we must be prepared to exercise restrictive measures.' And Congressman BURNETT fully agrees with him.

WILL HOLD UP OTHER LEGISLATION.

"Therefore," said Senator SMITH, "you may serve notice on the country that I shall push for consideration of the immigration bill at this session of Congress. I will not be denied. I shall insist that the Senate act on it, and if I am opposed, I shall, if necessary, hold up everything else until this most momentous question is taken up for consideration."

Mr. OVERMAN. What is the date of that interview?

Mr. JONES. September 19—over half a month ago. Then the correspondent makes a quotation from Commissioner of Immigration Caminetti, which I ask may be inserted in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Although general opinion seems to have leaned toward the theory that the war, for a good many years, will curtail European immigration, Mr. Anthony Caminetti, Commissioner of Immigration, is of other opinion, supporting the views of Senator SMITH and Congressman BURNETT, heretofore referred to. "When peace is declared," he said, "the flow of immigrants to this country from Europe will be very much quickened. After the war business depression will continue, and it will drive many of the poorer classes to seek refuge here. Many of the thousands of foreigners who left the United States to take part in the war will return. The normal flow of immigrants prior to the war was about 90,000 a month. After the war this figure will not only be exceeded, in my opinion, but the immigration that may be expected will break all known and established records. In immigration we have had our six banner years since 1900. Since 1820, when we first began to compile immigration records, the number of immigrants admitted in the course of one year has exceeded 1,000,000 six times. The year 1907 was the greatest immigration year in our history, 1,285,349 aliens being admitted. Last year the number was above 1,218,000. During the other four years in question immigration fluctuated between 1,000,000 and 1,198,000. Perhaps, even with a quickened flow of immigration, the record will not be exceeded, but we must prepare to meet all eventualities. It is just possible that the resumption of agriculture and commerce in Europe following the establishment of peace will keep a great number at home who otherwise would come to the United States."

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the record will show that absolutely nothing has been done and no efforts have been made to take up this bill. If the junior Senator from South Carolina is correctly quoted, he will need to get busy very soon, because, I understand, the rumor is that the program is expected to be completed with the Clayton bill and the tax-revenue bill, so that there will be nothing to hold us here after those are disposed of, and nothing for him to hold up; and it looks like there will be no opportunity for the passage of this legislation at the present session.

I wish to say, Mr. President, that I am very reliably informed that those interested in this legislation have letters from 73 of the Senators of the present Congress assuring those interested of their favor and of their support for this legislation. There is only one inference that can be drawn from this fact and from the fact that nothing has been done, and that is that there is a power beyond and outside of this body which prevents the consideration and passage of such legislation and that the statements in the paper as to opposition to the bill are correct.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator yield to me there?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator think we ought to stay and pass that bill?

Mr. JONES. I think we ought to have passed it a long time ago.

Mr. OVERMAN. But after we get through with the Clayton bill and the tax bill does the Senator think we ought to stay here and pass that bill?

Mr. JONES. I think it would be better.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator thinks it would be better to stay here?

Mr. JONES. Yes; what is the use of going away now?

Mr. OVERMAN. A great many Senators want to go away, as the Senator knows.

Mr. JONES. I should like to have gone away some time ago, but if you do not adjourn until the 15th or 20th, it will take me a week to get home, and I could not get around much in that time.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator, I understand, is perfectly willing to stay here to pass that bill?

Mr. JONES. I am; but I do not expect to have very many of the 73 Senators with me, and I think I can very safely express that desire. I do not think the proposed immigration law will keep us here. We may stay here, but it will not be that bill which will keep us.

Then, Mr. President, we have passed during this session, as I figure it, something over 70 laws of a general character, and not a single law has been placed upon the statute books for the benefit of labor. That is significant in view of the Democratic professions on behalf of labor. There are some provisions in the conference report now pending that were accepted by the Senate without any division, and they are thrown to labor as a sort of sop, but labor understands this legislation. It understands that what is done in the Clayton antitrust bill is nothing more nor less than a declaration of the law as now construed and declared by the courts, and that if it does anything it may throw these questions again into the courts and allow them to remain there in an uncertain state possibly for years. So there is nothing in that.

Labor would like to have a seaman's bill passed. Not only the laboring people but the people of the country generally are asking for such a measure in the interest of those who tread the seas. It passed the Senate, it came back to the Senate with a substitute, and the substitute, I understand, has gone to the committee, and is "sleeping the sleep," and no action, apparently, is contemplated on this important measure.

Then, labor has been asking for an amendment to the boiler-inspection law. The Republican administration passed laws of this kind, but some amendments have been considered necessary. They have been pending, and yet no action has been taken upon them.

Then they are very anxious for a law to prohibit convict-made goods from passing from one State to another or from being imported into the country. Yet no legislation of that kind is enacted.

Then they want a workmen's compensation act. Mr. President, I have to apologize to the people of my State with reference to that proposition. In the campaign of 1912 I told the people that the compensation measure was not a party measure; that Republicans and Democrats both were in favor of it, and that, in my judgment, before the close of the short session of the Congress the compensation bill that was pending would be passed and enacted into law. That was not done, and the failure to do it was due to the Democratic opposition on the floor of the Senate in the closing hours of that session, when a filibuster was threatened against that measure, and it had to be abandoned after a conference committee had adjusted the difference between the two Houses and reported.

What has been done with reference to a compensation law for labor during this session of Congress? Absolutely nothing. There has not even been a committee report in favor of the proposition.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator knows that the laboring people of the country in their convention changed their minds in regard to that bill. After resolving for it a year or more ago when it was before the Senate they have since that time passed a resolution protesting against the passage of that bill. Does not the Senator know that fact?

Mr. JONES. They may have done it as to that particular bill; I do not know; but they have not protested against legislation of that character. Must we drop the whole general system because there is opposition to a particular bill? We should take up the bill and, if possible, meet their objections. They want the legislation. They are urging such legislation, and, in my judgment, the great majority of the labor organizations of the country would prefer even that bill to no legislation at all. We are derelict in our duty if we do not try to frame legislation that will meet the situation. It is of the greatest importance. It is just and humane legislation and would be of great benefit to labor and their families.

Mr. OVERMAN. I wish to say to the Senator that the bill is pending before the Judiciary Committee, and the Senator knows the condition of business on our calendar, and the labor people are not agitating it as much as they did before.

Mr. JONES. I know the bill is pending. The bills have been introduced, and we have not even a committee report upon this very important measure. I consider this measure and some of the measures referred to as far more important than the legislation that we have enacted or that we are attempting to enact.

Mr. President, none of the legislation in which labor is really interested has yet become a law, and none that will give it rights it does not now possess or that will bring it any additional benefits will be passed at this session.

Mr. President, aside from the act extending the time for payments under the reclamation law, this Congress has passed no legislation that will be of any direct, real benefit to any needy individual. Its whole time has been given to legislation primarily in the interest and for the benefit of the strong, the powerful, and the wealthy, leaving whatever benefit there may be to the people to come indirectly. The evils of the tariff law have fallen heaviest upon the poor and the weak. While for some reason that I can not understand labor or its leaders have favored the Democratic tariff policy, they have now had an object lesson which, it seems to me, should outweigh all theories or preconceived notions. During the first seven months of this year labor saw the products of foreign toil placed in our markets by the millions of dollars' worth, and he has been without work. He has seen our industries depressed and his wages or hours of employment reduced. This is the inevitable result of buying abroad. When we buy goods made abroad that can be made at home we employ foreign labor and our own labor is idle. This means poverty, suffering, distress, and "skimping" in the home. If he wants this to continue and get worse, he will vote to continue a policy that furnishes employment for the foreigner and brings idleness to himself. If he wants it to cease, he will vote for the policy that furnishes him employment and good wages.

Our currency law is primarily for the capitalist, the moneyed man, and the banker. No poor man can get a loan any easier or at a less rate of interest than before. I fear the system gives the money power a greater control over the finances of the country than ever before. When directors of the International Harvester Trust and members of Wall Street railroad-wrecking firms are placed on the Federal Reserve Board there is little hope that this great system will be operated to the advantage of the farmer, the laborer, or the man of small means.

The Panama tolls exemption was in the interest of every shipper and consumer in the land; its repeal will benefit only the transcontinental railroads and place a burden and a tax upon all our people.

The Trade Commission act deals only with those engaged in interstate commerce. The poor man does not do this. Only the rich and comparatively powerful carry on this business. This legislation is to protect strong interests from each other. It is all right, as far as it goes, but the ordinary citizen, the individual farmer, laborer, and merchant will pay the taxes necessary to defray the cost of the expensive machinery provided and will never be able to discover any benefits from it. And so it is with the other legislation. No ordinary citizen in the ordinary business pursuits and daily walks of life can say "this or that helps me." After all is said and done, but little of the legislation that we have passed will bring a single joy to a sorrowing home, make life easier to a single overburdened toiler. It brings no ray of hope to the propertyless or jobless man. If we would spend some of our time in making it possible for the farmless man to use his honesty, industry, and frugality in getting some land and making him a home; if we would put forth some effort to make it possible for the man who works for a daily or monthly wage to secure a house and a home for himself and family, then we would help where help is needed, add to the sum of human happiness, and perform one of the highest and most beneficent functions of human government.

Contrast the character of this legislation with that of the last Republican administration. The Interstate Commerce Commission was given authority to determine and fix reasonable rates over common carriers This directly benefits the masses of the people, individual producers and consumers alike. A postal savings-bank system was provided. This is of special benefit to the men and women of small savings. It furnishes them a safe place for their savings at a small rate of interest and insures them their hard-earned money whenever they want it. The individual is helped and benefited. A Parcel Post System was put in operation and can be used by the humblest citizen. It will eventually be made one of the most effective agencies to bring closer together the producer and the consumer, and reduce the cost of living without reducing the price to the producer, but making it less to the consumer. A resolution for a constitutional amendment was passed and the amendment adopted, under which the people elect their Senators directly, thus giving to each individual voter more direct participation in the selection of the representatives of his State in the greatest deliberative body on earth. Another resolution was passed submitting an amendment, which was also adopted, under which it has been possible for a valid income tax to be levied against the wealth of the country. A Department of Labor was created, to look after and promote the needs and interests of labor individually and collectively. A Bureau of Mines was established, for the special purpose principally of promoting the welfare and safety of the individual miners. A Children's Bureau was formed, with the special object of conserving and making more pleasant child life The "white-slave law" was passed, for the protection of the home and the sanctity of womanhood. A workmen's compensation bill passed both Houses, but was defeated by Democratic opposition through a filibuster at the close of the Congress. This was a bill for the benefit of the individual and in the interest of his family, and, strange to say, no steps have been taken by the majority to pass such a measure this session. I must apologize to the people of my State. I said this bill would be passed, but it was not. These are but a few of the important measures passed. They are measures with heart and humanity in them; they are measures that make life better and happier for the individual; and such legislation the Republican Party can be depended upon to enact.

Mr. President, for years the Democracy has denounced the Republican doctrine of protection as robbery of the many for the benefit of the few. They have sought to destroy it, and in the Underwood tariff law they have gone a long way toward doing so. They have contended that if our people can not compete by their wit, industry, and efficiency in any line of production with the cheap labor of other countries they should cease their efforts in such industry and confine their labors to those industries in which they can compete. The conditions brought about by the war in Europe conclusively demonstrates the wisdom of the Republican policy and the folly of the Democratic theory.

Day after day special legislation is asked to meet the direful conditions in the cotton section. The fact that it is a one-crop section is given as the reason for its great distress and dire need. This is true. What they need to insure them against such great emergencies is diversity of crops and industry. If through protection the industries of the North and East and West had not been diversified, if during the last 50 years we had been following the Democratic theory of free trade and had confined our efforts to certain lines of industry, the conditions in the entire country to-day would have been simply appalling. By protection, however, our industries have been diversified and developed until we are practically self-supporting, and if protection had not been taken away we would have but little distress, little unemployment, and little fluctuation in prices. Protection to American industry and American labor is a great national necessity and not a purely private benefit.

We abandoned the policy of protection as to our merchant marine; we went for the cheapest transportation and allowed it to go into the hands and under the control of others. We have hundreds of millions of products for foreign markets and no way to get them there, and as a consequence our industries are threatened with stagnation and destruction, and our people will suffer almost incalculable loss. A merchant marine under our own flag is a national necessity. If we had built it up, even this war would have disturbed us but little. Our products would have been carried to market and revenues would have been kept up by imports. No frantically suggested and illy prepared legislation inviting foreign-built and foreign-manned ships to sail under our flag would have been necessary.

It was stated a few moments ago that our present condition is the result of the war in Europe Mr. President, whatever results come to us from the war in Europe in a business way come largely because of our neglect formerly to provide the means of transportation by which we would be independent of foreign countries in taking our products to market and bringing other products here. It lies further back than the war, Mr. President, and rests upon the very principle of protection to American industries and the diversification of our various lines of industry and employment.

The situation as to sugar demonstrates the necessity of the policy of protection and the fact that it is more for the public good than private advantage. The tariff on sugar has been the subject of special attack. It has been denounced as the robbery of the poor man for the benefit of the rich sugar barons. Provision has been made to take off the entire tax. What is the situation? The poor man, who consumes as much if not more sugar than the rich man, bears the burden of a tremendously increased price of sugar. He is paying much more for it or he is doing without. Why? Because we are dependent upon a foreign supply to satisfy our needs and because, under the legislation passed, the industry at home is being destroyed. We can not get from abroad, and our own people are going out of the business. We can produce, we ought to produce, and with proper encouragement we will produce all the sugar we need for our own use, and it will be supplied at low and reasonable rates. When the poor man does without sugar or pays for it 7 and 10 cents a pound, and remembers how he used to get it under protection at 4 and 5 cents per pound, he will ask for protected sugar and desire its production at home encouraged, not only that he may have cheaper sugar but also that American industry may be developed and stability brought to American enterprise.

Senators from the cotton States are almost frantic at the conditions that confront them. Not only do they want emergency legislation by Congress, but they are urging all sorts of unheard-of action by their people. Production must be curtailed, cotton must be bought and held from trade. The President, Senators, and Representatives are besought to buy a bale of cotton and hold it to keep it out of consumption. Men everywhere are beseeched to buy one bale of cotton and leave it in storage in order to help out. The people are being urged to diversify their crops in order to insure permanent stability, and everywhere is heard the slogan, "Buy home-made goods." These are but expressions of the essence of the principle of protection. If we will apply that principle now in our legislation, so that the people will know what to depend upon, countless new industries will be developed here while this war goes on that will continne after it closes, bringing happiness, wealth, employment, and prosperity to our people. Will we neglect this great opportunity because of a party fetich? We may do it in Congress, but the people of this country will not endure long any such unwise, unstatesmanlike, unpatriotic, and indefensible action. There are many important questions confronting our people, but this is the great, urgent, pressing question now. Settle it right, renew confidence, restore prosperity, bring employment, reinstate business stability, and then we can turn our attention to those social problems that need the undivided and patriotic attention of our lawmakers.

In his dealings with foreign nations I am with the President, right or wrong. As long as there may be danger of complications that might lead us into war, no word of criticism from me shall embarrass him in his dealings with foreign nations or foreign questions. Nor shall I seek party advantage from any mistakes that may have been made. His representatives seek party advantage from what he has done. They seek to turn patriotism into partisanship. In these things, however, he speaks for the Nation and not for any party or party policy, and behind him should be the Nation until his acts can be passed upon by our people without disturbing foreign relations.

In domestic matters I will support him when I think he is right and oppose him when I think he is wrong.

The party slogan now seems to be "Stand by the President." Our Democratic friends seem to be driven from everything else, feeling that their policies and legislation have been a failure, and knowing that throughout the country there is high respect for the President and for his intelligence and patriotism, they think they can win on that slogan. They are appealing to the people to stand by the President, when, as a matter of fact, the President is not involved in this contest, but Democratic candidates and Democratic policies.

Mr. President, I want to stand by the President, not, however, as an automaton, not as the bouncing figure of a Punch and Judy show, manipulated, moved, put into activity by some concealed, hidden hand. I want to stand by the President whenever I think and believe, with reference to domestic policies, that he is right but I will not stand by him upon domestic policies when I believe he is wrong. The people will stand by him when he is right. They do not want their representatives, no matter what party they belong to, to stand by the President in domestic policies, right or wrong. Representatives are sent here to represent the people and certain policies, not the President. If they are to represent him regardless of the people or whether he is right or wrong, why not send him a certificate to vote them as he sees fit, and save all their salaries, instead of a mere bagatelle, as proposed by some?

That he and his party are fundamentally wrong upon the great question of protection to American labor and American industry, and that they are incapable of dealing with the great questions of domestic concern in the interest of the people, I most firmly believe has been absolutely demonstrated during the last 18 months.

I have here a matter of interest, to Republicans at any rate, probably even to our Democratic friends. It is a copy of the platform prepared at the last Republican convention by those delegates who were favorable to the nomination of former President Roosevelt. This platform was prepared for adoption in case of his nomination by that convention. It is sent to me by former Gov. Hadley, of Missouri, and I want to print a letter from Gov. Hadley, together with this platform, in the RECORD. I desire to call it to the attention of those who are interested, and who see fit to compare this platform with the platform that was actually issued by the convention. You will see the remarkable similarity between the two platforms and the remarkable degree with which they coincide with each other, especially upon the important questions before the American people. There is substantially no difference in those platforms on the great vital important questions before the American people. It is a platform upon which all Republicans could stand. I do not think there is a proposition in it that I myself do not indorse heartily.

Mr. President, I want to say that opposite the planks relating to inheritance tax, and also with reference to the repeal of the Commerce Court and with reference to the Panama Canal, there were interrogation points. They were in this platform when it was handed to Gov. Hadley, and indicate that there might have been some doubt as to whether or not they should finally be adopted. The plank in relation to the Panama Canal was practically enacted into law by the last administration.

I ask that this letter and this platform may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WEST in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

LAW OFFICES HADLEY, COOPER & NEEL,
Denver, Colo., September 24, 1914.

Senator WESLEY L. JONES,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR JONES: I have finally secured my copy of the platform that was prepared by a committee of the Roosevelt supporters in the 1912 convention and inclose it to you herewith. I think I explained to you in my former letter that there was a committee on the platform selected from among the leading supporters of Col. Roosevelt in the 1912 convention, and this platform embodied the views of the members of that committee on the questions then before the American people. I was not a member of the committee that prepared the platform, being, as you may recall, otherwise reasonably well occupied, but as I was a member of the resolution committee from Missouri, this platform was given to me by some members of the committee that prepared it.

If you carry out your plan of placing this in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I think it might be well that you should also point out the lack of substantial difference upon questions of importance between this platform and the platform finally adopted.

There are some interlineal corrections or changes in the body of this platform that had been made before it was given to me. The numbers in the left margin are mine, but the question marks opposite the inheritance tax and railroad plank and Panama Canal were made before it came into my hands.

As this is the only copy of this platform that I know of I am taking the precaution of sending this letter to you by registered mail, and wish you would return it to me after you have made such use of it as you desire.

With best personal regards, I am

Yours, very truly, HERBERT S. HADLEY.

PREAMBLE.

Three score years ago in a national crisis, the Republican Party was born of the Nation's awakened sense of justice. In this time of grave national problems we dedicate ourselves anew to the fulfillment of the duty laid upon us by our fathers to maintain that government of the people, by the people, and for the people, for which they died.

We hold, with Abraham Lincoln, that the people are the masters of their Constitution to fulfill its purposes and to safeguard it from those who, by perversion of its intent, would convert it into an instrument to foster injustice. In accordance with the needs of each generation, the people must use its vital and sovereign powers to secure that social and industrial justice for which this Government was established and without which no Republic can endure.

A COVENANT WITH THE PEOPLE.

Political parties should exist only to secure and to maintain responsible and free government. They must not be used to facilitate control over the people by special interests. This platform is our covenant with the people, and we hereby pledge the public officers elected under it, including the President, the Vice President, and Members of Congress, to the fulfillment of the promises made herein.

POPULAR GOVERNMENT.

It is not only the right of the people to rule; it is their duty so to do. Unless that right and that duty are recognized, free government can not exist. Ours is a government of the people, by the people, and by them alone. We recognize no right to govern the people, contrary to their will, through any system of representation. The people must keep in their own possession the power to make their representatives actually represent them, and to do for themselves those things which their representatives may fail to do for them. In order to control their National Government, the people need and demand direct presidential preference primaries and the election of United States Senators by popular vote; and we pledge our party to meet those needs. In the several States this purpose must be met in varying fashion, according to the actual needs of each community; but the principle itself, the doctrine that the people must possess efficient means to make their deliberate will supreme over their Government and their public servants is applicable to every part of this Union.

EQUAL SUFFRAGE.

The welfare of the people of this country is as important to the women as to the men. We advocate equal suffrage for both.

SOCIAL AND INDUSTRIAL JUSTICE.

We demand that the Nation and the several States shall recognize as a vital function of government the task of securing for all a greater measure of social and industrial justice, so that more equal opportunity and greater welfare shall prevail among the citizens of the United States. We are not blind to the menace of social conditions such as those which Germany has legislated to prevent and which England is legislating to cure—underpayment, irregular employment, unhealthful working conditions, dearth of labor in some places and oversupply in others, and excessive and heartbreaking hours of work not only for women but for men, in certain industries. Both the farmers and the wageworkers have been neglected alike by State and Nation.

Therefore we demand the immediate enactment of laws for compensation for industrial injuries and deaths; to prohibit the labor of children; to protect seamen; to insure safe and healthful working conditions in mills, mines, and factories; and to make the sale or transportation of prison-made goods which are sent into interstate commerce subject to the prison labor laws of the State to which they are sent. We demand the enactment of such laws as will make the United States Government a model employer; we demand the concentration and strengthening of the existing agencies of the Federal Government dealing with the public health, that they may more efficiently perform their duties in the prevention of disease and accident; and we urge Federal cooperation with the several States in the collection and dissemination of all information adapted to promote the general social welfare.

PURE FOOD.

We believe in, and therefore demand, a vigorous enforcement of the pure-food laws, to the end that the men, women, and children of this country may be neither robbed nor poisoned by the adulteration or substitution of foods, drinks, and medicines.

BUSINESS.

We believe that in true popular government justice and prosperity go hand in hand. It is our purpose to secure that large measure of general prosperity which is the fruit of legitimate and honest business fostered by equal justice and by sound progressive laws. There can be no proper division of prosperity unless there is prosperity to divide.

The test of true prosperity is the benefit conferred thereby on the plain citizens; the test of corporate efficiency is the ability better to serve the public. The corporation is an essential part of modern business. The concentration of business in some degree is both inevitable and necessary for business efficiency and continued prosperity; but the existing concentration of vast wealth, unguarded and uncontrolled by the Nation, has placed in the hands of a few men enormous secret, irresponsible power over their competitors, the general business world, and the public—a power not to be tolerated in a free Government, and certain of abuse. This power has been abused in fraudulent acquisition and monopoly of natural resources, in stock watering, in unfair competition and unfair privileges, and in sinister influence upon the public agencies in the State and Nation. No single State can control these great interstate corporations. The Nation alone can and must control them. Therefore we demand Federal supervision and control of all large corporations engaged in interstate commerce. To that end we urge the creation of a strong Federal administrative commission which shall exercise effective permanent supervision over such corporations, in many respects similar to that now exercised over the national banks and interstate carriers. The basis of the work of such a commission must be full publicity as to all corporate transactions of public interest. It must have power to prevent overcapitalization and to impose regulations that will make clear the rules of corporate conduct. By continuous watchfulness it must guard and keep open to all our citizens the field of American commerce and industry. The effort to control corporations by legislation alone has failed. It must be supplemented by effective regulation such as we now propose.

TARIFF.

We believe in a protective tariff. The Republican tariff policy has been of the greatest benefit to the country, developing our resources and the strength of our national life, by the diversity of industry which it has encouraged and by the protection of our workmen against unequal competition with cheap labor abroad. The protective tariff is so woven in the fabric of our national life that to substitute for it a tariff for revenue only would destroy whole industries and throw millions of our people out of employment. But modern conditions call for a downward revision of those tariff schedules wherein duties have been or may be shown to be indefensible or excessive. We pledge the party to such a tariff revision, schedule by schedule, with as much speed as may be found compatible with results fair to the consumer, the laborer, and the producer and manufacturer. We demand that such a revision shall be based upon the findings of a permanent, expert, nonpartisan tariff commission, whose duty it shall be to furnish to the President and to Congress the best information obtainable as to the relative costs of production at home and abroad, without delay, and whose recommendation would form the foundation for public confidence in the justice and wisdom of the legislation proposed.

While we hold that a protective tariff is for the mutual protection of capital and labor, we also hold that the interests of the consumer must be equally considered. In order to encourage industry there must be reasonable profit and the benefit of the tariff should rightly show itself in reasonable dividends, but a full share of the benefits must also appear in the pay envelope of the wage earner, the prosperity of the farmer, and the general standard of living. It should be the business of some Government body to see to this.

COMMERCIAL DEVELOPMENT.

The time has come when American merchants may rightly expect a far larger share of the world's trade than in the past. We believe that the Federal Government, by organized and scientific effort, should cooperate with the manufacturers and producers of the country in extending our foreign commerce. To this end we demand adequate appropriations by Congress, and the appointment of diplomatic and consular officers solely with a view to their special fitness and worth, and not in consideration of political expediency.

INCOME TAX.

We demand that a national income tax shall be established, so graduated as to place the heavier burden of taxation upon those who, by reason of their larger incomes, are under the greatest obligation to the public. We believe that an income-tax law may be devised which, under the decisions of the Supreme Court, will be found in conformity with the Constitution, but in order to avoid all doubt we favor the adoption of the constitutional amendment providing for an income tax which is now before the people.

INHERITANCE TAX.

We believe in a graduated inheritance tax as a national means of equalizing the obligations of holders of property to the Government which protects them in their possession of that property, and we hereby pledge our party to enact such a Federal law as will tax large inheritances which evade or escape State taxation, returning to the States an equitable percentage of all amounts collected by the Federal Government.

CURRENCY.

Our currency and banking systems are wholly inadequate to our needs; money is unduly concentrated in the great centers; the volume of currency can not easily be regulated, nor can money readily be distributed to meet the requirements of trade and the movement of products. Credit, although readily obtained for great enterprises controlled by interrelated banking and business interests, is too often used for purposes of speculation and stock gambling; but it is difficult and often impossible for the smaller or independent producers and manufacturers to obtain for legitimate enterprises the credit to which they are entitled. Rates of discount and interest are too irregular and differ too widely in various portions of the country. Bank reserves, as now held, instead of being elements of strength and safety in times of panic, are sources of weakness.

We pledge our party to the enactment of such legislation as will remedy these conditions. This legislation must be based upon direct, effective Federal regulation. It must preserve independent banks from the domination of any group or groups of great financial interests. It must provide for a system of issuing and retiring currency based upon legitimate commercial transactions, and must meet the requirements of agriculture, industry, and commerce in every section of the country. Finally, and most important of all, it must assure to the people of the United States, through their Government, the control of the financial system of the country.

RAILROADS.

In order that the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission to protect the people may not be impaired or destroyed, we demand the abolition of the Commerce Court.

We believe, and therefore demand, that the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be extended to include the power to regulate the capitalization of railroads and so prevent the issue of watered railroad stocks, encourage honest capitalization, increase the safety and stability of railroad securities as investments for the people, and strengthen the financial condition of the roads.

PANAMA CANAL.

The Panama Canal, built and paid for by the American people, must be used primarily for their benefit. If rightly administered, it will have the power to break the transportation monopoly now held and misused by the transcontinental railroads. We demand that the canal shall be so operated that it will establish and maintain sea competition with these railroads, and that ships directly or indirectly owned or controlled by railroad corporations shall not be permitted to use the canal on terms as favorable as those enjoyed by independent American ships.

WATERWAYS.

The rivers of the United States are the natural arteries of this continent. We demand that they shall be opened to traffic as indispensable parts of a great system of transportation, in which the Panama Canal will be the central link, thus enabling the whole interior of the United States to share with the Atlantic and Pacific seaboards in the benefits derived from the canal. To this end our rivers, and especially the Mississippi and its tributaries, must be developed without delay, under a comprehensive general plan covering each river system from its source to its mouth, designed to secure its highest usefulness for navigation, irrigation, domestic supply, water power, and the prevention of floods. This general plan should be made and carried out in close and friendly cooperation between the Nation, the States, and the cities affected. Under such a plan the recurrent floods of the Mississippi and other streams, which represent a vast and needless loss to the Nation, would be stopped, and water power enough to revolutionize the industrial standing of whole States would be developed, while land sufficient to support millions of people would be reclaimed from the swamps. The equipment and experience acquired in constructing the Panama Canal soon will be available for the Lakes to the Gulf deep waterway and other portions of this great work, and should be utilized by the Nation in cooperation with the various States at the lowest net cost to the people.

CONSERVATION.

The doctrine of conservation holds that this country, with its natural resources, belongs to the people who inhabit it. The natural resources of the Nation are its collective wealth. They must be developed and used to supply the people's needs, but they must neither be wasted nor monopolized. We believe in the use, not the misuse and waste, of our natural resources.

The country has passed the stage when it can afford to permit its resources to be destroyed or wastefully exploited under the hope of undue immediate returns. Such exploitation is gambling rather than legitimate industry, and injures both those who undertake it and those who permit it. The soil, the forests, the streams, the minerals, the water powers—all must be wisely used and intelligently conserved. We believe that many of these resources, like coal and water power, should be kept in the public hands, while at the same time their development should be encouraged. After a fixed period of years these resources should return to the people, to whom they belong, and who should increasingly share in the profits derived from their use. The work of settling our unoccupied agricultural lands, opening our mines, conserving our forests in the East, as well as in the West, and irrigating our arid lands should be supplemented by protection and improvement of the public grazing lands, and by assistance in the drainage of swamp and overflow lands and the purification of interstate streams.

COUNTRY LIFE.

The development and prosperity of country life are as important to the people who live in cities as they are to the farmers. We pledge ourselves to the establishment of a country-life commission. Its influence will directly promote the welfare of the farmers and bring the benefits of better farming, better business, better living, and more effective cooperation within their reach. The increase of prosperity on the farm will favorably affect the cost of living and help the Nation and the States to act together in promoting the interests of all who dwell in the country and all who depend upon its products for clothing, shelter, and food. Good roads and agricultural schools should be fostered in every proper way. The educational and social interests of the farmers are not less important than their economic prosperity.

PARCEL POST.

We demand the immediate creation of a parcel post that will give to the people of this country a postal express service, and thereby destroy the oppressive monopoly now maintained by the great express companies. Such a parcel post should be established on a zone system, which will favor the prompt distribution of the merchandise the people use without giving to the great commercial centers an unfair advantage over the smaller communities.

PENSIONS.

We pledge ourselves to a wise and just policy of pensioning American soldiers and sailors and their widows and children.

ALASKA.

We recognize the enormous value of Alaska to the people of the United States. We demand the prompt development of its resources under the supervision of the United States by every legitimate means. We demand also that private extortion or monopoly in transportation shall be prevented by the acquisition, construction, or improvement by the Government of such railroads, harbors, and other facilities for transportation as the welfare of the people may demand. The coal of Alaska must not be stolen or wasted. It must be opened at once to mining under leases requiring immediate development, in order that the benefits of cheap fuel may accrue to the Government of the United States and to the people of Alaska and the Pacific coast.

THE NAVY.

We pledge ourselves to maintain our Navy at its present position of high effectiveness compared with the navies of other powers.

We stand for peace with all nations; we will do justice to all; we will suffer injustice from none.

PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

We pledge the Republican Party to complete the work of preparing the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands for self-government under the American flag.

PUBLIC SERVANTS IN POLITICS.

The public conscience demands new methods in politics. As one step to this end we pledge our party to enact legislation which will forbid Federal appointees from holding office in national political organizations or taking part as officers or delegates in political conventions for the nomination of elective national officials.

GOVERNMENT BUSINESS ORGANIZATION.

The Government of the United States is a great business organization. We pledge our party to a readjustment of the national business methods and a proper coordination of the Federal bureaus, which will increase the economy and efficiency of the Government service, prevent duplication, improve the conditions of Government work, and secure better results to the taxpayer for every dollar expended.

CIVIL SERVICE.

We favor a reorganization and extension of the civil service, with adequate compensation, commensurate with the class of work performed, for all employees, continuous service during good behavior and efficiency, the application to all classes of civil-service employees of the benefits of the compensation act, and the enactment of an equitable retirement law.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I share in the sentiments expressed by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] at the beginning of his remarks——

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. STERLING. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I think, as the Senator is beginning a speech, we ought to have a quorum present. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Jones	Page	Smoot
Chamberlain	Lane	Perkins	Sterling
Chilton	Lee, Md.	Poindexter	Swanson
Clark, Wyo.	Martin, Va.	Reed	Thomas
Culberson	Martine, N. J.	Robinson	Thompson
Fletcher	Myers	Shafroth	Thornton
Gore	Norris	Sheppard	Walsh
Gronna	O'Gorman	Simmons	Warren
Hollis	Overman	Smith, Md.	West
Hughes	Owen	Smith, Mich.	White

The PRESIDING OFFICER (when Mr. WEST's name was called). The present occupant of the chair desires to state that he is paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW].

Mr. THORNTON. I wish to announce at this time the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. RANSDELL]. I ask that this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. REED. I desire to announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] is detained from the Chamber on account of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. CULBERSON. Have the names of the absentees been called, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They have not; but they will be, if the Senator from Texas so desires.

Mr. CULBERSON. The order of business is to call the names of absentees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the names of absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. BRYAN, Mr. POMERENE, and Mr. SHIVELY answered to their names when called.

Mr. BRYAN. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] is detained from the Senate on account of illness. He is paired with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. LEA of Tennessee entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. CULBERSON. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant at Arms will execute the order of the Senate.

Mr. MCCUMBER, Mr. STONE, Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. SMITH of South Carolina, and Mr. SMITH of Arizona entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-nine Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, as I was about to say when interrupted by the call for a quorum, I appreciate the position taken by the distinguished Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] in regard to his purpose to support or vote for any measure that appeals to him as just, wholesome, and needed, without regard to the origin of that measure. I have been quite independent myself, I think, in that regard, and have said that, whatever might be the source of any particular measure, no desire for party gain or party advantage would induce me to oppose it if I believed it to be one in the public interest and for the public welfare.

I appreciate what the Senator from Washington said, too, in regard to the President. I myself have entertained the highest admiration for him personally, and have had great personal confidence in his high purposes and his ideals. I will, however, have occasion for further reference to that. While I was absent when the final vote was taken upon the antitrust bill,

I should probably have voted for the measure had I been here, although it would have been with some reluctance and with some misgiving. As to the conference report, however, on the bill as it is now presented, and is before the Senate in the report of the conferees, I must say that I can not, for reasons I shall give, support it.

Mr. President, when the Trade Commission bill was before the Senate there were a number of Senators, myself among them, who were strongly opposed to section 5 of that bill.

The opposition, as will be remembered, was largely directed to that part of the section which left the term "unfair competition" undefined, and which gave to the Trade Commission the power in general terms to prevent unfair competition.

The opposition was based on the ground, among others, that this was an attempted delegation of legislative power, and for that reason was unconstitutional and would not be upheld by the courts. Another and hardly less formidable ground of objection was the business uncertainty which would arise out of a power conferred on a commission of five to determine under all the varying conditions and opinions relating to modern business activities and methods what would constitute unfair competition in interstate business or commerce.

These objections, however, did not prevail. Various amendments offered by Senators in sympathy with the general purpose of the bill, and with the object of making it more definite and certain, were rejected.

It seemed to make no difference that there was no precedent for such legislation, either State or Federal, nor that there was no authority for it in any decision of trial or appellate court.

Indeed, it seemed to make no difference that reason and authority were the other way. Senators, speaking as with authority, assured us that there was no possible question that the proposed legislation would stand all tests, and that in order to facilitate the "good time coming," when every questionable business practice should be condemned and prevented, the Trade Commission should be given an absolutely free hand. Upon its collective conscience and will, and not upon the conscience and will of the Congress or of the people speaking through Congress, should rest the determination whether any given business method was unfair or not. I remember that afterwards some Senators even winced at the employment of the term "methods" in the conference amendment, as though method implied a system, a plan, and might suggest that the merely apparent, inadvertent, or purposeless conduct—there being no method in the madness—would escape investigation.

And so, without definition, example, or standard of any kind fixed by Congress as to what should constitute unfair competition, the bill passed and is now the law of the land.

Those who opposed the bill on the grounds stated thought their position had in a sense been vindicated by some provisions which it seemed necessary to incorporate in the antitrust bill, the conference report on which we are now considering.

It named and defined some concrete cases of unfair competition.

The House sent us the bill with section 2 therein prohibiting underselling with the purpose or intent thereby to destroy or wrongfully injure the business of a competitor, with reasonably severe penalties attached. Although the entire section was stricken out in the Senate, it finds a feeble revival in section 2 of the conference report—a very feeble revival.

That section makes discrimination in price between different purchasers unlawful where the effect of such discrimination may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce.

As the section came from the House it made the unlawful act of discrimination a misdemeanor punishable by fine and imprisonment.

But observe the extreme care exercised by the conference committee in framing its substitute for section 2 of the House bill.

Out of abundance of caution, it did not stop with saying that it shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce to discriminate, and so forth, but it felt impelled to add as words of qualification, "in the course of such commerce," so that the paragraph reads:

> That it shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, either directly or indirectly, to discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities, which commodities are sold for use, consumption, or resale within the United States or any Territory thereof, or the District of Columbia, or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States—

And so forth.

But this was but the beginning of caution on the part of the conferees. In order that the discrimination may be unlawful its effect must be under the terms of the next paragraph, inserted by the conferees, to "substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. STERLING. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. I desire to inquire of the Senator from South Dakota if I am to understand that he criticizes the insertion of the words "in the course of such commerce"?

Mr. STERLING. I do criticize that insertion, Mr. President, for the reason that I think those words are wholly unnecessary. I think it follows, as a matter of course, that it must be in the course of such commerce. I do not criticize them merely because they provide that it must be in the course of such commerce, but because it seems to me there was here unnecessary caution exercised in inserting those words. No such language or the equivalent thereof appeared in the original bill, and I could not think as I studied over that phraseology of any like provision in any other statute.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I want to inquire of the Senator, then, whether he thinks that the statute would be effective without those words?

Mr. STERLING. Why, Mr. President, commerce having been defined in the act and the whole purpose of the act being to affect that commerce, I think surely without that language the statute would have been valid and would have applied to competition in interstate commerce, and could not have applied to anything else.

Mr. WALSH. As I understand the Senator, then, the only complaint he makes is that it is unnecessary?

Mr. STERLING. Unnecessary largely, but——

Mr. WALSH. Let me ask the Senator further, then——

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I hardly wish to limit my objection to the statement that I deem the words simply unnecessary. I think the objection might go further than that. In a proceeding against a party charged with a violation of the law those words would suggest or invite the defense that the business was not in the course of such commerce, and because of that I think the words objectionable.

Mr. WALSH. That is what I wanted to ask the Senator. Now, we will take the case of a corporation engaged in commerce within the meaning of the act—that is, interstate commerce. It is engaged in that business. Its headquarters, we will say, are in the city of Boston.

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. The United Shoe Manufacturing Co., for instance. It, however, in Boston, makes a contract of this character with some one in Lynn, Mass. Does the Senator believe that the punishment of that kind of an act falls within Federal jurisdiction?

Mr. STERLING. I do not know. I will not say that the punishment of that kind of an act comes within that jurisdiction.

Mr. WALSH. I would not say so, either; but when I was asked about the advisability of putting in those words, I suggested myself that they be put in, so that no question could arise about the meaning.

Mr. STERLING. I still am of the opinion that the words were entirely unnecessary, and that they suggest difficulties in the enforcement of the law that perhaps otherwise would not arise.

Some of the consequences likely to flow from the use of the word "substantially" in this section were ably and clearly pointed out by the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] the other day; and, in fact, since his address, other Senators have very ably discussed that proposition. I may refer to others in a moment; but in this same short new paragraph, inserted by the committee, we are given to understand that the competition must be "substantial" in any line of commerce. It might be doubted whether local price cutting merely, though of a commodity in interstate commerce, would have the effect of substantially lessening competition or tend to create a monopoly in a line of commerce.

Passing the paragraph or proviso which permits discrimination in price because of differences in grade, quantity, or quality, or differences in cost of selling or transportation, I come to this significant provision injected by the committee, namely, the provision which permits "discrimination in price in the same or different communities made in good faith to meet competition." It is easy to conceive of the multitude of sins that may be covered by that broad and generous cloak.

So I think there can be little question that the additions have greatly weakened the bill. You have watered the stock—or the milk; and in any event, you have invited or suggested four several defenses to any proceeding against a wrongdoer under the bill, should it unfortunately become a law.

First. That the discrimination was not done in the course of such commerce.

Second. That granting there has been discrimination, it has not substantially lessened competition. I wonder at the possibilities open to the defense in a proceeding before the Trade Commission under that word "substantially."

Third. That while there was discrimination, it was made in entire good faith, for the purpose of meeting competition. I wonder again, as I think of the possibilities for the defense involved in that paragraph. Think of it! It can always be urged against the charge of unlawful discrimination that it was done for the purpose of meeting competition. "We found our competitor charging a certain price for his goods. We cut the price of ours, below cost even, to meet his competition. What have you got to say about it under this law?"

Mr. President, the Standard Oil and the Lumber Trust interests could not have been better protected had their own attorneys drafted this section of the law.

Fourth. The defense will be made that local price cutting, which affects a single community, or perhaps a large but sparsely settled area, has no substantial or appreciable effect on the "line," the whole line, of commerce in which the accused in engaged; and, notwithstanding some individual dealers may be ruined and single communities most seriously affected, this will be a most potent defense under the language of the bill.

Now, granting that they might all be defenses in a proceeding before the commission or in a case before a court, it is not the business of a statute like this, by exception and proviso, to suggest and invite them.

The Sherman law does not do it. It goes directly to the point. It does not even make "intent" a condition.

> Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of trade—> is hereby declared to be illegal.

And so forth—

And—

> Every person who shall make any such contract or engage in any such combination or conspiracy shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor.

And—

> Every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons to monopolize, any part of the trade or commerce among the several States shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor.

And so, as in the language of section 2 as it came from the House—

> Any person engaged in commerce who shall, either directly or indirectly, discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities in the same or different States, sections, and communities * * * with the purpose or intent thereby to destroy or wrongfully injure the business of a competitor * * *—

Should be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor.

Another and very practical consideration, Mr. President, is the one that will appeal to the pleader, the one who states the case for the Government on paper in a proceeding before the Trade Commission or before the court. Since you have been so careful and cautious as to embody the conditions under which a party charged will not be liable in the statute creating the offense, you will have to allege and prove as a part of the case that the conditions do not exist, instead of putting the burden on the defendant to show that they do exist, and therefore that he has not violated the law.

So, all in all, I think the term "emasculated" may be rightly applied to the substantive part of section 2, that part which purports to state with such circumspection the elements of the unlawful act of local price cutting.

I am not charging the conferees with a design to render the bill toothless and harmless. Indeed, when I consider their task, which was to deal with hotch-potch and reconcile the two systems involved in the two bills—the Trade Commission bill and the antitrust bill, with the Sherman antitrust law all the time looming up before them, which, like Banquo's ghost, would not down—I am not much surprised at seeing some "shreds and patches" as a result of their efforts, and was not surprised when the distinguished Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON], one of the conferees, on coming to the defense of the conference report devoted so large a part of his very able address to extolling the virtues of the new Federal reserve bank act, so many of which virtues are of Republican origin or the result of Republican effort.

But, Mr. President, suppose at last that some person engaged in commerce has been caught red-handed in the act of, in the course of such commerce, discriminating in price between different purchasers of commodities, the effect of such discrimination being to substantially lessen competition and tending to create a monopoly in some line of commerce, the discrimination not being on account of grade, quality, or quantity, and not being made in the same or different communities in good faith to meet competition, and not made in the exercise of the right to select his own customers; what is to be done with him? He has not been able to avail himself of any of the exceptions and provisos named in the act. He has been running amuck. He has left some ruin in his path. A lot of small dealers, content to serve the public for a reasonable profit on the commodities they sell to the public—the lumber, the oil, the machinery, or other staple necessity of life—have been driven out of business. The public has suffered; but the party discriminating has been enriched by the process. What is to be done with him? Nothing; absolutely nothing, if he is ready, on the order of the Trade Commission, to "cease and desist" from his nefarious practices and methods.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. STERLING. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. In connection with the particular point that the Senator has so well illustrated in the case described I wish to suggest that, in addition to the fact that the only thing done to the offender is to tell him that he must stop, he is permitted to keep all the ill-gotten gains that he has made up to that time.

Mr. STERLING. Certainly. I thank the Senator for calling attention to that very patent fact, too.

The vice of local price cutting is well recognized. It is the most obvious method of unfair competition. It has played havoc with the legitimate small dealer in many communities and States. Within the last half dozen years it has been made the subject of prohibitive statutes in nearly 20 States, and in nearly every case with penalties against the individual officer or director who by act or vote participates in it.

Any gain to a particular community through the lower price does not palliate the evil. The gain in the first place is but temporary; in the second place there is a loss to the consumers of some other community. When the competitor is driven from the field prices are normal again, or, more likely, higher than normal.

It is not a question under this practice of the survival of the fittest under ordinary conditions, when, perhaps, we would have no right to complain if the economically inefficient dealer, producer, or manufacturer were put out of business by his more businesslike competitor. Efficiency of the highest kind may be compelled, and has again and again been compelled, to succumb because it lacked the surplus capital, the sinews of war, to carry on the desperate fight made to drive it from the field. I grow indignant when I think of the enormities of the old Standard Oil and of the lumber trade association in my own State; but I reflect with some pride upon the fact that the penal provisions of the statute of 1907 against unfair discrimination in selling have been sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of State v. Lumber Co. (226 U. S.).

Mr. President, I was deeply impressed with the speech of the Senator from Idaho the other day when he spoke of the tendency to advocate supervision and control of business methods and activities by commission as a substitute for, or more accurately as a relief from, the rigors of the Sherman antitrust law, since it now, at last, has been discovered how effective and how all-embracing the Sherman law really is.

But, Mr. President, is it a tendency? The condition, it seems to me, is here, and the proof of it is in the conference report.

This bill selects out the grossest and most palpable of unfair methods of competition; those which have wrought most damage; those the evidence of which would be the strongest link in a chain to prove a conspiracy in restraint of trade or the creation of a monopoly, or which are of the very essence of the restraint or the monopoly, and makes these ruinous and despicable methods the subject of a mild declaration that they shall be deemed unlawful, and, without punishment, relegates the wrongdoers to the Trade Commission, which, as a result of investigation, may tell them to cease and desist. Thus while prohibiting an act the prohibition is left without legal sanction, without the provision which enforces obedience by proper penalties.

The achievement of the majority of the Senate conferees in this respect reminds me of the story of the Harvard divinity student. He went out to a neighboring town to preach one Sunday, and upon his return a professor of the divinity school, who was much interested in him, asked him how he got along. He said, "Oh, very well—very well indeed. I had fine success." Said the professor, "What was your text?" "Well, my text was this: 'How shall we escape if we neglect so great a salvation?'" "A very good text," said the professor, "and I am now interested in knowing how you treated that interesting subject." "Well," said the student, "I divided my sermon into two parts. I first told my congregation what a great salvation this is, and then I told them how they might escape if they neglected it." [Laughter.]

But, Mr. President, how the times change. The President will sign this bill, and in its present form, if it reaches him. According to the newspapers he has predicted the adoption of this conference report, and, by implication at least, manifested his approval of it. I am interested in knowing how our distinguished President has hitherto and recently felt in regard to the principle here involved.

He delivered the annual address at the meeting of the American Bar Association, held at Chattanooga, August 30 and 31 and September 1, 1910. His theme was "The lawyer and the community." It was a noble address and was a trumpet call to the members of the legal profession to have proper regard for their civic duties and privileges. The relation of the corporation to the community and the responsibility of the individual officer or director received much attention in this notable address. Let me read a few excerpts from the address. He says:

Corporations do not do wrong. Individuals do wrong, the individuals who direct and use them for selfish and illegitimate purposes, to the injury of society and the serious curtailment of private rights. Guilt, as has been very truly said, is always personal. You can not punish corporations. Fines fall upon the wrong persons, more heavily upon the innocent than upon the guilty, as much upon those who knew nothing whatever of the transactions for which the fine is imposed as upon those who originated and carried them through—upon the stockholders and the customers rather than upon the men who direct the policy of the business.

Further:

Society can not afford to have individuals wield the power of thousands without personal responsibility. It can not afford to let its strongest men be the only men who are inaccessible to the law. Modern democratic society, in particular, can not afford to constitute its economic undertakings upon the monarchical or aristocratic principle, and adopt the fiction that the kings and great men thus set up can do no wrong which will make them personally amenable to the law which restrains smaller men; that their kingdom, not themselves, must suffer for their blindness, their follies, and their transgressions of right.

Further:

We can have corporations, can retain them in unimpaired efficiency, without depriving law of its ancient searching efficacy, its inexorable mandate that men, not societies, must suffer for wrongs done.

Now, note this. I have been fond of quoting it:

The major premise of all law is moral responsibility, the moral responsibility of individuals for their acts and conspiracies; and no other foundation can any man lay upon which a stable fabric of equitable justice can be reared. * * *

Again:

The managers of corporations themselves always know the men who originated the acts charged against them as done in contravention of the law; is there no means by which their names may be disclosed to the officers of justice? Every act, every policy in the conduct of the affairs of a corporation, originates with some particular officer, committee, or board. The officer, the committee, or the board which orders an act or originates a policy contrary to the law of the land, or intended to neutralize or contravene it is an insurgent against society; the man or men who originate any such act or policy should be punished, and they alone.

We will note, as we proceed, how applicable every sentence and every line of what I have read and am to read is to at least three sections of the bill we are now considering.

Reading again:

You will say that in many instances it is not fair to pick out for punishment the particular officer who ordered a thing done, because he really had no freedom in the matter; that he is himself under orders, exercises no individual liberty of choice, is a dummy manipulated from without.

Note the reply to the defense that he himself suggests might be made:

I reply that society should permit no man to carry out orders which are against law and public policy, and that if you will but put one or two conspicuous dummies in the penitentiary there will be no more dummies for hire. You can stop the traffic in dummies, and then, when the idea has taken root in the corporate mind that dummies will be confiscated, pardon the one or two innocent men who may happen to have got into jail. There will not be many, and the custom of the trade will change.

Mr. President, I was in thorough sympathy with the doctrines laid down by the distinguished author of that speech. I made frequent comment on them. I saw the address and read it soon after it had been delivered, referred to it in talks to law students, and later, with proper acknowledgment of the authorship, quoted here and there a passage in a Republican campaign. But, Mr. President, times change, and apparently the inspiring and lofty sentiments of the President in regard to the moral responsibility of the individual for his acts and his conspiracies have passed into "innocuous desuetude." The wrongdoer is to be given the "immunity bath," and for his acts and conspiracies, his invasions of the sacred rights of other men, his spoliations, his conscience is the only forum before which he can be brought. I wonder that some attempt was not made to abolish that court also.

Mr. President, the principle of the moral responsibility of the individual advocated by the President in his address at Chattanooga is eternal; it meets with the universal approval of all right-thinking and justice-loving men. Now, is it not a miserable travesty that here at the very first opportunity to make a most wholesome and most needed application of the principle, we should find the principle repudiated? My personal feelings count for little, but from what I have said it may be truly inferred that there is some sense of disappointment.

But, Mr. President, I shall not attempt to discuss the other prohibitive sections of the bill, which omit to provide penalties for acts or methods in violation thereof. That has already been done most thoroughly and ably, first by the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], who has so courageously led in the fight against this report, and by several Senators on this side of the Chamber. But what I have said in regard to the omission of penal provisions for section 2 will apply with equal force to section 3, the section which makes unlawful the lease or sale contract conditional on the agreement that the lessee or purchaser shall not use or deal in the goods, wares, merchandise, or supplies of a competitor of the lessor or seller. Further, that excess of caution which on the face of the act makes a violation depend on a "substantial" lessening of competition in any line of commerce is subject to the same objections as like words in section 2. It is a wonder that the conferees did not permit the making of such leases or sale contracts when done in good faith to meet competition, as they have done in section 2 in cases of price cutting.

I may venture to speak of one other matter. It is a matter in which the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], who sits here, has been much interested and which he discussed at some length the other day. It is a matter of jurisdiction and procedure.

Section 11 of the Senate bill related to jurisdiction conferred upon Federal courts in cases of suits brought by stockholders. It is not a question of jurisdiction, Mr. President, of the subject matter, for the court, I think, has that, but a question rather of the jurisdiction of the person of the defendant in an action by an aggrieved stockholder, not to enforce the Sherman law in the interest of the public, but to protect his own equitable rights or secure equitable relief.

There may be some confusion in regard to the form of the amendment which was under consideration by the Senate and by the House conferees. The amendment as it related to the right of the stockholder was stricken out by the conferees. I learn that the conferees were influenced more or less by the idea that if that provision remained as originally introduced, it would be conferring upon an individual stockholder the right to enforce the Sherman antitrust law.

I have before me a suggested addition to the section. I hope there may be an opportunity yet to consider it in conference. For the sake of the record and that it may be perhaps something of a guide hereafter, I read this proposed addition:

Suits by stockholders against officers or directors of a corporation for equitable protection by injunction or otherwise, or for redress of wrongs to their corporate interests, may be brought in any district where the corporation has its principal office or in which any necessary or proper party defendant resides.

Now—

Any judge of the court in which such action is filed shall, if it appear by the petition or other pleading of the petitioner or plaintiff that necessary or proper parties defendant reside in another district or in other districts, make and enter an order for service of process, and the order and service shall conform as nearly as practicable to the provisions of, and practice pursuant to, section 57 of the Judicial Code.

Section 57 of the Judicial Code is that section which refers to suits brought to enforce liens upon real or personal property within any judicial district or to remove encumbrances from such property, the defendant or defendants being residents of another district. Section 57 prescribes the method by which service of process may be had upon any nonresident defendant and he be brought into court. Hence the reference in the proposed addition to section 57:

Such suits shall be maintainable by any stockholder without regard to the amount of stock held or the date when the stock was issued or transferred to him, provided that no right of action shall accrue to any party who acquires stock in a corporation or has it transferred to him for the sole purpose of instituting and carrying on litigation. In case of the successful prosecution of such suit and recovery of funds the court may allow the petitioner or plaintiff reasonable counsel fees out of such funds in addition to costs.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. STERLING. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will permit me, I should like to suggest to him in connection with that very section the reasons given by the conferees for striking it out. First, they say that the language does not confer jurisdiction upon the court, and therefore it would be of no effect. Second, they say they left it out because they did not want to give individual stockholders the right to enforce the Sherman law. I should like to suggest to the Senator the inconsistency of those two objections. One is a complete contradiction to the other; they can not both be true.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, a word in conclusion as to this bill in its general aspects—its double aspect, if you please—and what is it? A studied and labored effort to at least appear to grant new privileges and guaranties to labor organizations, on the one hand; to make them immune as such from prosecutions under the Sherman law, when, indeed, that has been the settled law for years, as evidenced by scores of Federal decisions. Many Members voted for the original bill on the theory that the provisions of section 7 are now the law. If such is the law you have promised bread and given a stone. On the other hand, if you have given the labor organizations special privileges or advantages you have violated the one fundamental principle upon which our institutions rest—equality before the law—and the thing done at the dictation of party expediency or party exigency will come back to plague you.

But there is the double aspect, the pretended or real special privileges and immunities granted labor on the one hand, and the very vital and important immunities and relief from personal responsibility granted the managers of big business on the other hand. It "plays both ends against the middle," and the public will take or suffer the consequences.

Mr. President, I desire to read briefly from an article by Mr. Whitelaw Reid, our late distinguished ambassador at the Court of St. James. The article is entitled "The strength of the Republic." He finds that our success has been founded upon the two great principles, individual initiative and respect for or obedience to authority. After eloquently describing what has been done under the impulse of those two great ideas in the settlement of the Middle West, the West, and the Pacific slope, telling how under those two ideas have we not only reached this high stage of material development, but that they, the pioneers in the new regions to which they went, established government and enacted laws, he goes on to say:

> To such a continental conquest of nature and of men have those two traits of the fathers brought us—their respect for authority and their widest freedom of individual initiative. These, with the original vigor of the stock, have made Americans what they are, and by consequence have made this blessed country of ours the joy and pride and hope of our lives. To harm either is criminal—

That is, to harm either the idea of individual initiative or the idea of obedience to authority.

> To harm either is criminal—whether to break down respect for authority by unlawful combinations, tricky evasions, and open defiance of order, or to cramp the widest freedom of the individual in any lawful enterprise or labor anywhere. Whoever or whatever now dares to interfere with the permanent union of these two traits and their continued development in the American life, is an enemy to the Republic—whether known as political boss, or as trust, or as trades-union.

But—

> let me not be misunderstood. * * * Nobody can question the economies and public benefits in business from great consolidations of capital. Nobody can deny the right of labor to combine for higher wages and shorter hours and healthful conditions of work. I mean no arraignment of organization itself, either in politics or finance or labor—only of that tyrannical organization, that unrepublican organization, that abandonment of the underlying essentials of Democratic success, and that reversion to the principles of an absolute monarchy or a military despotism, which refuses to recognize that it has reached the limits of its own right when it invades the rights of others, and so saps the very springs that have lifted us to this floodtide of national prosperity. Indeed, instead of opposing, I appeal for organization, but only for organization of the kind which a distinguished ex-President of the United States once commended—the organization which seeks cooperation instead of the one that suppresses individual judgment and demands exclusive control; the organization which aims at the helpful union of men of like minds and interests, or the needful strength to meet competition, not at monopoly; which minds its own business, and is willing that whoever is not with it should have equal liberty in this land of liberty to do the same.

Mr. President, I can not help but say that that about expresses my creed. In this most important legislation, in the recommendations and amendments contained in this conference report, first, in regard to the immunities which the bill in effect extends to individual officers and directors of corporations, and, secondly, in the extreme to which the bill seeks to go with reference to labor legislation we have gone counter to the fine principles so ably advocated both by the President and by Mr. Reid.

I hope there is time, Mr. President, to do some retracing of our steps, and out of some conflict of views in regard to the vital features of this bill there may yet be evolved a sane, wholesome, progressive law, one that offers no special protection or advantage to any set of men, a law which, without regard to class, will have the approval of the country and the general public, for whose benefit the law is made.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. OLIVER presented memorials of sundry citizens of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the proposed tax on life insurance policies, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the proposed tax of 2 cents per gallon on gasoline, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the Board of Trade of East Pittsburgh, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation to pension superannuated civil-service employees, which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

He also presented a memorial of the Federated Trades Council, of Reading, Pa., remonstrating against the proposed tax on motion-picture houses, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of the First National Bank of Carmichaels, Pa., remonstrating against the proposed tax on the capital and surplus of banks, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ROOT presented memorials of sundry merchandise brokers of New York City, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to increase the internal revenue, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SHIVELY:

A bill (S. 6566) granting an increase of pension to George Fulford (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 6567) granting an increase of pension to Charles C. Meckel; to the Committee on Pensions.

RECESS.

Mr. CULBERSON. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock a. m. on Monday.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m., Saturday, October 3, 1914) the Senate took a recess until Monday, October 5, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, October 3, 1914.

The House meet at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou God of wisdom, power, justice, mercy, love, with whom all things are possible, our hearts go out to Thee in a fervent appeal that somehow, someway through Thy holy influence the appalling and devastating war, involving millions, may be brought to a speedy close. So move, we beseech Thee, upon the hearts of those who are responsible for the conflict that they may be ready and willing to listen to the overtures going out through our President from millions of hearts here in America that peace and concord may reign throughout the earth. And O God, our Father, hear us when we pray for the thousands who suffer from wounds, the bereaved mothers, the widows, the fatherless children, the homeless, the starving. "Be Thou exalted, O Jehovah, in Thy strength; so will we sing and praise Thy holy power." In the name of the world's Great Exemplar, the Prince of Peace. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky will state his question of privilege.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, before I state it, in order that the Chair may better understand it, will the Chair indulge me for one or two minutes leading up to the question of privilege in order that the Chair may better understand it?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state the question in his own way.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Texas rise?

Mr. HENRY. To make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I wish the gentleman would withhold that.

Mr. HENRY. I will withhold it for the present.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky will state the question in his own way, and then the Chair will pass upon it as to whether he has a question of privilege or not.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, during this entire Congress I believe I have been here as continuously as most any other gentleman in this House. Without searching the RECORD for the purpose of ascertaining, I now am able to recall only a very few times when I have been absent. The first was when the Speaker appointed me upon a congressional committee to go to the Gettysburg battle field a little more than a year ago. Last May Senator Bradley from Kentucky died. I and the rest of the Kentucky delegation were placed upon the congressional committee to accompany his remains to his native State for burial. I was absent a few days then. Several times since then I have been absent from this House because of actual illness, and in bed, in the city of Washington, not elsewhere. I am not now able to recall another absence until the 27th day of last August, when I left here and went to Kentucky for the purpose of being present at the laying of a cornerstone of a public building in my home town. With this exception, as my memory serves me, and I think it serves me correctly, I have not failed to be upon the floor of this House any other day. Notwithstanding this fact the Sergeant at Arms has seen fit to withhold my salary for the entire month ending September 1 or 4. I do not know which is the end of the fiscal month. We usually get our checks on the 4th of the month. He has withheld my salary for the 27 days in that month when I was here, not being satisfied to comply with the law by not paying me for the three days that I was not here. I am now informed by him, notwithstanding the fact I have been here every day during the past month, he intends to again withhold my salary for the full 30 days, notwithstanding I was here upon the floor of this House upon each and every one of those days. The Journal of this House discloses that during the month of August, and also during the month of September, the Speaker of the House did me the honor to call me to the chair to preside. If the Sergeant at Arms had been upon the floor as much as I have been, he would have seen me in the chair presiding.

The Sergeant at Arms upon several occasions has sat upon the floor of the House and talked with me, and I called his attention to the fact I was then present, which he recognized, but he still fails and refuses to pay me even for those days. His feeble plea for withholding my salary from me is because I have not consented to be the judge, witness, and jury to try my own case. He has sent to me a blank paper, which I understand he sent to all the other Members of the House, asking me to say whether or not section 40 of the Revised Statutes of the United States excused me for any day that I may have been absent. I am conscientious in the belief that I should not sit upon my own case either as judge or juryman to determine whether or not my absence of three days was excused by the law. Either he or the Speaker of this House should determine that question. If the Speaker should determine it, he should determine it, I think, upon his own authority. If the Sergeant at Arms is not willing to take his own opinion whether or not I was legally absent, then he should seek legal advice. He has a statement from me that I was absent three days in August, and because I will not consent to be, as I said, judge, jury, and witness in my own case, he insists upon withholding my salary not only for that entire month but for the two months. Now, the Sergeant at Arms——

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. ASWELL. Is it not a fact that the House instructed the Sergeant at Arms to do that?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No, sir; the House did not instruct the Sergeant at Arms to withhold my pay for a single day when I was here, and the Sergeant at Arms has no authority to deduct from my salary for a single day when I am here.

Mr. ASWELL. Did not the House instruct the Sergeant at Arms to require this statement?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No, sir; it did not. The House instructed the Sergeant at Arms to perform his duty in this respect when there was not a quorum of the House in town; but I am glad to say I was not one of the absentees. I remained here every one of the hot summer days. That resolution was not by any means intended for me, for I had been here during all the weeks when there was trouble to get a quorum. The House found it necessary to instruct the Sergeant at Arms to perform the duty which the Sergeant at Arms was not performing, and that is the extent of the resolution.

Mr. ASWELL. You do not hold the Sergeant at Arms responsible for this resolution, do you?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Certainly I do not. I hold the Sergeant at Arms responsible for not performing his duty.

I do not question at all the credibility of the Sergeant at Arms. He sits on the floor and talks with me about this matter; he knows and admits that I am present; and then, in the face of it, insists upon deducting from my salary not only the days on which I was absent, but also the days when I am on this floor and he is talking to me.

Now, I wish to inquire, Mr. Speaker, on my privilege as a Member, whether or not the Speaker will certify either from my statement, from his own knowledge, or from the Journal of this House as to my attendance here, so that I may be paid the salary that is wrongly being withheld from me?

The SPEAKER. The Chair, if the House will permit without any objection, will explain the modus operandi of Members getting their pay. The Sergeant at Arms distributes these slips, or reecipts, or whatever they are, around among the Members so that they can sign them, sometimes for several months. The officer of the Treasury Department who has charge of such things requests a new Speaker when he is elected—inasmuch as he has to sign these things—to certify the signature that he wants recognized in the Treasury Department as his own. It is a matter of clerical labor entirely. When I was first elected Speaker I certified the signature of my chief clerk, Mr. Bassford, who writes very much like me, anyway. So when these receipts are signed by the Members they go back to the Sergeant at Arms, and on the 3d of each month, usually, and sometimes as late as the morning of the 4th, the Sergeant at Arms sends those slips, with his memorandum as to how much is due, up to the Speaker's office and Mr. Bassford, my chief clerk, signs them. That is all I know about it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. May I ask the Speaker if he advisedly used the word "receipt" in reference to the slip of paper which the Sergeant at Arms sends to Members?

The SPEAKER. Of course it is a receipt. That is what it is, and I have signed them myself for my own salary, and I do so now.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The Speaker is not now referring to the "slip" which the Sergeant at Arms recently sent out?

The SPEAKER. No.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I was wondering whether the Speaker referred to that as a "receipt."

The SPEAKER. Oh, no; that was the method of the Sergeant at Arms in the Fifty-third Congress and in this one of finding out whether Members had been present every day or not.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not willing to act as judge, jury, and witness upon my own case, and I ask the Speaker to advise me how I am to get the salary for, say, to-day, when the Speaker knows I am here and when the Sergeant at Arms knows I am here?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that it is a question he is authorized to answer. It is a legal proposition that, if it is ever tried in court, will involve the very question the gentleman is talking about.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Is the Speaker going to submit to reducing this to a legal proposition, when the Sergeant at Arms, if he chooses to do it, can starve out Members of this House until a quorum can be broken while Members are at law about their salaries?

The SPEAKER. It is the business of the Sergeant at Arms. The Speaker has no more authority over the Sergeant at Arms than the gentleman from Kentucky has—not a bit in the world. Each one of these officers elected here is expected to attend to his own business. Of course, once in a while I have assumed the authority I have, in a friendly kind of way, of making suggestions to the various officers of the House, and communicate to them any complaints Members have made about what their helpers are doing; but beyond that the Speaker has no control over it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, is a Member of this House compelled by a situation which the Sergeant at Arms may choose to bring about to finally abandon his services here because, perchance, he has not the money with which to pay his expenses in Washington and come to the Chamber when the House is in session?

The SPEAKER. I think not. I think the whole business resolves itself into this: The statutes require the Sergeant at Arms to do certain things——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Will the Chair permit an interruption right there?

The SPEAKER. The Sergeant at Arms must find out at his own risk what his duties are.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, does he incur any risk in paying a Member of this House when he knows that Member is present?

The SPEAKER. That is a legal proposition which the Chair is not authorized to pass upon.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Will the gentleman from Kentucky permit an interruption?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Does not the gentleman think if he himself objects to complying with the request of the Sergeant at Arms that the Sergeant at Arms may be compelled to adopt more stringent and objectionable methods of ascertaining the fact as to the attendance of Members here?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No. I am testifying here. I am not willing to consider myself judge and jury in my own case, and the Journal testifies as to my presence here.

Mr. ANSBERRY. The gentleman from Kentucky has made a case here that the Sergeant at Arms ought to be willing to take, instead of the "pink slip," so called, which the Speaker has told us was brought about by the precedent established in the Fifty-third Congress——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. An unwise precedent.

Mr. ANSBERRY. The law charges the Sergeant at Arms with the duty of enforcing this statute, which would still be in effect if the resolution were abrogated, and it seems to me that this official adopted the least oppressive way of ascertaining the facts.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman let me interrupt him?

The statute charges the Sergeant at Arms to deduct from the salary of Members when the Members are absent. I challenge the gentleman, the Sergeant at Arms, or anybody else to show authority for docking anybody when he is present, as he has done with me in this instance.

Mr. ANSBERRY. As I said before, I agree that in the case the gentleman from Kentucky makes, the Sergeant at Arms requirement might seem harsh, but my friend is too good a lawyer not to know that all laws, because of their general character, are apt to seem oppressive in particular cases. In obeying the direct mandate of the House the Sergeant at Arms adopted a precedent which has long been abandoned, and in doing this he simply did as we all do when compelled to do a duty enforced on us by law, and when we are not familiar with the procedure we make inquiry as to how other officials charged with the same duty proceeded. It seems to me that this precedent was a good one, and, good or bad, it is one method of getting at the facts and he should be commended and not reprimanded under the circumstances.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Texas rise?

Mr. GARNER. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. What is it?

Mr. GARNER. What is before the House?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] has a question of privilege.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I have a right, Mr. Speaker, not only for myself but for the rest of the membership of this House, to ask whether the Sergeant at Arms has the right to deduct from a man's salary when he is present?

The SPEAKER. The speaker is not authorized to answer that question.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Is there a committee of this House which has jurisdiction for the purpose of auditing the accounts of the Sergeant at Arms in the past to see whom he has unlawfully paid?

The SPEAKER. The Chair never heard of any such committee. There may be one.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Would a resolution to create such a committee be a privileged one?

The SPEAKER. The resolution would go to the Committee on Rules. Any resolution changing the rules of the House goes to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Then, Mr. Speaker, do I understand there is no rule upon this subject?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know. The Chair never had that matter suggested to him and has never investigated it. He does not know; but he is rather inclined to think that——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. But somebody ought to have the authority to ascertain whether the Sergeant at Arms has paid Members whom he has had no right to pay, when he refuses to pay Members whom he should pay.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, I would like to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will submit it, if the gentleman from Kentucky will yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. HENRY. When the recess is taken that was arranged for a few days ago, would it be in order now for me to ask that this docking resolution, which was passed some time ago, be abrogated?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That would not abrogate the law.

The SPEAKER. It would be like any other resolution; it would have to go to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. MANN rose.

Mr. HENRY. I ask now that the docking resolution——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky did not yield the floor to the gentleman from Texas for that purpose.

Mr. MANN. I was going to suggest, Mr. Speaker, to the gentleman that, so far as the accounts of the Sergeant at Arms are concerned, they all have to be audited by the Treasury Department. It is not left to the sweet will of the Sergeant at Arms. The accounts of the Sergeant at Arms are like any other public accounts of the Government.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman from Illinois permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The gentleman from Illinois recently said here that one of his colleagues had not been in the House since the very beginning of the session. I take it for granted that the gentleman from Illinois, like myself, knows there is a statute which says a Member shall not be paid unless he is here, or unless he makes the legal excuse. If that legal excuse has not been made, is there nobody whose business it is to ascertain whether anybody has been unlawfully paid or not?

Mr. MANN. It is the duty of the Auditor of the Treasury Department to disallow accounts that are held if they are not paid in accordance with the provisions of law. I take it that the auditor performs his duty.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Is not the gentleman morally certain that he knows of instances where that law has been violated?

Mr. MANN. The docking law, the gentleman means?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; the act of 1856.

Mr. MANN. I know of instances in my own case where it has not been observed. I will not say it has been violated. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. But does the gentleman know of any case where a Member of this House has heretofore been docked when every official of the House knew he was present?

Mr. MANN. Well, as there has been no docking since I have been a Member of the House, until recently, I assume that I could not give any instance where pay has been withheld for that reason. I think the Sergeant at Arms is as much entitled to require a certificate as would be a man who is traveling, where his traveling expenses are paid by the Government in accordance with the law, but who can not get the expenses until he certifies that he has incurred them. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I would like to ask the gentleman if the act of 1856 relative to docking does not require and impose the duty upon the Sergeant at Arms to ascertain who is present and who is not, and that he is paid for rendering that service?

Mr. MANN. I did not rise for that purpose; but if the gentleman wants my opinion, I will say that if the Sergeant at Arms pays the Members their salaries illegally he does it at his peril. If he pays them illegally, he and his bondsmen are liable on their bond.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is admitted; but will the gentleman permit an interruption right there?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. When the Journal shows that a Member is present, is not the Sergeant at Arms bound by that Journal?

Mr. MANN. Oh, the Sergeant at Arms must himself determine, being an elected official of this body, how he will ascertain the presence or absence of a Member.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, now will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Now, the Sergeant at Arms, being required by resolution of the House to pay attention to a law which had not been observed theretofore for a long time, has adopted a method suitable, in his opinion, to meet the case, to obtain the information which he is required to obtain at his peril; and, adopting that method, he has left it to the Members of the House themselves to certify—the most gentlemanly method he could have adopted, in my opinion. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Is it the policy, I would like to ask the gentleman, of the courts and of all public tribunals, in instances where money is to be taken from the Treasury, to leave it to the claimant?

Mr. MANN. I think it is the policy in almost every case to leave it to the claimant in the first instance. The claimant makes his claim, certifies its correctness, and then in the end the auditor or the comptroller passes upon the justness of the payment of the claim.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Kentucky yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman from Kentucky think that those of us who make a law, or are responsible for the continuance of a law, should hesitate to stand upon a technicality, but should be willing to do our part in the enforcement of the law which was made by Congress or for the continuance of which we are responsible?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Why, certainly. I am complaining because an officer of this body has exceeded his authority and has withheld my salary and persists in doing so when he knows that I am here. That is all I am complaining of. He should not pay those who are absent.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman from Kentucky yield further to me, please?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order.

The SPEAKER. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. DONOVAN. The personal explanation has expired long ago. This is only a repetition——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. DONOVAN. Is there no limit to this?

The SPEAKER. Yes; there is a limit of one hour.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to have not only the RECORD but the Journal show that I am present to-day, in order that the Sergeant at Arms may not withhold my salary for to-day?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the only way to do that is to have a roll call.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, right there——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the RECORD will indicate the gentleman's presence, because it will show what he has said.

The SPEAKER. The RECORD itself will show that the gentleman rose to a question of personal privilege.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Then, Mr. Speaker, I would like to know why the Sergeant at Arms persists in asking me to sign a certificate when you have just suggested that a roll call will show whether I am present, and the roll calls every day are before the Sergeant at Arms and he knows that I answer to my name.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman from Kentucky yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman from Kentucky knows that the law says the Sergeant at Arms shall not pay a Member——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No; it does not say that. It says he shall deduct——

Mr. GARNER. That he shall deduct the Member's salary for such days as he is absent.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Now, the Sergeant at Arms has adopted the best method that he knows——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I disagree with the gentleman. I come in here on this floor day after day and I see the gentleman from Texas here. Why can not the Sergeant at Arms see me here? The gentleman from Texas sees me here. Why can not the Sergeant at Arms see me here?

Mr. GARNER. But the Sergeant at Arms, as a disbursing officer, has adopted, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] says, the most reasonable method that he can adopt in order to ascertain whether I am here or you are here. It does seem to me that it is a reasonable request to ask a Member to sign a certificate as to the number of days he has been here. [Applause.]

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from South Dakota?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Is the gentleman from Kentucky aware of the fact that the Sergeant at Arms of the House is, under the law, a disbursing officer?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Now, is not the gentleman aware of this fact: That no officer of the Government can direct a disbursing officer to pay out money?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Does the gentleman contend that there is not a law directing the disbursing officer to pay to the Members of this House their salaries monthly?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will say to the gentleman that if the Sergeant at Arms of the House does not pay him his salary there is only one way in which the gentleman can get his salary, if he thinks he is being unjustly deprived of it, and that is by resorting to the courts, and that the House itself has not the power to direct the Sergeant at Arms to pay out money unlawfully, so that he would be released on his bond if he did so.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Does the gentleman think the Sergeant at Arms would act unlawfully in paying me for my attendance here?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. In answer to the gentleman's inquiry I will say that I do not think it would be unlawful for the Sergeant at Arms to pay the gentleman if he had been absent for several days, because I do not recognize that the statute of 1856 is still in existence.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I disagree with the gentleman about that. I think it is.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I want to say to the gentleman that it has been decided that a disbursing officer under bond is himself the man who determines how he shall pay out money, and—I am speaking now from knowledge—that the President, in a well-known case that I happen to know about, made the statement that he could not compel a disbursing officer to pay out money that he did not wish to pay out, and that the only thing he could do would be to remove the disbursing officer.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, it has been my understanding, and it is suggested to me by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT], that the law requires these salaries to be paid upon certificates from the Speaker of the House to the Sergeant at Arms directing their payment. Entertaining that belief, I rose for the purpose of having the Speaker certify to my presence, of which he officially knows, and in which he is sustained by the Journal of this House; and I ask the Speaker to take it under advisement and do what he can to make it impossible for the Sergeant at Arms, at his pleasure, to hold up whomsoever he sees fit in this House. I must insist that he pay me. I have not missed a day this month, but he will not pay me.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER. I want to ask the gentleman from Kentucky a question. I feel heartfelt sympathy for him. I went home during a temporary lull in the business here to keep an engagement to speak at a picnic, and on coming back my salary was curtailed. I make no complaint at all. It is all right, under the law.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I say it is all right.

Mr. COOPER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky if he knows whether the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], who before the month of August was gone some considerable time, engaged in securing his nomination for the Senate, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY], who was absent for several weeks seeking reelection to this House, had their salaries docked before August, the month in which that resolution was introduced?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, no.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I have no knowledge upon the subject.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am sure the gentleman does not wish to make a misstatement on the floor of the House, and the statement he has just made with reference to myself is a misstatement.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. COOPER. Was not the gentleman from Alabama absent before the month of August?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I was away for two weeks in June at the order of a physician, because I was sick, and I was not at home at that time. I was at Hot Springs, Va., and was away from Washington under the advice of two physicians.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. It was printed in the newspapers and commonly reported in the House; but if I have been misinformed, as the membership of the House has, I apologize to the gentleman.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is correct.

Mr. COOPER. It was currently reported here that the gentleman was engaged on the stump.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman is mistaken. I was not at home at all. I was away under the advice of a physician.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky has the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I want to conclude my remarks.

Mr. HENRY. I want to reply to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. And in that connection, in the line just suggested by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], I desire to say that I feel fully warranted in making the statement that gentlemen who were absent during 27 days of the month ending September 4 were paid by the Sergeant at Arms, and that I was present during that time, and he has refused to pay me for the same time when I was present.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY. Will the gentleman yield to me to reply to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will yield to the gentleman from Texas.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky can not yield time.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Kentucky has not stated a question of personal privilege.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Whether I have or not, I have said all I care to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman has stated a question of privilege, although the Chair thinks that by reason of the questions asked him he has wandered far afield.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, before the Chair rules, I should like to make this suggestion: That there is a wide difference between a question of personal privilege and a privileged question. It is a privileged question, but under the rule that can only be presented by presenting a resolution. Now, if every Member of the House is entitled to an hour's time on a question of personal privilege because he has been away for 29 days in a month and comes back for 1 day, I am afraid he will make a rule whereby filibustering might last for a long time. I do not think it is a question of personal privilege but a privileged question, which can be raised by a resolution.

The SPEAKER. When the gentleman states the distinction between a question of personal privilege and a privileged question, he states the matter correctly, and that a privileged question can only be raised by a resolution.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kentucky yielded to me to reply to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The SPEAKER. The Chair's recollection is that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] made the point of order that this was not a privileged question.

Mr. HAY. I made the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that this is not a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. That is right. It is a privileged question, in which the whole House is interested.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Alabama was given an opportunity to state whether he was absent or not.

The SPEAKER. But no one then had made the point of order.

Mr. HENRY. I rise, Mr. Speaker, to a question of privilege. I state that the gentleman from Wisconsin said that I had been absent from the House several weeks seeking reelection to the House of Representatives. It is true I was absent seeking reelection, but it did not occur to me that I was injuring the welfare of my country when I was seeking a reelection to the House of Representatives. [Laughter and applause.] That was before this resolution was adopted. The gentleman asked if I had been docked on my salary. I will state that I have not been docked and will not be; I have been drawing my salary every day, and intend to draw it.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Texas yield?

Mr. HENRY. I will.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman from Texas prepared to say how many of the 215 roll calls between December 1 and August 31 he answered to?

Mr. HENRY. Does the gentleman from Illinois know?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. HENRY. How many?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman answered to 102 and was absent 113.

Mr. HENRY. Between what dates?

Mr. MANN. Between December 1 and August 31.

Mr. HENRY. I was absent seeking reelection to the House of Representatives several weeks, and if I should have opposition again in my district I would go home. On other occasions I was paired.

Mr. MANN. That was a little more than half the time. Has the gentleman got his pay for all that time?

Mr. DONOVAN rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Connecticut rise?

Mr. DONOVAN. To ask for the regular order.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I rise to submit a unanimous request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will submit it.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to say that if I can have five minutes right after that——

Mr. WINGO. A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. DONOVAN. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is for the House to resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union under the rule.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] has demanded the regular order.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will ask the gentleman from Connecticut to withhold that.

Mr. DONOVAN. Not for a second. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point that no quorum is present; the Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and seventy-five Members present—not a quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The Doorkeeper was directed to close the doors and the Sergeant at Arms to notify the absentees.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Anderson	Fields	Konop	Patten, N. Y.

The SPEAKER. On this call 279 Members have answered to their names—a quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

COTTON AND CURRENCY.

Mr. HENRY rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Texas rise?

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a request for unanimous consent. I ask unanimous consent that I be allowed to print in the RECORD a bill which was introduced in the Senate yesterday by the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], dealing with the cotton and currency situation. It is a very short bill, and contains just four or five sections.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a bill introduced yesterday in the United States Senate by Senator SHEPPARD, of Texas, on the cotton and currency situation. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

HOMESTEAD ENTRY BY FEMALE AMERICAN CITIZENS.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the conference report on the bill (H. R. 11745) to provide for certificate of title to homestead entry by a female American citizen who has intermarried with an alien.

Mr. MANN. The report has been presented and printed?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the conference report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the conference report.

The Clerk read the conference report, as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 1172).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11745) to provide for certificate of title to homestead entry by a female American citizen who has intermarried with an alien having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same.

SCOTT FERRIS,
EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
BURTON L. FRENCH,
Managers on the part of the House.

H. L. MYERS,
REED SMOOT,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement is as follows:

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11745) to provide for certificate of title to homestead entry by a female American citizen who has intermarried with an alien, submit the following written statement in explanation of the action agreed upon and recommended in the accompanying conference report: The purpose of the Senate amendment is to not permit the operation of the act to extend to cases where the alien husband of the citizen entrywoman belongs to a race not entitled to become naturalized as a citizen of the United States, which the bill as it passed the House would have allowed, but to allow patent to be granted only where the alien husband belongs to a race whose people are eligible to become citizens of the United States. The House managers find themselves in accord with this purpose and therefore recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment.

SCOTT FERRIS,
EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
BURTON L. FRENCH,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

The SPEAKER. Under the special rule the House will automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 18459) to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands, and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 18459, the Philippine bill, with Mr. FLOOD of Virginia in the chair.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment as a new section, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Between sections 9 and 10, page 3, insert the following as a new section, to be known as section 2½:

"That the government of the Philippines shall reimburse the Government of the United States for all moneys expended by said Government of the United States in the purchase, protection, and government of the Philippine Islands, and said reimbursement shall be made in payments of gold out of any surplus in the Philippine treasury, or by 3 per cent Philippine Government bonds."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MILLER. I rise to oppose the amendment.

Mr. LEVY. It is not an amendment; it is a new section.

Mr. MILLER. It is an amendment in the way of a new section.

Mr. LEVY. No; it is a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I rose to oppose the amendment. If the gentleman does not wish to discuss it, I am willing for him to have a vote. I did not intend to discuss the amendment. I wanted to discuss another matter.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Chairman, I think it is important that this section should be in, for the reason that it declares that the Philippine Islands owe the Government of the United States a large sum of money; and while it may seem right that we should declare that we are not insisting upon demanding it at the present time, but the time will come when the Filipinos may be very rich, when they can afford to pay us. For that reason I think it ought to be declared that they owe us this money, and that some arrangement ought to be made whereby recognition should be taken of this obligation.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I only wish to say a word or two in opposition to this amendment. In the first place, I do not think that if any such proposition as this is ever to be adopted it ought to be embodied in this bill. This bill does not grant the Filipinos independence. It merely provides for a more liberalized form of government than they have at the present time. It is true that the preamble sets forth that it is the purpose of the people of the United States to grant them their independence at some future time. When the time comes for the introduction of an independence bill, that will be the time to consider the terms and conditions upon which independence shall be granted, and——

Mr. BATHRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Not just yet. And, Mr. Chairman, if at that time it shall be the disposition of the Congress to give the Filipinos their independence upon the condition that they reimburse the United States for all the money that the United States has expended in connection with the Philippine Islands, then, of course, that can be done. For one I do not believe that the time will ever come when the people of this country will charge up to the people of the Philippines and demand of them as a condition precedent to granting them their independence the hundreds of millions of dollars that the United States has expended in subjugating and holding them. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LEVY. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. JONES. In a moment. But the point I am making now, Mr. Chairman, is that the amendment has no place in a bill which does not grant complete independence to the Filipino people. I do not think it ought to find a place in any bill, but certainly not in this bill, which does not propose to give them their independence. Of course, Mr. Chairman, if this proposition were adopted, it would be to require the Filipino people at a time when they owe allegiance to the United States to pay us a sum of money so great that no one thus far has been able to compute it.

Mr. LEVY. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the Chair understand that the gentleman from Virginia made the point of order?

Mr. JONES. No; I did not make the point of order.

Mr. LEVY. That would be so if you had not this section in the bill:

Provided, however, That the entire indebtedness of the Philippine government created by the authority conferred herein shall not exceed at any one time the sum of $10,000,000.

Mr. JONES. Oh, Mr. Chairman, the bill provides that so long as the islands are the possessions of the United States they shall not create an indebtedness to an amount exceeding $10.000.000; but when we give them their independence, I will say to my friend from New York, there will be no such string as that attached to the measure. This bill does not say that when we give them their complete independence they shall not create an indebtedness in excess of $10,000,000. The provision quoted by the gentleman simply applies to the government of the Philippines which we provide for them in this bill. I shall not now undertake to discuss the merits of a proposition which I do not believe will be seriously considered. When the time comes, if it ever does, and I am fortunate enough to be a Member of Congress, I will say to the gentleman from New York that I will oppose to the uttermost of my ability any such proposition as that which is contained in his proposed amendment to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That no law shall be enacted in said islands which shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or deny to any person therein the equal protection of the laws.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Section 3 is a long section. It covers a great many different paragraphs somewhat in the nature of a copy of certain things, I suppose either from the Constitution of the United States or from various State constitutions. Is it to be treated as one section or one paragraph only for amendment, or are the paragraphs to be read separately for amendment? The subjects matter in the different paragraphs of the section are entirely disassociated one from the other.

The CHAIRMAN. The general rule, as the Chair understands, is that the whole section should be read before it is open to amendment, except with appropriation bills; but the gentleman from Illinois suggests that the subject matter of the various paragraphs, so to speak, is different, and therefore the Chair will permit amendments after each one.

Mr. MANN. I think that is proper in a case like this.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I have asked for recognition in order that I might indulge in a little further discussion relative to the geography of the Philippine Islands, a controversy which arose yesterday morning.

I find, Mr. Chairman, that there is an authoritative document issued by the Government, wherein it is specifically recognized and stated, as I stated yesterday, that the islands which I described and located were not included in the terms of the treaty of Paris in 1898, but were included specifically in the subsequent treaty of 1900. Senator LODGE, in the year 1901, within a very few months after the ratification of the treaty of 1900, had a sketch prepared relative to the groups of islands embraced in that last treaty, one group that of Cagayan de Sulu and the other group that of Sibutu, that was published as a Senate document—No. 103, Fifty-sixth Congress, second session. In this are collected accounts which various travelers from various countries of the world have given and the descriptions they have written of these islands. I apprehend the purpose was that the American people might be informed relative to the character and condition of these groups of islands, which they have now acquired by purchase and which they own in fee. One of the first travelers to visit the group called Cagayan de Sulu and leave an account of his visit was Admiral Keppel, who visited Cagayan de Sulu in 1847. Of this he says:

On the 17th we came to, in 10 fathoms, about a mile off the south side of Cagayan, and immediately commenced our examination of the curious circular lake before mentioned, of which we had reserved the examination for this opportunity. The entrance is by a gap about 50 yards wide. This, however, is crossed by a bank of coral, which extends along the whole south coast, and at low water is nearly dry, so as to exclude any boat larger than a canoe. Just outside the middle of the bar was a small island of rock and sandstone, with a sufficient shelter of bushes to make an excellent shaded spot for our picnic. On passing the bar we found ourselves inside a magnificent circular lake of deep blue water.

And further on in his report he says:

This grand discovery being communicated to the other rambling parties, curiosity became here concentrated. Men and axes were procured from the ship, the trees were cut down, and a road made up the gap, and so over to the fresh-water lake. A raft was then constructed and, together with a small boat belonging to the tender, was very shortly launched upon the upper water.

It was not until we were afloat on the inner lake that we were enabled to form a correct idea of the beauty of its encircling barriers and of the luxuriant vegetation which graced them. We had then also the best view of the extraordinary gap through we had passed into it.

And again:

From the inside the little island at the entrance had all the appearance of having once filled the gap, and looked as if it had been forced into the sea by some internal pressure. The break which I mentioned on the northeast side did not come lower than within 70 or 80 feet of the water's edge, and was partially concealed by the thick foliage of the jungle and forest trees. In sounding we found the depth of the water to vary from 50 to 60 fathoms, and it appeared to be as deep at the sides as in the center. Nothing could be more beautifully luxuriant than the growth of the jungle trees of every description, their trunks and branches covered with an endless variety of beautiful creepers in brilliant blossom hanging in festoons to the very water's edge. Over our heads, disturbed by such unusual visitors, numbers of pigeons flew to and fro, while many varieties of the parrot screamed their remonstrances at our intrusion.

Capt. Sir Edward Belcher also visited this remarkable island, and in his report mentions "having discovered in the south side of Cagayan Sulu a circular inlet of very deep water, cut off from the sea by a shallow bar."

The English traveler, St. John, has also written respecting this remarkable island. He says:

We steered for Cagayan Sulu, which is a gem in the ocean. It has three peaks, wooded, but varied by grassy glades, groves of coconuts and fruit trees, partly concealing and partly revealing scattered houses and villages. It is, indeed, a picturesque island from every view. * * * It is finely situated in the Sulu Seas and it is both healthy and fertile. * * * The most singular spot in this island is near the old crater-looking harbor, mentioned by Sir Edward Belcher, which we entered over a reef. It is almost circular and is surrounded by lofty rocks clothed with trees, bushes, and hanging creepers, presenting a magnificent wall of evergreen. Rowing to the west side of the bay and climbing to the top of a lofty bank, we had a splendid view of a remarkable, almost circular lake. The place where we stood was a gap between the lofty cliffs that rose on either hand and appeared to have been formed by the inner waters bursting their boundary and overthrowing the upper defenses of this natural dam.

Guillemard, the great naturalist, writes as follows of this island:

Beautiful as are almost all tropical islands, I do not think I have ever seen one more captivating than Cagayan Sulu. Mr. St. John calls it a "true gem of the ocean"; and as the boat glided over the coral gardens, bright with vividly colored fish, and landed me, gun and collecting box in hand, on the snowy sand, I felt as if I could cast off civilization and European clothes alike and cultivate my mealie patch and grove of coconuts with the natives for the remainder of my natural life.

Further on he says:

Our first expedition to the crater lakes, one of the most interesting natural phenomena we met with in the eastern seas, was unsuccessful, owing to bad weather; but the next day being fine we started early in the steam launch to visit them again. They are situated on the south side of the island, about 4 miles distant from the southwest point, off which we had anchored; and running alongshore inside the coral reef it was not long before we found ourselves at the entrance. It was barely a couple of hundred yards across, and as we glided slowly in the pale milky blue of the water on the reef suddenly gave place to the deepest sapphire.

* * * * * * *

The second lake, though of somewhat smaller size, is more perfectly circular than the western one, and though its southern wall is only a few yards distant from the beach, the sea has as yet left it unbroken. The level of the water, which is perfectly fresh, must be fully 40 feet above the sea, and but for the lessened height of the surrounding walls the second lake is almost an exact reproduction of the first.

Mr. JONES. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MILLER. Certainly.

Mr. JONES. Of what island is he speaking?

Mr. MILLER. Cagayan Sulu.

Mr. JONES. I mean the author of that article. To what island is he referring?

Mr. MILLER. Cagayan Sulu. I will say to the gentleman, however, it is headed "Cagayan Sulu," but frequently, to shorten it, they say "Cagayan."

Mr. JONES. I am asking the gentleman a question as to whether or not the author of that article is speaking of Cagayan or Cagayan Sulu?

Mr. MILLER. He is speaking of Cagayan Sulu.

Mr. JONES. Does he say so there?

Mr. MILLER. Absolutely and specifically.

Mr. JONES. Did the gentleman visit Cagayan Sulu while he was there?

Mr. MILLER. Do you mean myself?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. Certainly.

Mr. JONES. Did you visit Cagayan and Cagayan Sulu both?

Mr. MILLER. I will say to the gentleman that there is no island that is properly described by "Cagayan." Now, the gentleman has asked the question, and if he will wait a moment I will tell him. There is a Cagayan Sulu group; there is another group to the north, not Cagayan, although the name on the map is Cagayan, but Cagayanes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER. But the name of that group is Cagayanes, as every man knows and as every reliable map shows. Of course the difference between "Cagayanes" and "Cagayan" is not very great.

Mr. JONES. I will put my question in another form, because I want a specific answer. Did the gentleman visit the island that is marked on the map as "Cagayan," which is near Negros, and did he visit the island that is marked on the map "Cagayan Sulu," that is down near the Sulu Archipelago?

Mr. MILLER. I visited the island of Cagayan Sulu, about which I have been talking since yesterday morning.

Mr. JONES. Will not the gentleman answer my question?

Mr. MILLER. I am answering it. I passed Cagayanes and did not stop.

Mr. JONES. Where is that located?

Mr. MILLER. In the northern part of the Jolo Sea, not far from Negros, as the gentleman says.

Mr. JONES. You did not stop at that point?

Mr. MILLER. I did not.

Mr. JONES. Is it outside of the lines?

Mr. MILLER. I am perfectly frank to say that I never figured out where those lines go. The islands at which I have stopped, and which I have been talking about and calling by name ever since I have commenced to speak, are Cagayan Sulu, and they are located in the Jolo Sea, down in the southwestern part of the archipelago, near Borneo.

Mr. JONES. When he was interrogated as to it, and some gentleman asked him how far it was, did not the gentleman put his hand on Cagayan and say it was about 400 miles from Manila? Does he not know the other islands are about 800 miles from Manila?

Mr. MILLER. Now, just a moment. As the gentleman has interjected a remark that calls for explanation, I want time to give it. I want to call attention to the language I used at the outset, when speaking on this subject, which is found on page 17544 of the RECORD. There I said:

> Now, the islands which we acquired by that last treaty with Spain was that little group of islands called Cagayan de Sulu, in the midst of the Jolo Sea—a little group of islands almost down to Borneo, in the southernmost corner of the archipelago.

I pointed them out. Now, the gentleman invited me to go to the map yesterday, where he proposed to demonstrate to me that I was entirely mistaken; that the islands I was describing, Cagayan de Sulu, were not the islands contained in the last treaty. I refused to go down, and I apologize to the gentleman now for not having gone down, because had I gone down I would have seen unquestionably his mistake. I would have seen that he was referring to a group of islands farther to the north. But the group of islands which I was discussing, and which I located, was a group of islands north of Borneo.

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman say that while that colloquy was going on he ever pointed out the island of Cagayan Sulu?

Mr. MILLER. I will admit, if it will please the gentleman, that possibly in the confusion, inadvertently, in pointing my finger on the map I at one time put it 2 or 3 inches higher than the islands of Cagayan de Sulu; but the island I originally pointed out—and that is what I was speaking about—were the islands of Cagayan de Sulu.

Mr. JONES. Did not the gentleman put his finger right on Cagayan and keep it there, and in answer to a specific question say that this island is about 400 miles from Manila?

Mr. MILLER. Of course I did not do anything of the kind. I can not be responsible for what the gentleman may have thought I did, but I correctly located the islands and described them, and the gentleman immediately said they were not included within the terms of the treaty of 1900. Does the gentleman recede from that position and admit now that they were included?

Mr. JONES. I do not recede from any position I took yesterday, because what I stated then was what was absolutely and literally correct. The RECORD shows it, and the map shows it, and everything connected with the subject shows it, and I think the gentleman is the only single, solitary man in this House who has any opinion to the contrary.

Mr. MILLER. Now, let me ask the gentleman what does the map show? What does the document show that the gentleman describes?

Mr. JONES. If the gentleman will allow me, the map shows that this is the line [indicating] laid down in the treaty of Paris. It runs across in this direction [indicating], and then it comes down here [indicating], and then it goes across there [indicating]; and here is Cagayan Sulu, which is outside of that line. Cagayan Sulu is ceded to us under the treaty of 1900, because as this line was run these islands were thrown outside the archipelago, whereas they are a part of the archipelago.

Now, when it was discovered that that island there [indicating] and this little island here [indicating], Sibutu, just outside of the line there——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman be permitted to have five minutes more, so that I can explain in his time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES. That island was just outside the line, and this one [indicating] was considerably out; and by a subsequent agreement, entered into in 1900, the United States bought that island and this island and all other islands around here [indicating]. There were some up here at the north which were outside of this line, but the Cagayan Island, of which the gentleman spoke yesterday, was embraced in the treaty of Paris. This is Cagayan Sulu.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I will not yield further to the gentleman.

Mr. JONES. Cagayan is hundreds of miles within the territory.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I think this great question of where the gentleman from Minnesota had his finger should be settled. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLER. "The gentleman from Minnesota" has the floor.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MILLER. Yes; I yield for a question.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to find out, if I can, what this controversy regarding this island has to do with the principles involved in this bill.

Mr. JONES. Nothing whatever.

Mr. MILLER. The gentleman is entitled to his opinion and I am entitled to mine.

Now, I behold that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] admits that the islands which I described yesterday as clearly as I could and located with accurate description were islands outside the line bounding the possessions acquired under the treaty of 1898, and the islands that were included in the subsequent treaty of 1900. Therefore the fresh-water lake that I was describing, the natural advantages and value there found, are the property of the United States.

Now, if the gentleman says that anybody here inadvertently pointed to the word "Cagayan" in a little group of islands farther to the north, maybe it was done. Maybe I did it myself. But when I was discussing the bill I specifically located and pointed out on the map where this island of Cagayan de Sulu is. But the important fact is that the islands which I described yesterday, with those two matchless harbors, were not in any sense of the term on a footing with the other islands in the archipelago. They are the property of the United States, purchased by the United States by a treaty made in 1900; and the inhabitants, so far as there are any inhabitants on the island, desire that they shall remain under the flag of the United States.

Mr. JONES. Now, will the gentleman let me ask him a specific question, just to get at the truth of this matter?

Mr. MILLER. Certainly.

Mr. JONES. I looked up the RECORD and found out what the gentleman said. The RECORD shows that the gentleman stated that the island he was asked about was about 600 miles from Manila. What I want to ask of the gentleman is this: Did he not state to the House that it was 400 miles from Manila? And did he not, under the liberal rules under which we are proceeding, which allow gentlemen to correct their remarks and extend them, change it in the RECORD from "400" to "600"?

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad that the gentleman asked the question. I think the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] asked the question how far it was, or the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULDEN]. I said I could not say exactly, but I thought it was 400 miles. When I went over the RECORD, I will say, I did correct that to "600," but that is about the only correction I made. I will add this, however: I asked for the manuscript of the colloquy that I had with the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] after he had corrected it. It was handed to me, and there was scarcely a word of the original record left. The entire record was in the handwriting of the gentleman from Virginia. I did not correct it, because there was nothing to correct. I do not say that the gentleman changed it materially. There was a great deal of confusion in the Hall at the time, and——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has again expired.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman admits that I did not make any change as to any statement of fact, does he not? I only changed phraseology.

Mr. MILLER. I will make that admission, and I will say that no change was made by me as to any matter of fact, except that I changed the figures "400" to "600," because I thought 600 was more nearly correct; but I did not change a word in respect to the location of the islands or in respect to the description which was given.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GOULDEN. When did the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota visit those islands?

Mr. MILLER. I visited those particular islands in October of last year. I will say to the gentleman, further, that in making that particular trip I went down entirely through the Sulu Archipelago to visit the Sulu Islands, inhabited by Moros, and to go down, if possible, to Sibutu, the furthermost point; and having arrived at that point, then in order to make Cagayan we skirted along Borneo for a whole day and part of a night, with Borneo plainly in sight; and of course my recollection is vivid and distinct that then we turned north and went about eight hours and landed at Cagayan de Sulu. Therefore it seems to me that, putting aside all the confusion that perhaps did naturally arise, those two wonderful harbors of measureless value to any commercial nation are the absolute property of the United States and should not be bargained away.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. I yield to the gentleman from North Dakota.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Is it not a fact that four well-known explorers who visited that island prior to the gentleman from Minnesota described the island as Cagayan Sulu, and also specifically called attention to the fresh-water lakes lying beside the outer deep harbor?

Mr. MILLER. That is entirely true, as shown by the remarks of the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG] on the preceding day.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I am surprised that my friend from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] should die as hard as he does. Although this may not be a very important matter, I wish the House to understand it. The treaty of Paris specifically defined the territory that was ceded to the United States. These lines on the map, marked "Paris treaty line," this straight line running south, then running southwest so as to take in Palawan, then running south again, then east and then south, are the lines described in the Paris treaty. It was discovered sometime afterwards that there were several small, unimportant islands belonging to the Philippine Archipelago, that had been excluded by these lines, so that in 1900 President McKinley negotiated a treaty by which the Spanish Government ceded to the United States these outlying, excluded islands in consideration of $100,000. Now, because some of the islands were very near the line, the treaty undertook to mention them specifically. There were two of them. One of them was Cagayan Sulu, which you see is outside the line, and the other was Sibutu, away down here in the extreme south. When the gentleman was discussing this subject the other day, standing by this map, he never once directed attention to Cagayan Sulu. He spoke of Cagayan Sulu as if it were two islands. He maintained that there were three islands instead of two, and he referred to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD containing a speech of the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG], in which there was a comma between the word Cagayan and the word Sulu, to prove that there were three islands—Cagayan, Sulu, and Sibutu, the last being this little island down here.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Now, to-day the gentleman admits that there are only two islands, Cagayan Sulu and Sibutu. Yet he comes here and undertakes——

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield? I did the gentleman the courtesy to yield, and he made the most of my speech.

Mr. JONES. I will yield in a moment. The gentleman now claims that he spoke of Cagayan Sulu.

Mr. MILLER. I am sure the gentleman does not want to make a direct misstatement.

Mr. JONES. I do not.

Mr. MILLER. I distinctly stated that there were two groups of islands, Cagayan Sulu and Sibutu, with their dependencies, as the treaty says, and no man can now say what the dependencies were. The gentleman from Kentucky thought the Cagayan referred to was in the northern part of Luzon, where there is a Province called Cagayan, and a great river, the greatest in the island of Luzon, the Rio Grande de Cagayan; and I told him that while the names were the same and that it might lead to an argument, yet it was not so. Now, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] took issue with that. The treaty distinctly mentions these names and their dependencies. I do not know what the dependencies are, and the gentleman does not know, but I do know that the map correctly shows Cagayan Sulu exactly as I discussed it and located it yesterday.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman from Minnesota had 15 minutes, and he can not take up all my time.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the Government lose any rights by reason of the failure of the gentleman from Minnesota to indicate those islands on the map with his finger the other day?

Mr. JONES. It will lose nothing at all; but I call the attention of the gentleman from Michigan to this fact, that the gentleman from Minnesota offered an amendment excluding from the operation of this bill an island that he spoke of as Cagayan, and he put his finger on it, and he said it was south of Manila Bay, and about 400 miles distant.

Mr. MILLER. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MURRAY. I offer an amendment.

Mr. JONES. Has my time expired, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 3, by inserting, at the end of line 13, the following: "Private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation."

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, I think the chairman of the committee will not object to that. I do not wish to discuss it.

Mr. JONES. If that provision is not incorporated in one of the other paragraphs, I think the committee will have no objection to it.

Mr. CLINE. Is not that included in section 3—

That no law shall be enacted in said islands which shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or deny to any person therein the equal protection of the laws.

Mr. JONES. That refers particularly to criminal proceedings.

Mr. MURRAY. That section does not cover it; but in section 26 there is a provision which does cover it, and I will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. JONES. I thought it must be in the bill somewhere.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. Mr. Chairman, I do not feel disposed to take up the time of the committee, but on yesterday the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] and I had a controversy about a statement that I made regarding the leaders of the Philippine insurrection in 1907. The distinguished chairman of the committee said, in effect, that, in his judgment, I had misinterpreted the language of Dr. Worcester. Whereupon I read from Dr. Worcester's work, which, in my opinion, at any rate, justified me in my conclusions. I have investigated the subject a little further. I remember distinctly that when I was in the Philippine Islands, only a few years subsequent to the happening of these events, it was a matter of general talk that there had been a selling out. But I find I am fully sustained in my statement by an author properly vouched for.

The chairman of the committee on October 1 referred to the accuracy of the statements in the work of James A. Leroy as having been vouched for by the former President of the United States, Hon. William H. Taft, and therefore he considered it reliable. So that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] has qualified as a character witness for the author, whose work I shall presently quote. Mr. Leroy, in the first volume of his work, "The Americans in the Philippines," devotes quite a chapter to the Filipino insurrection. In a chapter entitled "The revolt against Spain," he narrates with considerable detail transactions that occurred between Primo de Rivera, the Spanish governor general of the islands, and the insurgent chiefs operating through Pedro A. Paterno, who was a very prominent citizen of Manila at that time, and who, I believe, still is a prominent citizen of that city.

As the negotiations proceeded, it was finally proposed that the insurgents would lay down their arms and some of the prominent leaders would agree to quit the country upon the payment of a sum of money. These negotiations went on back and forth for some little time. In the meantime there was a change in the Spanish cabinet, on October 4, 1907. Rivera was not in sympathy with the newly appointed Liberal cabinet and sent in his resignation on October 5. Evidently it was not accepted promptly, for about two days later he sent an urgent message to the Spanish cabinet at Madrid urging that his proposition for the settlement of the Philippine insurrection on a money basis be agreed to. I shall now read the three propositions he urged on the Spanish Government. Leroy sums them up in the following language, on page 130 of his work:

"He presented the advantages of the plan as being: The saving of money; the saving of lives (the annual loss through deaths and sickness being 40 per cent, or 10,000 men; and that it would destroy the prestige of the chiefs who sold out and emigrated." [Applause on the Republican side.] In order to thoroughly emphasize the baseness of the transaction the author has put the words "would destroy the prestige of the chiefs who sold out and emigrated" in italics.

That is on page 130, volume 1, of James A. Leroy's "The Americans in the Philippines," second edition. Here is Primo de Rivera, the man who negotiated with these leaders of the insurrection, who knows exactly all the details of the agreements between them and himself, who cables to his home Government urging the acceptance of his proposition, and stating as one reason for that acceptance that it "would destroy the prestige of the chiefs who sold out and emigrated."

Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to take up the time of the committee any further except to say that the work of Leroy gives the "Memoria" of Primo de Rivera, pages 125–127, as authority for the author's statement.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, I thought I was right when I withdrew my amendment, but the gentleman has called my attention to the fact that the provision in section 26 only relates to franchises and the eminent-domain provision. I think the amendment which I offered ought to go in right here, and I again offer that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, at the end of line 13, by inserting the following:
"Private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation."

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, the very apparent reason why this bill has been forced up for consideration by the House at this time and under a special rule and out of the regular order of the procedure of the House is that other and more important legislation, which the majority seemingly does not wish considered and acted upon, may be smoothly and diplomatically sidetracked. No great pressing or urgent necessity for now occupying the time of the House with this bill has been disclosed in the debate. No one has explained and no one knows any reason why preference should be given to the consideration of legislation affecting the Philippine Islands over other important legislation affecting the most vital welfare of the people of these United States that has been pending before committees of the House for many months. And do gentlemen on that side deem it more important, and are they willing to go before the country with the candid statement that they deem it more important to the interest and welfare of the people of this Government that this measure be considered at this time rather than that the best endeavors of the Members of Congress be directed to a solution and betterment of rural credit conditions in this country?

This country of ours is peculiarly dependent upon its agricultural development and prosperity. While we may marvel at the development of our towns and cities, the number of our shops and factories, a fatal error is made when is overlooked and neglected the importance of that industry on which all our commercial and manufacturing enterprises are so dependent. From the hillsides and from the valleys, from the quiet fields of our farm lands, come the products which give very existence to the noisy clang of the city and business hum of our commerce and our trade

All permanent and stable national prosperity and development is unquestionably founded upon the agricultural success of the Nation. If our farms and ranches are allowed to become neglected and deserted, it will not be long until the streets of our cities are grass grown and the whir of our factories and workshops is stilled. No one thing more than another tends to prevent the ownership of farm homes and the occupation of more of our agricultural lands than the high rate of interest our American farmers are obliged to pay for the credits they of necessity must have to carry on their farming operations, both on account of our system of business and on account of the time it requires to mature their farm products. To-day the American farmer pays a much greater interest rate for his farm loans than is paid by the farmer in any other of the principal nations of the world. The rate in the United States paid by farmers on their loans is estimated to be about 8½ per cent per annum, while in the principal European nations the rate is less than one-half of the rate here.

The question of rural credits has been widely studied and generally discussed throughout the country during the past few years. The platform adopted at the Baltimore convention in 1912 announced that the Democratic Party considered the question of rural credits of equal importance with the question of currency reform. The Republican platform adopted at Chicago in 1912 says on this subject:

It is of the greatest importance to the social and economical welfare of this country that its farmers have facilities for borrowing easily and cheaply the money they need to increase the productivity of their lands. It is as important that financial machinery be provided to supply the demand of farm credits as it is that the banking and currency systems be reformed in the interest of general business. Therefore we recommend and urge an authoritative investigation of agricultural credit societies and corporations in other countries and the passage of State and Federal laws for the establishment and capable supervision of organizations having for their purpose the loaning of funds to farmers.

President Wilson, in his message delivered in person to the House and Senate on December 2, 1913, devoted a considerable portion of the message to a well-worded statement pertaining to the importance of agriculture and the business and activities of the farmers of this country. Following his reference to the use of money from the general fund of the Treasury of the United States to assist in the movement of crops the President said:

But we must not allow ourselves to depend upon extraordinary expediency. We must add the means by which the farmer may make his credit constantly and easily available and may command when he will the capital by which to support and expand his business. We lag behind the many other great countries of the modern world in attempting to do this. Systems of rural credits have been studied and developed on the other side of the water while we left our farmers to shift for themselves in the ordinary money market. You have but to look about you in any rural district to see the results—the handicap and embarrassment which have been put upon those who produce our food.

Mr. Chairman, in view of what has already been said and done, and in view of the agricultural and rural credit conditions in our Nation to-day, in all fairness and in honesty and justice to the men and women and to the boys and girls on the farms of this Nation, who produce the food we consume, this Congress should before this have considered and acted upon some of the bills that have been introduced in the House and in the Senate and which propose a solution and an improvement of rural credit conditions in this country.

At the expense of the Government and under authority of the act passed by the Sixty-second Congress a thorough study and investigation of the rural credit systems of Europe has already been made. The United States commission, cooperating with the American commission in the study of the rural credit systems and problems, has made voluminous and valuable reports of their investigations and their conclusions. For many months all the facts and all the information necessary for the Congress to proceed with the enactment of rural credit legislation has been before it. Still nothing definite has been done, and, what is even worse, the position now taken by the majority party in the Congress indicates it will not permit any rural credit legislation to be brought up for consideration during this session of Congress.

When the Federal reserve act was being considered the Democratic caucus, which in this Congress and this administration is, excluding the President, "the all-wise and the all-powerful," held that rural credit legislation should not be made a part of the banking and currency bill. It was then generally given out that rural credit legislation would be taken up shortly after the passage of the Federal reserve act, which was approved by the President on December 23, 1913. Last spring hearings were held by the subcommittee of the Committees on Banking and Currency of the Senate and of the House charged with the investigation of rural credits. When these hearings were concluded early in the summer it was then given out that after the passage of the principal appropriation bills rural credit legislation would then be taken up in the House. The principal appropriation bills have long since been passed; summer has come and summer has gone; the seed sown by the farmer when hearings were being held before the subcommittee has come forth from the ground, has bloomed and has blossomed, its fruit has been harvested, but still the promises of rural credit legislation bear no fruition.

Gag rule after gag rule has been brought into the House and has been jammed through by that side, so that legislation might be speedily enacted for the relief of the banker, the shipowner, the railroad magnate, and even for the pleasure-seeking American tourist spending hours of idleness abroad. Some powerful influence seems to be responsible for the continued neglect in this Congress of the interest of the American farmer. It is well known that the President has thus far held the majority party in the Congress in the hollow of his hand; his will has been their will; a word from the President at any time during the last year to the leaders of the majority party in the Congress would have resulted in having brought up for immediate consideration of the House and Senate some of the pending rural credit bills. It is fair to ask, and the farmers of the country are asking, Why has this word not been given?

The farmers of the country are slowly waking up to a full knowledge of the real kind of treatment their interests have been given by this Congress, and when they have waked up and are thoroughly aroused I predict that those responsible for broken promises made in regard to rural credit legislation will be required to answer.

Our farmers have been patient and long suffering in bearing the burdens of high interest charges, but the time is near at hand when they will be heard from in protest in this country in no uncertain terms and in a manner and in a way that will brook no refusal or delay of prompt action for their relief by the President, the Congress, or the money lenders of the country.

Two million five hundred thousand dollars have been appropriated within the past few weeks to aid pleasure seekers in Europe. The Vreeland-Aldrich Currency Act is being used as a means to assist the bankers, commercial business interests, and stock gamblers of the country. Millions of dollars of currency, the payment of which is guaranteed by the United States, is being given out to the banks at interest rates of 2 and 3 per cent per annum. This statement which I hold in my hand shows the amount of emergency currency loaned by the Government to the banks of the country and to the banks in each State up to the close of business on September 26, 1914:

Amount of emergency currency issued at close of business Saturday, September 26, 1914.

For months reports have been circulated from Washington and widely published in the papers of the country that the Secretary of the Treasury had furnished from $30,000,000 to $50,000,000 to the small banks of the country for crop-moving purposes. Desiring to know the actual facts concerning this, several days ago I requested the Treasury Department to send me a statement of the amount of money belonging to the general fund of the Treasury deposited in the banks of each State for crop-moving purposes. After meeting with many delays and evasive answers for several days, I was finally told by one of the Assistant Secretaries in the Treasury Department that Mr. McAdoo, Secretary of the Treasury, had given orders that this information was confidential and should not be given out to the public or to Members of Congress. I then introduced, as a privileged resolution, House resolution 632, providing that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to furnish such statement for the information of Members of the House. The day following the introduction of my resolution the information I had requested was sent me by the Treasury Department and given to the papers for publication. It disclosed that not thirty nor fifty millions of dollars had been deposited for crop-moving purposes, but that up to September 28, 1914, $13,029,746 had so been deposited.

Following is the statement sent me by the Secretary of the Treasury, showing that the following amounts have been deposited in national banks in the States mentioned up to September 28 for crop-moving purposes:

Alabama	$300,000
Arkansas	175,000
Florida	81,250
Georgia	368,750
Kentucky	1,375,000
Louisiana	700,000
Maryland	1,450,000
Mississippi	150,000
North Carolina	456,250
South Carolina	525,000
Tennessee	675,000
Texas	793,750
Virginia	798,750
Colorado	499,996
Illinois	1,200,000
Indiana	150,000
Iowa	250,000
Kansas	25,000
Missouri	1,550,000
Nebraska	325,000
Oklahoma	93,500
Washington	87,500
New York	1,000,000
Total	13,029,746

During the last few months the Government has loaned to the banks of the country almost $400,000,000 at a rate of interest of 2 per cent and 3 per cent. Are the farmers and the small business men of the country sharing in the benefits of this special assistance by the Government? No reports that I have received or have observed would so indicate. The following from a financial review of the country, contained in the New York World of September 6, presents the position of the banking interests of the country in this crisis of hard times:

WHERE THE PROFITS COME IN.

The present strained conditions in the domestic as well as the international financial situation are providing opportunities for banking profits such as have not been offered before in a generation. The Federal as well as the municipal government has been placing these money-making chances in the way of these institutions with remarkable liberality. The banks have been given a free hand to take out emergency currency in unlimited amounts at 3 per cent interest, while the lowest rate now quoted for mercantile paper is 7 per cent for the best names, and the minimum for time loans now prevailing in New York is 8 per cent. For collateral stock-exchange call loans the rate, however, is only 6 per cent. In this connection there was much comment yesterday on President Wilson's statement in his war-tax message that the administration hesitated to withdraw the $75,000,000 from the banks at this time and was forced to the alternative of taxing the consumers of the country $100,000,000 a year. In the meantime the enormous speculation in wheat, flour, and commodities is being financed by the banks that are the object of so much solicitude on the part of the Government.

THE FARMER'S SIDE.

Within the past 30 days I have received a great many letters from almost every section of the United States showing the difficulty to secure farm loans at any rate and showing how the money that is being gathered up by the banks of the country is being used for the purpose of speculation in the products of the farmers rather than being used to improve and better American farm conditions. I am going to read just a few of the letters which I have received and which are typical of many others received on this subject. The following is a letter from H. S. Mobley, head of the department of farmers' institutes of the State Agricultural School at Russellville, Ark.:

RUSSELLVILLE, ARK., September 6, 1914.

Hon. P. D. NORTON, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. NORTON: I have your favor asking regarding condition of farm loans, both land and personal, in this section on account of or as affected by the European war.

Simply there is now no such thing as a farm loan of any character throughout the South. This is an unqualified fact. I tried yesterday to put up gilt-edged security for a small loan and there is but one response, 'We are not making any loans." BUT THIS IS TRUE ONLY AS REGARDS THE FARMER. Commercial business is crippled in this regard, but is getting accommodations all the same. Do not construe this statement as being local because I say "I tried yesterday." We know that this is the condition in the South everywhere. There is no loan of any kind to the farmer on any kind of security now, cotton or anything else.

The interest rate in normal times is about 10 per cent on well-secured loans; that is, the men who have good bank credit pay this, but the poor man at the bottom of the ladder pays any interest they can make him pay, from 10 per cent up, up, up, and still up.

I will be in Washington at the National Hotel next Thursday and would like very much to see and talk with you personally about this.

I thank you for the inquiry and for the opportunity of giving you briefly the farmers' condition in this regard.

Sincerely,

H. S. MOBLEY.

Under date of September 7, Mr. Herbert Quick, the well-known educator and author and the present editor of Farm and Fireside, writes me from Berkeley Springs, W. Va., as follows, concerning rural credits:

In this part of the country there is no loan market at all, and banks are absolutely unable to accommodate farmers in the matter of real estate loans. The legal rate is 6 per cent here, but there is absolutely no money to be had.

I have stated my views on the matter of rural credits in my testimony before the joint hearings held by the committees of Senator HOLLIS and Representative BULKLEY. I have now made up my mind that the best thing for Congress to do would be to pass a strict Landschaft bill, and I would like to see Mr. David Lubin's ideas embodied in the act. Such a law passed by Congress could not be operative in very many States, but there would be some satisfaction in knowing that when a State placed itself in position to conform to the act it would have the best rural credit system possible. In the meantime, if the States preferred some other and more strictly "American system," there is nothing to prevent them from putting their own ideas into practice, as has already been done in Wisconsin and New York.

Abel Ady, president of the Klamath Water Users' Association, writes me from Midland, Oreg.:

MIDLAND, OREG., September 3, 1914.

Hon. P. D. NORTON, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: During the past 10 years this locality has been undergoing unusual agricultural development as a reclamation project under the reclamation act.

As is universally true during the rapid development of any new country, the farmers and real home makers have been at the mercy of speculators and local money sharks.

Homes can not be developed from a native wilderness within a short period of years except by the use of large sums of money for the improvement of each home. To meet the expense of clearing, fencing, cultivating, and providing buildings and stock requires an expenditure during the first few years in amounts possessed by very few men who are willing to undergo the privations incident to a new country.

Such home makers are generally without outside credit and are limited to such credit as local money lenders are willing to extend. The class of money lenders attracted to such fields are generally the descendants of Shylock, demanding rates of interest that exhaust the entire proceeds of the farms over and above a bare subsistence and find it necessary to foreclose by the time the lands are cleared and improved. Through their banking associations these Shylocks easily defeat all attempts of farmers to secure outside loans, kindly brand the farmers as failures, and generally offer long prayers after each foreclosure proceeding. During the past 10 years the prevailing rates of interest in this locality have ranged from 10 per cent upward, sufficient sums being available at these rates to enable the farmer to continue work until the lands are improved.

During the past winter the fear of passage of rural credit legislation encouraged the advancement of increased loans at the former rates of interest. The failure of the Committee on Banking and Currency to report a rural credit bill in harmony with the recommendations of the President was followed by a general withdrawal of local farm loans past due and refusal to extend further loans to the extent of former years.

The European war announcements have been followed by absolute refusals of farm and chattel loans by local banks, and our farmers have been compelled to do their harvesting by exchange of work with one another and by exchange of various commodities in payment for work.

* * * * * * *

According to the doctrine of our great Teacher, the most despicable person is not the thief or the harlot, but the hypocrite.

We believe that our Representatives in Congress are desirous of providing a rural-credit banking law for the benefit of the farmer, and we believe that the American bankers have already received their share of beneficial banking legislation.

The European war conditions have resulted in a general rise in the prices of meats, while the prices of cattle and hogs offered on the market by farmers have in most instances fallen. The prices at which grain is being delivered from the middlemen to the world's market are being steadily advanced, while the middlemen are buying from our farmers at the prices prevailing before the announcement of the European wars.

While we still have faith in our country, past experience forces us to slightly mistrust some citizens.

Believing that an appropriate rural-credit banking law will yet be enacted in this country, we remain,

Very respectfully,

ABEL ADY,
President Klamath Water Users' Association.

Mr. M. F. Patton, secretary of the Mitchell Trust Co., of Mitchell, S. Dak., writes me:

At the present time the greatest trouble is finding an outlet for real estate loans. The large investors all seem to be out of the market at the present time, and the only sale we have for loans is small investors and personal clients.

Mr. George W. Fischer, secretary of the Northwestern Land and Home Builders' Union, of Redfield, S. Dak., writes me:

REDFIELD, S. DAK., September 2, 1914.

Hon. P. D. NORTON, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Am in receipt of your favor of recent date, and beg to say as follows:

"Sit tight, do not lower rents, but increase the price of foodstuffs and rates of interest" seems to be the slogan of the landlords, merchants, and bankers as a general proposition in this my own State.

Now, as to the present farm-loan business, just wish to say that the farming community in this part of my State are paying from 7 per cent to 10 per cent for money, and in many cases really do not know that, considering commissions and other perquisites, they are paying much more than they ought to.

As to the effect, if any, the European war has on the financial situation as regards real estate and chattel loans is best told in the following words: We do not know what is going to happen next, is the scare that is being thrown into the people in this neck of the woods. We must charge more for money and get better security.

There is a big demand for money, especially by our farming contingent, but here is what they get for an introduction: "We are not making loans at present. On the contrary, we are calling in our loans." This is nice in the face of the fact that this same element advertises to the world at large that there is now on deposit in the banks of this State more than $90,000,000, an average of $150 to every one of a 600,000 population.

But you never see any figures or statistics showing the mortgage, bond, and other indebtedness for this State per capita.

Now, Mr. NORTON, in addition, want to express my individual opinion of our new currency law in relation to agricutural States such as the writer lives in. The farming element will never get any benefit out of your new currency law for the simple reason that 90 per cent of our loaning fraternity are owners and speculators in lands, to a greater or lesser extent, and looking this matter square in the face from a human standpoint the actual tiller of the soil will not get a look-in, as the aforesaid fraternity will plant their mortgages first and at the same time absorb the moneys for which they pay from 2½ per cent to 4 per cent for deposits. It is a good law, but not for the producer.

Federal rural legislation is what is urgently needed, with long time amortization of the principal and a fair rate of interest.

Thanking you again for your courtesy, I am,

Yours, truly,

GEORGE W. FISCHER,
Secretary of the Northwestern Land and Home Builders' Union.

I have in my office a large number of letters from almost every State in the United States, similar to those I have read, giving expression to the deplorable and the intolerable conditions of rural credits in this country and the urgent need for Federal legislative relief. The longer this debate proceeds the more clearly it is emphasized that there is no immediate need for this proposed legislation for people of the Philippine Islands, and that the present time, with a world war raging, is a most inopportune time for its consideration. This time of the House should be given to the enactment of rural credit legislation to relieve some of the heavy burdens that are being borne by those who till our soil and produce our crops.

While the debate and the controversies over the geography of the Philippine Archipelago that we have just listened to between the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] have been interesting, it strengthens the position that I take—that this bill should not now be before the House. By every right and reason this Congress should now be giving its time and its best thoughts to the interests of our own people at home. We have already spent too much time in this Congress enacting legislation for the benefit of foreign industries, foreign people, and for that class of people in our own country who spend a large part of their time in traveling abroad.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma is a very proper one. I did not, however, rise for the purpose of discussing that. One of the most able newspapers in the United States is the Washington Post. The Washington Post is generally pretty sound on the larger national questions, and its expressions of opinion are widely read and influential throughout the country. I desire to have read in my time an editorial from the Washington Post of this morning relative to this legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A MISCHIEVOUS DISCUSSION.

The discussion of Philippine independence at this time is inopportune and mischievous. No well-balanced and well-informed American with any regard for the Filipinos would turn them out upon their own resources at this time. The most intelligent Filipinos themselves admit that their people are not up to the task of self-government. Only a small portion of the inhabitants of Luzon are on a par with the people of certain feeble and revolutionary republics; the others range from the peon type down to naked headhunters.

As for a larger measure of participation in their own government, this is being forced upon the Filipinos faster than they can digest it. There is nothing stingy in the doses of self-government administered by the United States. Participation in the government has more than kept pace with popular education, which has been very rapid. The education of the people, especially the young, is the greatest boon that the United States has conferred upon the people. It far exceeds in benefit the extension of political privileges. The natives can not well misuse the education they have acquired, but they are prompt to misapply and misuse their political privileges. Without any foundation for the erection of a self-governing system, without any experience in government, the people of the Philippine Islands, if turned loose, would present one of the most pathetic failures in history, ending inevitably in their absorption by some government that could and would administer their affairs with intelligence.

Is the United States willing that some other government should take over the Philippines? That is what "independence" would mean. Would the Filipinos be better off as vassals of Japan than they are as wards of the United States? Is the history of the United States in the Philippines to be ended by writing the single word "failure"? Americans do not yet acknowledge the superiority of the Japanese civilization or system of government over the American system, and the time may not arrive when it will be necessary to make such an acknowledgment. Certainly it is not the duty of patriotic Americans to take any steps which would imply the inability of the United States to complete the task it has undertaken in the Philippines.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Wyoming if the editorial which he had read into the RECORD from the Washington Post does not come from the same Washington Post that recently was very assiduously urging and insisting on American intervention in Mexico?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I have never read anything of that sort in the Washington Post. There may have been something of the sort in it, possibly.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. By the way, Mr. Chairman, what is the status of Mexico this morning, anyway?

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe there is any necessity for incorporating in the first paragraph of section 3 the language embodied in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY]. The amendment provides that no property shall be taken without just compensation. The first paragraph of section 3 provides that no law shall be enacted in said islands which shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. It is my opinion, Mr. Chairman, that the provision that property shall not be taken without due process of law covers the proposition of the gentleman, and that it is unnecessary to add that it shall not be taken without just compensation. But, Mr. Chairman, I have no great objection to the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman recall that the Constitution of the United States contains this language:

nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation?

Mr. JONES. I had not done so. I do not object to the addition of that language.

Mr. MURRAY. But they could change the law. This is absolutely essential, because they could change the law by which the public could take the property.

Mr. JONES. I understand. I suggest that the gentleman put his amendment in the language of the Federal Constitution.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman's amendment is in the language of the Federal Constitution, as I heard it read.

Mr. MURRAY. I thought so.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. Does not the gentleman think it is out of place to talk here about the Federal Constitution, inasmuch as we have no provision in this bill for a jury trial? We are not framing this bill after the American jurisprudence. We allow even a justice of the peace to hang a man if he wants to under the terms of this bill.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman can offer an amendment providing for a jury system if he sees fit.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I had read in my time a moment ago an editorial from the Washington Post, an influential and ably edited newspaper of this city. The New York Sun is a paper which for many years has been held throughout the country to be one of the most ably edited papers not only in the United States but in the world, and I desire to have read in my time an editorial from the Sun of to-day on this same question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A STATESMANLIKE POLICY.

It was Mr. MANN, the minority leader in the House, who, when the resolution to admit the Red Cross ship to American registry was under discussion, said that it was "extremely important that everyone in official life, as well as those in private life, ought to resolve firmly that he will not be carried away with any hysterical emotion or any partisan feeling for or against either side in this conflict abroad." There may be a disposition to think that, as Japan has entered the conflict, Mr. MANN offended against the spirit of his own injunction when he predicted a war between the United States and Asiatic countries in the debate on the Philippine bill.

We do not take that view of Mr. MANN's speculation. It was a very long-range speculation and entirely academic. He hoped that the conflict would be only commercial, but he had his doubts, and they ran far into the future, the "sleeping monster" China being coupled with Japan as a possible adversary. No diplomat would take such theorizing seriously. The State Department will not be asked to explain. As to Mr. MANN's opinions about the political future of the Filipinos, he reflected Republican policy as declared in national platforms. The last time anything definite was said on the subject was in 1908, as follows:

"Education and practical experience there"—in the Philippines—"are advancing the capacity of the people for government, and the policies of McKinley and Roosevelt are leading the inhabitants step by step to an ever-increasing measure of home rule."

There has never been an intimation in any Republican platform from 1900 to 1912, inclusive, that the United States would grant the Filipinos the independence the Democrats profess to be willing to give them. Mr. MANN goes further than ex-President Taft, who has said—and no American is better informed on the subject—that "a policy of separation at this time is a suicidal policy for the benefit of none but the politicians of the islands." Mr. Taft was pronouncing judgment upon the Jones bill. Mr. MANN would retain the Philippines for the welfare of their people and also for commercial and strategical reasons, maintaining that the United States should not handicap itself in the inevitable struggle for paramount influence in the Pacific by parting with the islands. He would give the Filipinos self-government under the American flag and "make them friends of the United States."

It is a statesmanlike policy. If it be objected that the second part of Mr. MANN's program is not feasible, the spectacle of native Indian princes and their subjects taking the field to preserve the British Empire may be pointed out to his critics. The world has never seen a better colonial government than the United States has established in the Philippines, and where the greatest good of the greatest number is secured by an enlightened policy, the consequence will eventually be the loyalty of the people governed.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, while I very much doubt that the purpose of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY] was to promote the enactment of this bill, while I very greatly doubt whether he has any interest in its welfare, I do think that the observations he made a moment ago were somewhat pertinent. A reading of these editorials and the range of discussion at the present time do not bear directly on the bill, but do have a tendency to retard its enactment. Now, I believe that the legislation proposed is wise. I think it will be a good thing for the Filipinos, and I know it will be a good thing for the American people if we can bring about. I will say to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] if he happens to be present, a complete and absolute separation of the two peoples, and I hope that this tardy consideration of the bill will give way to a recognition of a serious effort on the part of Members on both sides of the House to advance it and get wise legislation through it. I very rarely have objected to the reading of editorials——

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I will.

Mr. COOPER. I hope the gentleman from Texas will not object just now, because I have a brief editorial which appeared in a paper of great prominence 12 years ago, which I now have before me and I think it ought to be read this morning.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman anticipated me, in a way, and to some degree misunderstood what I was about to say. It has rarely happened in the course of my service in this House that I have undertaken to interfere with the putting of any reasonable amount of editorials or essays of any sort into the RECORD, but aside from the fact it encumbers a document which should be a record of the proceedings here, the purpose of it is manifestly to delay the consideration of the bill. Of course I will not object to the putting into the RECORD of the article referred to by the gentleman from Wisconsin, but I am going to object if more are offered.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GOULDEN. Does not the gentleman think, however, that all this exploiting of three most excellent papers in this country is something from which the House can learn wisdom?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I do not.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Chairman, for the present I withdraw the point.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws the point of order.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I have not so far participated in the discussion initiated by the remarks of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] with respect to the alleged purchase of the Filipino leaders. I had felt that probably all had been said on that matter that ought to be said; but since it has been again opened this morning by the gentleman from California, in justice to those leaders, it seems to me not inappropriate to read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 17, 1900, an excerpt from a speech made by one of the greatest intellects in the Republican Party. He said in that speech:

The people of the Philippine Islands have never submitted themselves willingly to Spain. There has been no time for two centuries when they would not have been free from the yoke if they could. Their history has been a history of cruelty and oppression on one side, of resistance and the aspiration for freedom on the other.

In 1896 a rebellion broke out, headed by Aguinaldo. His people were unarmed and poor. The difficulty of communication in a country without roads made combination impossible against a power that commanded the sea and the seaports. Still, the revolt was formidable enough to compel Spain to make promises of reform and redress of grievances. Aguinaldo, seeing that a continued strife would cost much suffering, many lives, and in all likelihood defeat in the end, accepted Spain's promise of amendment and agreed that the principal leaders of the rebellion, their wives, widows, and children, should go into exile and that Spain should make some provision for their support.

Spain was faithless to her promise of reform and paid over only part of the money. This transaction has been much criticized here, but, in my judgment, it leaves no stain on the honesty or patriotism of the insurgent chief. There is no evidence that he profited himself by the transaction or expended a penny of the money for his own use. The transaction was, as circumstances then were, for the interest of his people.

Many advocates of imperialism who have investigated the matter have declared their confidence in Aguinaldo's integrity. Mr. Schurman, president of the commission, told his students at Cornell when he got home that Aguinaldo was an honest and a patriotic man. Our consuls bear this same testimony.

Mr. Williams, United States consul general at Manila, under date of March 28, 1898, says:

"Rebellion never more threatening to Spain. Rebels getting money, arms, and friends, and they outnumber the Spaniards a hundred to one."

March 21, 1898, he writes of the desertion of an entire regiment of the Spanish forces to the insurgents, and adds:

"Now 5,000 armed rebels, who for days have been in camp near Manila and have been reenforced from the mountains, plan to attack the city to-night."

On April 28, 1898, Mr. Pratt wrote a letter to Mr. Day, in which he speaks of "learning from Gen. Aguinaldo the state and object sought to be obtained, which, though absent from the Philippines, he was directing."

Mr. Pratt further says, in a letter to Secretary Day:

"Gen. Aguinaldo impressed me as a man of intellectual ability, courage, and worthy of the confidence that had been placed in him."

He says further:

"No close observer of what has transpired in the Philippines during the past four years could have failed to recognize that Gen. Aguinaldo enjoyed, above all others, the confidence of the Philippine insurgents and the respect alike of the Spanish and foreigners in the islands, all of whom vouched for his justice and high sense of honor."

Mr. Williams wrote Mr. Moore on July 18, 1898:

"Gen. Aguinaldo, Agoncillo, and Sandico are all men who would be leaders in their separate departments in any country."

I have studied as well as I could the character and career of Aguinaldo. I do not compare him with Washington. To Americans there is one character too lofty, one name too sacred, for parallel or comparison. But I believe he is to take a high rank hereafter among the men who have lived and died for liberty. He deserves to be remembered with that small band who have given life, and everything dearer than life, to their country in a losing cause.

"To his loved land he gave, without a stain, Courage and faith, vain faith, and courage vain."

He shall live with Kossuth, with Oom Paul, with Joubert, with Emmet, with Egmont and Horn, with Nathan Hale, with Warren, with all the great martyrs of history whose blood hath been the seed of the church of liberty.

"He, subtle, strong, and stubborn, gave his life
To a lost cause, and knew the gift was vain.
Later shall rise a people sane and great,
Forged in strong fires, by equal war made one,
Telling old battles over without hate,
Noble, his name shall pass from sire to son."

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

This which I have just read, Mr. Chairman, is a quotation from a speech made on the 17th of April, 1900, in the Senate of the United States by the late lamented Senator George F. Hoar. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MADDEN, Mr. COOPER, and Mr. QUEZON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from the Philippines [Mr. QUEZON].

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Chairman, may I be permitted to refer to the article from the New York Sun that has been cited here, and particularly to comment on the portion which relates to Filipino politicians, who, and who alone, are supposedly to be benefited by Philippine independence?

I suppose that as the word "politician" is used by the newspapers in this country to mean those who are in public office through popular vote, especially when the office they occupy is a membership in some assembly, local or national. I am one of those politicians who are, presumably, to be benefited by Philippine independence. This, I suppose, affords evidence regarding my motive in working so hard for the independence of my people.

Perhaps Filipino politicians are sometimes selfish. I do not know of any politician or group of politicians who have not been sometimes accused of being selfish. But this I can assert, that whether we are selfish or not, neither the editor of the New York Sun nor anyone else in this land can truthfully say that he feels or can feel more interest in the Filipinos than they, in spite of their selfishness, do in themselves. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The Filipino people are our people. They are flesh of our flesh and bone of our bone. How is it possible for any American, even though he be editor of the New York Sun, to say that he or his compatriots can show more interest in the general welfare of our country than we ourselves? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, as I listen to this discussion the thought keeps occurring to me of the astonishing change in the attitude of the House and of the American people generally toward this problem of the Philippines.

Twelve years ago the House debated and passed the bill which became the organic act establishing civil government in the Philippines. At that time, as gentlemen remember, the Philippines constituted the "paramount issue" in this country. Public attention was riveted upon them. One of the great contests was over the question whether the Filipinos should have a legislature and be permitted to elect the lower house. This suggestion for an elective lower house met powerful opposition and was very strongly, bitterly, denounced. But the bill finally became a law, providing, among other things, for a Philippine Legislature and making the lower house—the assembly—elective.

The history of the Philippine Assembly from the day it first met down to this hour proves that all the denunciation, all the prophecies of disaster were utterly groundless. The assembly has been an admirable success. Its services have been of very great value. No person of candor and sound judgment would abolish it now. And, Mr. Chairman, because it has been such a success, I think it may be well to tell what is the truth of history and say that the credit—the honor such as it may be—for the establishment of the Philippine Assembly, belongs only to the House of Representatives. The Senate bill contained no provision for an elective assembly. In so far as I have been able to learn, no Senator ever, on the floor of the Senate, advocated such a proposition. Only the House bill contained a provision for a Philippine Assembly purely elective. When the Senate bill came to the House the Committee on Insular Affairs struck out all after the enacting clause and inserted the entire House bill, containing, among many other provisions, one for an elective assembly. An elective assembly in the Philippines, it was predicted, would surely result in abject failure.

And yet there is now, I think, no gentleman on this floor but that is willing to vote not only for the retention of the elective lower house, but also for the establishment of an upper house of Senators, to be elected by the people of the Philippines.

Surely this is a remarkable change in the attitude of the House and indicates a remarkable change in public opinion.

Mr. Chairman, in view of the number of newspaper articles that gentlemen are having read during the debate to-day I desire to read an excerpt from an editorial which appeared in a newspaper of much prominence and influence only a few days before the opening of the great debate in the House on the Philippine bill 12 years ago:

After long research and exhaustive debate, the Senate has decided that the plan of government best adapted to the end in view should not include a legislature. * * *

* * * * * * * *

It may be questioned if ever the time will come when the islands will find one common legislature a practicable arrangement for lawmaking. * * *

Mr. Chairman, I believe that the writer of that editorial would now admit that the Senate was mistaken, and also that he himself was mistaken in his views as to the possibilities of lawmaking by a legislature in the Philippines. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I have always been in favor of giving the Filipinos the largest possible measure of local self-government. I am in favor of that now, and I believe that this question ought to be approached with seriousness and that every line in the bill should be considered, weighed, and measured, so that when we reach a conclusion we are likely to reach a conclusion that we can stand by.

I am not in favor, however, of declaring in this bill for the independence of the Filipinos. I believe the time has not yet come for that, and no one knows when it will, if ever. But when it comes whoever may be on the stage of action, charged with the responsibility of national legislation, can meet it.

I think that no man ever approached an important question with the seriousness my colleague [Mr. MANN] did when he made what I consider to be one of the most celebrated speeches ever delivered on this floor [applause on the Republican side] in conection with the pending bill. And there has been no answer made by any man here to any suggestion offered by him. Nothing but sneers have been offered in reply to his serious suggestions. It seems to me that this question is of such world-wide importance that we can afford to consider it from the standpoint of its effect on the world's civilization. We have as a Nation a duty to perform. We have a responsibility which can not be set aside lightly. We can not afford to make a declaration of independence in connection with a law for local self-government for the Filipinos when we know that on its face that declaration lies. That is what it does. It is a strong term to use, but it is a truthful statement of a fact. This preamble to the bill is only a subterfuge, and everybody who is responsible for it realizes and understands that. If you are in earnest, why not make the declaration in the body of the bill? In that case not one of you would dare to vote for it; not a man.

You had an opportunity yesterday to vote for something that would free the Philippine Islands—something offered by one of your own Members which would give them a protectorate; something that meant what it said; something that would produce results for the Filipinos.

In the consideration of the bill before us we should deal with the local problems that affect the Filipinos only, and we should be confined to granting them the largest possible measure of local self-government, and await events and see whether events will justify later on independence. No man who lives to-day can say that independence would be beneficial to the Filipinos, and many men of serious thought and great intellect and patriotic motives believe that the granting of independence to the Filipinos would be a step backward in the development of the world's civilization. America did not acquire the Philippine Islands for the purpose of acquiring property. We acquired these islands in the course of a war with Spain, a war for humanity; and I hope that any consideration that we may give to this question now will be so given that every man's opinion will be respected and not sneered at. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Just a moment, please. If my time is up, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have five minutes more. I have not obtruded myself before in the discussion of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman. I would like to ask some one when this debate is to end? Here we have met for two days, and we are still on the first paragraph of the third section. We should have gone forward several days ago.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all pending amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments pending thereto be closed in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. TOWNER. I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. JONES. There will be another paragraph read in a few moments. Would that do just as well?

Mr. TOWNER. I only desire to speak in this connection. I have not taken up any time heretofore. That is all.

Mr. JONES. Then, Mr. Chairman, I make it 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments pending thereto close in 15 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, this bill will not be finished this season if the Chair is going to allow the general debate to continue as it has continued for the past two days. Now, I submit that there ought to be a limit.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that I am not making a general-debate talk. I am talking to the amendment that is pending.

Mr. DONOVAN. I do not blame the gentleman from Illinois, but I do blame the committee for allowing this debate to go on in the style of general debate when the general debate closed two days ago. The bill will not be finished this season at this rate.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have read in my time an editorial published on page 8 of the Washington Times of yesterday.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE PHILIPPINES.

JAMES R MANN, leader of the Republicans in the House, is entitled to more recognition than he has yet received as the real leader of the Republicans in Congress. It would be rather trying, indeed, to find a man whose views come so near to representing the real intellectual leadership of the party in the Nation——

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point that there is no quorum present. If you want to listen to that you have got to have a quorum of Members here.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Fifty Members are present—not a quorum.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my point.

A MEMBER. Too late!

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee acccordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FLOOD of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 18459) to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands, finding itself without a quorum, he caused the roll to be called, whereupon 238 Members, a quorum, answered to their names; and he presented the names of the absentees to be printed in the Journal and RECORD.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The committee will resume its session.

Accordingly the committee resumed its session, with Mr. FLOOD of Virginia in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed to read the article which he had begun to read when the point of no quorum was made.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE PHILIPPINES.

JAMES R. MANN, leader of the Republicans in the House, is entitled to more recognition than he has yet received as the real leader of the Republicans in Congress. It would be rather trying, indeed, to find a man whose views come so near to representing the real intellectual leadership of the party in the Nation. The Senate contains no man who deserves such rank. MANN occupies the rather remarkable position of possessing the confidence of both the conservative and the radical members of his own party as those elements are represented in Congress.

Therefore the Mann speech on the Philippines is to be taken very seriously. In effect, Mr. MANN would keep the Philippines, not turn them loose: he would serve them, not cut them adrift. He would undertake sincerely and earnestly to improve, educate, and win their real friendship and affection. In that way he believes they would be an asset, not a liability, to us in the event of a great future contest in the Pacific, which he regards as altogether possible.

It is not safe to hurry to conclusions in such a matter as this in such a time as the present. The minority of the Insular Affairs Committee in the House made a most sound and convincing report, in which they protested against the discussion of such a measure as the Jones bill at this time, on the ground that it would inevitably call forth expressions about international relations in the Pacific that might be most embarrassing.

But there is more reason even than this for giving attention to the Mann view. Anti-imperialism has cultivated the view that far-distant dependencies are a weakness, not a strength, to the Nation. Surely that will have somewhat to be revised in view of the figure the British Empire is cutting in the world to-day. From Canada, from Australia, from South Africa, from Ceylon, from India, Britain is bringing soldiers to fight for the Empire on the soil of France. India, long regarded by Britain's critics as a conquered territory held under the iron heel of military despotism, turns up a loyal supporter of the Empire. Its native princes and rulers have offered their services, their treasure, their troops, and these have been accepted. Berlin pictured in its mind's eye a revolution in India that would keep Britain preoccupied to the extent of exclusion from the war. Instead India is sending its brown men to fight loyally and well for the Empire of which they seem proud to be citizens.

Even South Africa, so recently conquered that its leaders are largely the very men who fought against England, is taking its place in the line-up of the Empire.

France is drawing levies of magnificent troops from its African provinces; there is every evidence, just as there was in 1870, that the African domain is a strength and support, not a weakness, to the mother country in time of real stress.

Let the Mann view be considered with care and without prejudice or partisanship. Is it not probable that when this war is ended a new conception of imperial relationships, a new understanding of the ties between mother countries and their dependencies, will prevail throughout the world? This is a war for the right of small nations and minor peoples to exist. It is a war for democratization of the world; for popularization of governments in every quarter of the globe; for establishment of a public law in whose eye every people will be guaranteed the rights of existence and liberty and happiness. That public law will not be established and maintained without federation and understanding and cooperation among many peoples and States. Britain's Empire appears to have been builded on the ideal of giving real liberty, substantial independence, and vast material benefits to a great group of communities held together in ties of common sympathy, institutions, sentiment, and interest. Is it to be conceded that the United States shall fail in the effort to win the affection and loyalty of the Filipino people, where Britain has succeeded in winning the Hindus and the Boers?

At least let us wait the outcome of swift moving events of to-day before starting on a program that may appear a few years hence to have been sadly mistaken.

Suppose Britain had surrendered India two generations ago, on the ground that to retain India might involve a war with Russia? Would India or Britain or the world be the better to-day for that act? It will at least be gravely doubted.

We will see a wide unfolding, a tremendous revelation of world tendencies and directions within a very few years, for this war will compel that much. One thing is very certain. The period of colonizing by buccaneers, of colonial government by and for exploiters, is ended. The colonial countries understand that pretty well. There are manifest advantages, especially for the minor countries, in such federal relations as those that hold the British Empire together, or those that bind to us the recently acquired possessions of the United States. Let us not make haste adopting a program that might be gravely regretted in the near future.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Chairman, I heartily concur in the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], who has just addressed the House, that the carefully considered and ably delivered utterance of the leader of the minority [Mr. MANN] should be taken seriously by this side of the House and by the country. I do not concur in his opinion that the leader of the minority has not been taken seriously by this side of the House. The utterance is too far-reaching in its scope, too momentous in its possible results, to be taken merely as the expression of the opinion of a single individual, or to be answered with a sneer. I do not so regard the address of the leader of the minority. It is the inevitable conclusion to which his party must come. It is the corollary of all their doctrines and utterances. It is surprising and commendable in its candor, if not in its wisdom. But this side of the House will never indorse a line of that appalling utterance. We are not prepared to concede that a war of destruction must inevitably follow rivalry in trade. It may be true that at this hour we see millions of men embroiled in a contest that had its incipiency in trade rivalries. But the spectacle of dominions torn and seamed by trenches red with blood and filled with the bodies of hundreds of thousands of mangled men is in itself a sufficient condemnation for all future time of the crime—the foreordained, cold-blooded policy, of deliberately transforming the marts of trade into shambles of slaughter. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It is natural, it is logical, that the gentleman should read editorial after editorial commending Britain's colonial policy, saying, in effect, that it is the policy of the Republican Party to emulate the ugliest and cruelest attribute of a monarchy from which we ourselves wrenched our liberties by the sacrifices of life and treasure.

Sir, the doctrine to which the gentleman now gives unqualified approval is but a paraphrase of the declarations of the Tories, who, a century and a half ago, sent their red battalions here to compel our reluctant love and obedience to a Government that thought our allegiance profitable and our location strategic. Mr. Chairman, I deny that we are prepared to emulate the colonial policy of Great Britain. I deny that we are prepared now to devote our youth to slaughter in foreign lands. The gentleman may read of the Hindu, the South African, and the Egyptian soldier now in the trenches of Belgium and France, may dilate upon the virtues of semisavage mercenaries who make the slaughter of their kind their bloody profession, but the people will not forget the Transvaal, will not forget the Sepoy rebellion, will not forget the day of the East India Co. and of Warren Hastings, will not forget Sedan, will not forget that the price Great Britain pays for the enforced maintenance of her flag around the world is the blood of her best and bravest sons. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Ah, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] says that this ugly, cruel catastrophe, this world-wide war that shall cover all the Pacific, will come as certainly as the rising of the sun.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent for two minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I thought the time was limited.

Mr. STANLEY. I only ask two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The time was limited to 15 minutes.

Mr. GARRETT. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] may have two minutes more, and that the remainder of the time may be used on the other side of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. There will be three minutes remaining.

Mr. STANLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the debate be extended five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and amendments be extended five minutes more.

Mr. MANN. Five minutes more from now?

The CHAIRMAN. After the gentleman from Kentucky has used two minutes there will be eight minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I do not object. It is to our interest to have the gentleman from Kentucky continue.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STANLEY. The gentleman from Illinois imagines that the sky he sees incarnadined with the blood of American citizens is lighted by the rays of a rising sun. It is not the dawn; it is the dying of a day, thank God, forever past. If the gentleman will study the wise policies of that great and patient man who now directs the destinies of Democracy, he will see the dawn of a better day, a time when universal justice and the dissemination of peace instead of war, of liberty and not of tyranny, shall be the noble aim of a great Republic. He will see an attempt to make men love us because we are just as well as strong, not an effort to manacle them to our hearts or to pinion them with a bayonet to a hated standard. He will see that it is wiser and safer to maintain the trade of America and to preserve the life of her citizens by a policy of universal justice, universal kindliness, the dissemination of liberty, not vassalage. This is the dawn, not of trade wars but of tranquillity in trade, the dawn of peaceful, friendly competition between all men and all nations. The time is at hand when—

With man to man united,
And every wrong thing righted,
The whole world shall be lighted
As Eden was of old.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] is entitled to eight minutes.

Mr. TOWNER. Whatever the Chair decides is satisfactory to me.

Mr. JONES. That is entirely in the discretion of the Chair, to recognize the gentleman for eight minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood that to be the suggestion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

Mr. JONES. Fifteen minutes were granted for the Chair to recognize anybody he chose.

Mr. TOWNER. The declaration of the minority in its report was—

> There is a common ground upon which we all can stand. Though we may differ as to whether ultimate independence is best for the islands, we are all agreed that it is not best for them now.

Is there anyone on the other side of the aisle who will take exception to that statement? Is there anyone here who proposes now to grant independence to the Filipinos? Certainly not in view of this bill, which we hear, presumably with authority, has the approval of the President of the United States, who, we are told, has the Democratic Party within the grasp of his strong hand, as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] said a moment ago. The minority went further with the declaration and said:

> However we may differ as to whether the people of the Philippines are capable of entire self-government, we can all agree that they should have the largest measure of self-government of which they are capable. Upon that common ground we should have considered the bill to give to the Filipino people such changes in their fundamental law as should be made in their interest.

The course of the debate on this bill has but emphasized the truth of that statement. We should have considered the bill upon its merits, without the reiteration in the form of a preamble of the Baltimore platform, without this injection of politics all the way through, without the declaration again and again that you stand for this and we stand for that. There is as much difference of opinion on that side of the House as to what should be done regarding the Philippines as there is on this side of the House. There is no one qualified to speak for you, and there is no one qualified to speak for us.

Gentlemen differ with regard to the matter; each has his individual opinion. But there is this common ground upon which we can stand. We all agree that we should give them the largest measure of self-government of which they are capable now and at all times. A larger measure of self-government should be given to them now by this bill than they possessed under the old law. I presume in the future we ought and will give them still larger measures of self-government.

Mr. Chairman, I can see, without, I think, indulging an unreasonable expectation, that the time will come when the Filipinos will be a great self-governing Commonwealth—may I say, like Canada or Australia. To-day, if Canada should ask for its independence she could have it. Why does it not do so? Simply because it feels that its association with another country is a benefit to it, and it does not desire a separation, although it has practical autonomy in its own government.

To-day Australia occupies the same position. It is a great self-governing Commonwealth, with a constitution, which it formulated very much after our own Constitution, of a federal government with national powers and preserving every Province as we preserve the States.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. I can not yield now. Their Commonwealth constitution was formulated by the people of Australia and sanctioned by the people of Great Britain. They had only to make the declaration of their independence, and Great Britain would not have protested against it. She would, of course, object to the action, but it is the statement of all that on the day this great self-governing Commonwealth desires to cut off and separate from the mother country they shall do so. But they do not desire to do it, because they find it to their benefit not to. Are gentlemen prepared to say that the time will come in the future when the Philippines, a great self-governing Commonwealth, shall determine that it will be better for them to cast off their connection with the United States than to remain as they are? Yet, if they shall so declare, when that day comes I will not protest against it, and there will be little, if any, opposition, in my judgment, because there are not many who would force the continuance of an undesired connection with a people capable of self-government, qualified for independence, and able to maintain it. But that time has not arrived. Let us leave the problems of the future to the future and not be speculating on what we propose to do.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

That in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to be heard by himself and counsel, to demand the nature and cause of the accusation against him, to have a speedy and public trial, to meet the witnesses face to face, and to have compulsory process to compel the attendance of witnesses in his behalf.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, after line 19, add a new paragraph, as follows:
"The right of trial by jury shall be and remain inviolate, and a jury for the trial of civil and criminal cases in courts of record shall consist of 12 men, but in courts not of record a jury may consist of 6 men."

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, I can not understand why gentlemen of the committee should oppose this amendment. Some 10 or 12 years ago I remember of reading a discussion that went on in Congress over the question of whether the Constitution followed the flag when there was a military occupation of the Philippine Islands. The very question was raised before any kind of local self-government was granted. I do not think it lies in the mouths of Democrats to reverse that position. Doubtless many Members of the House have never experienced that which I have—where the people had no government except a court government.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY. If I can have more time.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that this bill does not cut off the trial by jury. It is within the power of the Filipino government herein organized, if it thinks it wise, to have a trial by jury and institute it.

Mr. MURRAY. Yes; it is within the power of the Philippine Government to do all things not prohibited by the organic act, but if it is necessary to provide in this bill for provisions of this character—that life, liberty, and property shall not be taken without due process of law; that no person shall be charged with a criminal offense nor be tried without being confronted by the witnesses against him; that he shall not twice be put in jeopardy; that he shall be bailable; that there shall be no law impairing the obligation of contracts; that no person shall be imprisoned for debt—that the writ of habeas corpus shall never be suspended; that no ex post facto law shall ever be passed—if it be necessary to provide for those safeguards by putting them into the organic law, certainly the most fundamental one of trial by jury should be placed there with them.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question? I will state that I am with him on his proposition.

Mr. MURRAY. I will yield in a moment. I lived in the Indian country with three-quarters of a million people, when we had no Representative in the legislative or executive branches of the Government. The only representation the people had was in the courts, through their jury, and for the first time I realized the philosophy of Jefferson, who said that as between the right to be represented in the courts or in the legislative branch, the people would better far have some one else make the law and have their representation in the courts. It would have been intolerable to have lived in that Indian country but for that fact. Men may answer that jurors make mistakes, and I can repeat that oft-repeated expression that no man can tell what the jury will do or whom a woman will marry, but I have never yet seen the time when I would abolish either marriage or the jury system.

The most fundamental right that any people can have is a trial by their peers. It may be argued by the committee that it would be unwise to place this language in the bill because everyone in the Philippines is unfitted for jury service, but the legislative body of the Philippines can limit the qualifications of a juror under this bill to those who have the ballot, or to any other class. It has been stated to me that the real objection to this is that those cases now pending in the courts of the Philippine Islands, if tried before they learn that this is the law, after the adoption of it would result in a mistrial, but that is no argument against the right of a people to trial by jury.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURRAY. That may be obviated by putting a provision in this very section, if the gentlemen are afraid of that, providing that this shall not apply to any case now pending in the courts of the Philippine Islands. But certainly, in view of the necessity for reciting some 12 or 13 sections that ordinarily go into a bill of rights in ordinary constitutional governments, I think that we ought to also place in the bill the most fundamental one; and the fact that any person in the Philippine Islands is unwilling to guarantee this right should be regarded with suspicion as to the motives behind the proposition.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY. Yes.

Mr. HELM. The gentleman is aware of the fact that there are, in round numbers, about a million Moros who are non-Christian?

Mr. MURRAY. There are more non-Christians than Christians, as I understand it.

Mr. HELM. And this bill provides that their representative in the legislative branch of the Government shall be appointed. They are now governed by a bureau. How would the gentleman select a jury in Mindanao—who would compose a jury of the people who neither vote nor have representation in the legislature?

Mr. MURRAY. I would leave the Philippine Legislature to determine the qualifications for jurors according to the conditions that exist in those islands, and I would certainly guarantee to every Filipino, whether Christian or non-Christian, this right of trial by jury.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has again expired.

Mr. JONES rose.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, could we not reach some agreement as to the length of debate upon this matter?

Mr. JONES. What would the gentleman suggest—20 minutes?

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, let us make it 4 o'clock and then quit.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think 20 minutes is too much.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of 20 minutes all debate on the paragraph and all amendments thereto shall be concluded.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, how many gentlemen on that side desire to speak?

Mr. BARTLETT. I desire to speak.

Mr. MILLER. There are at least three on this side who desire to speak, and I think there are four. Could we not proceed for a few minutes, first, without making any arrangement?

Mr. MANN. I suggest that the gentleman from Virginia make it 25 minutes.

Mr. JONES. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto conclude in 25 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, there are many good reasons why we should not impose a jury system upon the Filipinos. Many of them are quite obvious. One is that just suggested by my colleague, Mr. HELM. There are some six or seven hundred thousand non-Christianized and noncivilized people in the Philippine Islands; as, for instance, the Moros in the southern and the Negritos and Igorrotes in the northern part of the archipelago. It would be most irrational to undertake to force jury trials in those communities. The gentleman from Oklahoma has anticipated another objection which I have to his amendment, one which he must regard as serious. There is no jury system in the Philippines now, and therefore there is no legal machinery in existence through the means of which jury trials can now be had. This being true, much confusion, if not positive harm, may follow the fastening by Congress of such a system upon the Filipinos. Between the time of the passage of this bill, if it is passed, and the passage of the legislation necessary to carry into effect the constitutional requirement of jury trials many criminal cases will have been disposed of. In such cases, where convictions have been had, it will, of course, be objected that the convicted persons have been deprived of the jury trials guaranteed them by the Congress of the United States, and the objections will be well founded. Such convictions would unquestionably be illegal.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. So, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this ought not to be incorporated in the bill. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CARTER. I want to ask the gentleman from Virginia if they have, under the present system there, a trial by jury?

Mr. JONES. Under the present system they have no trial by jury, and I will say, further, that there is a most excellent judicial system in the islands. I think that justice is fairly administered in the Philippines at this time. I may add that under the existing organic law the Philippine Legislature is empowered to adopt a jury system. It seems, therefore, that there is no demand on the part of the Filipinos for jury trials. There has been none on the part of the Filipino bar, and the committee wisely, I think, determined to leave this subject in the hands of the Philippine Legislature, where it now resides.

Mr. CARTER. Do I understand the gentleman to say they have not a jury trial even in criminal cases?

Mr. JONES. That is my statement.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. FESS. If the bill of rights is adopted as we have written it, there is no objection to their having a jury trial; it does not forbid it.

Mr. JONES. Certainly not; and I have tried to make that plain. It does not forbid it, as the gentleman from Ohio says. The legislature provided for here is elective in both of its branches, and it can have a jury system if it desires to do so, since there is nothing in the bill of rights to prohibit it. Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to add that when the first draft of this bill was prepared it contained a provision for jury trials. I submitted it to a number of gentlemen who are wiser than myself, and in whose judgment I have great confidence, and after listening to the objections urged to it by them I concluded that the wise thing was to leave it out. So when I introduced the bill in the House I omitted the jury-trial provision which I had at first incorporated in the bill. I do not believe it would be wise to put it in the bill of rights now, and I hope the House will agree with me.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I hope I may be able for a minute or two to voice my approval of the principle involved in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY]. We are undertaking to consider a constitution for the people in the Philippine Islands and to declare that when they have made themselves capable of self-government we will give them their independence. We are an English-speaking people. We derived our system of jurisprudence from that of the mother country, and no principle ever crossed the waters with our forefathers that was dearer and deeper embedded in the fundamental law of this land or dearer to the fathers who fought the Revolution and who formulated and created our Constitution than the principle of the right of trial by jury. [Applause.] And we will not do our duty to these people, whom we propose to educate and make good citizens and give them a free government, if possible, if we withhold this right from them; yea, if we do not require those to whom we shall delegate the power to enact their laws to embed into their laws this best, greatest, and most precious principle of the English-speaking race. Mr. Chairman, the only part of this great Constitution of ours which has in it that right, written by the men who created it, has always been printed not only in italics but in capital letters, so that those who read it may know and understand that of all the provisions of the Constitution that one which provides for the right of trial by jury was regarded by them and has been the greatest right of American citizens. If you will examine the sixth amendment of the Constitution you will find of all the sections and amendments written that that alone is italicized, emphasized, and written in capital letters, so that posterity may have emphasized to it that that of all was the greatest right of the American citizen. It is as follows:

IN ALL CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS THE ACCUSED SHALL ENJOY THE RIGHT TO A SPEEDY AND PUBLIC TRIAL BY AN IMPARTIAL JURY OF THE STATE AND DISTRICT WHEREIN THE CRIME SHALL HAVE BEEN COMMITTED, WHICH DISTRICT SHALL HAVE BEEN PREVIOUSLY ASCERTAINED BY LAW, AND TO BE INFORMED OF THE NATURE OR CAUSE OF THE ACCUSATION; TO BE CONFRONTED WITH THE WITNESSES AGAINST HIM; TO HAVE COMPULSORY PROCESS FOR OBTAINING WITNESSES IN HIS FAVOR; AND TO HAVE THE ASSISTANCE OF COUNSEL FOR HIS DEFENSE.

Now, I had an amendment which I wished to propose to this bill—in line 17, after the words "public trial," to insert the words "in criminal cases or by an impartial jury to be selected from the district wherein the offense was committed," in the language of the Constitution. We say these people shall have a constitution such as we write for them in this bill containing many of the provisions in our own Constitution and of the State constitutions. We even say that a bill shall not be passed which does not contain in its title the purpose of the bill or subjects matter in it different from the title. We undertake to guard these people from the errors or crimes of the legislatures that they may elect, and yet we withhold from them this greatest blessing that our people ever enjoyed and which we have maintained here by the blood and virtue of our people.

Mr. JONES. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BARTLETT. Certainly.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman uses the word "withhold." The gentleman means we do not impose it. We do not withhold it.

Mr. BARTLETT. I meant it in that sense; I did not mean that you prevented it. You do not enjoin it upon the legislative body. Mr. Chairman, one word. When the Philippine administration bill was first considered by the House, to govern these islands, it was upon my motion and my amendment which embodied in it that they should have an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States on all questions involving the construction of the Constitution of the United States. That provision put in that bill enabled two American citizens who were convicted in one of the Philippine courts of first instance by Filipino judges to secure their freedom from 40 years' imprisonment imposed upon them by Filipino judges in a trial for a criminal offense which the Supreme Court of the United States decided they had no jurisdiction over.

I have not had experience myself, but I have a constituent who has suffered by a trial in a Filipino court for crime and tried by judges; and the man was convicted in that court and sentenced to 40 years' imprisonment for a crime over which that court had no jurisdiction, as decided upon appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. That right was secured him by the amendment which I offered and had placed in that bill. I am not willing that the rights shall be left to the Filipino Legislature to say whether these people shall be tried for crime except as we try people here; that is, the right of trial by jury selected from the vicinity where the crime was committed. I do not care so much about the right of trial by jury in civil cases, but I am unwilling to send to those people across the Pacific a constitution made by the American Congress which refuses to say that wherever you try a man under the American Constitution or American law he shall have the right to have it decided by a jury whether or not he has violated the laws of his country. I will not vote for a proposition that does not give him that great privilege, a right so dear to every American and to every English-speaking man. [Applause.]

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I think this amendment ought to be determined not by a consideration of theoretical principles of liberty peculiar to the Anglo-Saxon race, but by considering actual conditions in the Philippine Islands, where the bill is to be operative. There are a thousand reasons, Mr. Chairman, why this particular amendment should not be incorporated in the bill. In the first place, it is not necessary, because, as has already been stated by the chairman of the Insular Affairs Committee and by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM], if the Filipino people desire trial by jury they can, immediately after the enactment of this bill into law, provide for that institution by legislative enactment. The truth is, Mr. Chairman, that the Filipino people do not now want trial by jury, and if you require it you impose upon them an institution which they have sense enough to know they are not now qualified successfully to handle. I have no doubt in my mind at all——

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman allow me? I intended to offer this amendment at the time I had the floor.

Mr. MILLER. I will yield for that purpose, if it is not taken out of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will send his amendment up.

Mr. BARTLETT. To consider it as pending.

Mr. MILLER. I have no doubt, Mr. Chairman, in the least that if this amendment were submitted to all the Filipino judges in the Philippine Islands practically a unanimous vote would be against putting it in the bill.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. GORDON. The judges would not have it here if they had their way, would they?

Mr. MILLER. I do not agree with the gentleman at all. If you would submit the question to the judges of America, 100 per cent would say to retain the trial by jury. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would not feel disposed on any occasion, much less on this, to enter into a discussion of the reasons why this would work havoc in the administration of justice in the Islands. I will say this, however—and I am sure it is the opinion of the Filipino judges themselves—that if it be required now that criminal cases be decided by a jury, there will be an almost complete absence of conviction; that the criminal laws of the country can be violated with impunity; that if it be required that civil action be submitted to a jury, justice will rarely prevail. And that is not an indictment at all against the intelligence or general honesty of the Filipino people. It is because the people have never been trained as yet in this great and important institution.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is one thing further, and if you will pardon me going to the map once more I will invite your attention to it, and it is to my mind paramount to anything that has already been suggested. There are 1,200,000 non-Christian, uncivilized people in the islands. The Christian people do not want this institution, because they know they can not successfully carry it out now.

But, even if they could, what on earth would become of the administration of justice in one-half of the entire area of the islands, because one-half of the area is now entirely in the possession of the non-Christian, wild tribes? The whole northern third of Luzon contains 400,000 wild people, and it would be absolutely impossible to secure a jury capable of trying a case in any sense, big or little, from out the entire 400,000 of people. Likewise in the entire region to the south, where the Moros live, it would be impossible to secure a trial by jury.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. MILLER. I will.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman, who has been to the Philippine Islands, inform the House of his knowledge as to capacity and honesty of the judges who preside?

Mr. MILLER. The judges there now?

Mr. HELM. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. I will say, after making as full an investigation as I could in going through the islands, I was tremendously pleased, both with the Filipino judges and the American judges, and I think the administration of justice in the islands to-day is splendid. Of course, there are some exceptions; but, generally speaking, the judiciary is a first-class working institution. The reports that I gather from Filipino judges and Filipino business men, as well as from Americans, is that the Filipino judges, after they had once grasped the idea of our institutions and the administration of justice, have made wonderful progress. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I am perfectly well aware of the affection which those of Anglo-Saxon descent entertain for the jury system. I am of that descent and I share in that affection. I realize, therefore, the embarrassment that it may occasion Members to oppose the placing into what is proposed as an organic law of a section which shall enforce jury trial. But, nevertheless, we must deal with this upon a practical and intelligent basis. The development of the jury system, as we understand it, has been purely a development of and by the Anglo-Saxon or Teutonic people. In the Philippine Islands, throughout all the long years of their existence, there has been no jury system under the Spanish régime, under the present régime, under no régime, nor has there been any request by the Filipino people, so far as we have been advised, at any time for the institution of such a system.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I interrupt the gentleman just a moment to ask him a question?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman has seen fit to put in the bill, very properly, that no law shall be enacted in said islands which will deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law or deny anyone equal protection of the law. Now, can the gentleman state whether or not, under our conception of law in this country and the institutions under which we live, any trial can be had with due process of law in a criminal case where a man is not tried by a jury?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think so; but to answer that fully, or to undertake to answer it fully, would carry us into the old discussion of whether our Constitution applies to colonial possessions.

Mr. BARTLETT. You and I think it ought to.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman and I will not have any disagreement about that, and yet we take the law, as we must take it, from the courts. But I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Georgia and other gentleman of the House to this proposition: We are not, in this bill, denying to that people the right of trial by jury. One of the things, Mr. Chairman, that has made me desirous, and that now makes me desirous, of severing connection with that people is that that race is not our race; its spirit is not our spirit; its blood is not our blood.

And I do not wish to undertake to force on that government or on those people against their will an institution which is purely a development of our own race and to which they are wholly unaccustomed. But if they desire it, I would leave them free to have it. In the making up of this bill no matter was more seriously considered by the committee than this question of jury trial. We, all springing from the Anglo-Saxon race, entertain the same sentiments with regard to the jury system; but in the light of the conditions existing in the Philippine Islands we in committee, I think I may say with practical unanimity, came to the conclusion that it was not wise to ingraft upon the judicial system of that people an institution which is purely a development of our race, and to which that race has never been accustomed.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Certainly; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. Did the committee conclude that a man would be less likely to get a fair trial before a jury of his peers than before a fair judge?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Oh, no; I would not say that the committee reached that conclusion at all. That is not the theory upon which the committee acted. It acted upon the theory that that people have never been accustomed to the jury system, that from experience they know nothing about trial by jury.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, if any gentleman on that side desires to speak, I shall not ask for any more time.

Mr. FESS. I have yielded to the gentleman from the Philippine Islands [Mr. QUEZON].

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask that I may offer a substitute for that amendment.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, may we have read the amendment that I sent up?

Mr. MURRAY. Let them both be read.

Mr. MILLER. Let it be read and considered as pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 17, after the word "trial," insert the words "by an impartial jury selected from the district wherein the offense was committed."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] be permitted to proceed for two minutes longer.

Mr. MILLER. Let the Clerk read the other amendment. The Clerk has just read the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute offered by Mr. MURRAY: Page 3, line 19, add the following as a new paragraph:

"The right of trial by jury shall be and remain inviolate in the trial of criminal cases, and in the courts of record the jury shall consist of 12 men, but in courts not of record a jury may consist of 6 men."

The CHAIRMAN. What was the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. JONES. That the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] may be permitted to proceed for two minutes. Of course, it will come out of the 25 minutes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I thank the gentleman for his courtesy, but I will ask him to withdraw his request.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman requires more time, I will yield to him.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I thank the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. JONES. I withdraw that request, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time agreed upon for debate upon this paragraph be extended for an additional 10 minutes in order that 5 minutes may be assigned to the Commissioner of the Philippine Islands [Mr. QUEZON] and the other 5 minutes be divided equally between the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] and myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] asks unanimous consent that the debate on this paragraph——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, how much time is remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Five minutes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, so far as I am concerned, thanking the gentleman from Minnesota for his courtesy, I do not ask for any further time.

Mr. MILLER. Then I will modify my request, Mr. Chairman, and ask that the time be extended five minutes, the extra five minutes to be given to the Commissioner of the Philippine Islands.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the debate on this paragraph be extended five minutes, to be given to the gentleman from the Philippine Islands.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman from Virginia how long we shall stay here this evening?

Mr. JONES. I hope we shall not stay longer than 5 o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make only one or two observations. I am, of course, in entire sympathy with the idea advanced by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY] and so earnestly advocated by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

That, however, has not anything to do, as it seems to me, with the question before us to-day. There is no declaration here against a jury trial. We are only now leaving to the Filipino people, to the legislature there, the determination of when and to what extent they will apply the jury system to their own people. That is the wise thing to do. If in some parts of their territory it may be applied safely, doubtless they will apply it. We know that in some parts of the territory it would be absolutely unsafe to apply it.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman think we would have jury trials all over the United States now if the Constitution did not provide for it?

Mr. TOWNER. Unquestionably; I think we would.

Mr. MADDEN. I doubt it.

Mr. TOWNER. I am quite sure we would.

Now, in the northern part of Luzon, over an area covering almost one-half of that great island, it would be a laughable thing to talk about giving them trial by jury. In almost the entire island of Mindanao it would be utterly impossible at this time. But whenever it is practicable, whenever the people of the Philippines determine for themselves that a jury trial shall be given to their people, the legislature will have that power. To vote down this amendment is not a determination by this body against a jury trial. It is doing what we ought to do—allowing them to decide when, and under what conditions, and to what territory, and to what people the right of trial by jury ought to be given.

Now, if I can, Mr. Chairman, I will yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from the Philippine Islands is recognized.

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Chairman, I am not prepared to admit that the Filipino people do not want the jury system established in the islands, as the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] puts it. Unless my memory fails me, there have been introduced in the Philippine Assembly, from time to time, resolutions instructing the Resident Commissioners to petition the Congress of the United States for a grant of authority to the Philippine Legislature to provide by law for the establishment of the jury system of trial. Therefore, if the assembly fairly represents the Filipino people, as we should assume, since it is an elective body, the Filipinos are in favor of the trial by jury. Personally, I also believe in this principle. It is to be noted, however, that the Philippine Assembly has never requested the Congress of the United States to include among the constitutional rights of all the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands the right to be tried by jury. The reason for this is obvious. There are some regions in the Philippines where it is absolutely impossible to establish the trial by jury, unless it is desired to let crime go unpunished. So, in order to properly serve the interests of justice, the Philippine Assembly deemed it necessary that the authority to grant this right be conferred upon the Philippine Legislature, which is acquainted with the conditions in the islands, instead of being directly exercised by the Congress itself. The situation is this: Some of the non-Christian inhabitants of the Philippines are still in a very primitive condition, while others, like the Moros, though not altogether uncivilized, entertain ideas of right and wrong not exactly in harmony with those upon which our criminal and civil codes are based. There are altogether about half a million of these people, among whom the jury system would be a complete and absolute failure. The former, of course, do not have the same conception of justice that we have. The latter—that is to say, the Moros—have an idea of criminal action not always in conformity with the provisions of the criminal law. A Moro, for instance, at times does not believe that to kill a Christian, be he American or Filipino, is a crime. He may even hold it to be a virtue. Can anyone, then, expect that if a Moro were to kill a Christian, no matter what might be the race of the latter, he would be found guilty by his fellow Moros?

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUEZON. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Have they civil government down in the sland of Mindanao?

Mr. QUEZON. Yes; to a certain extent. The governor is a civilian, but he is not elected, and his powers are rather unusual for a civil governor; in other words, the government in Mindanao is not similar to the government established in the other Provinces.

Mr. GORDON. Exactly. We do not have jury trials in this country unless we have a government established.

Mr. QUEZON. But there is a civil government established in Mindanao, or the Moro Province, as it is called. It is not a military government, and surely it is not under martial law. There is a court there exactly identical, both as regards the jurisdiction of the judge, the laws he administers, and the procedure under which trials are conducted, with the courts in the city of Manila. Such being the case, if this proposed amendment is adopted the jury trial will be applied inviolate in the Moro Province just as much as in the city of Manila.

Mr. GORDON. Oh, no; you are mistaken about that.

Mr. QUEZON. Then I do not understand the language of the amendment.

Mr. MILLER. The gentleman from the Philippines is quite correct.

Mr. GORDON. The gentleman from the Philippines is entirely mistaken about that.

Mr. QUEZON. Why am I mistaken?

Mr. GORDON. Because the institution of the jury trial under our Constitution only extends as far as the Government extends. Do we have it among the American Indians? Surely not.

Mr. MILLER. I beg to assure the gentleman from Ohio that the United States Constitution and the United States Government extend over every foot of the territory in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. BARTLETT. Does the gentleman say that the Constitution extends there?

Mr. MILLER. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. I am glad to hear it.

Mr. GORDON. You gentlemen claimed that it did not extend there at all. I think the gentleman from Minnesota is mistaken in his statement.

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Chairman, the controversy between the gentleman from Minnesota and the gentleman from Ohio, as to whether or not the jury system shall be established in Mindanao if this amendment is adopted, shows that we shall have to face in the Philippines a great many new and serious questions, both legal and constitutional in nature, if this amendment is put into the bill, since these two learned lawyers, who are called upon to vote on the amendment, take entirely opposite views. My impression, however, is to the effect that the gentleman from Ohio is mistaken. At all events, I am positive that if this amendment is adopted there will be created almost a chaotic condition in the administration of justice in the islands. I repeat it: In those places wholly inhabited by uncivilized peoples no jurors could be had.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUEZON. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. If this enabling act is passed, requiring trial by jury, the legislature will still have the power to fix the qualifications of jurors?

Mr. QUEZON. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Why can they not fix varying qualifications, according to varying conditions?

Mr. QUEZON. They certainly can; but in these places I am referring to it will be impossible to find enough persons with any qualification to act as jurors.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman what sort of courts they have there in the part of the Philippine Islands to which he refers?

Mr. QUEZON. The same kind of court as in other parts of the archipelago.

Mr. BARTLETT. You have some sort of a judicial system down there, then?

Mr. QUEZON. We have a complete judicial system in every part of the archipelago, but the judge acts both as a judge of fact and as a judge of law.

But leaving aside the question of whether or not there are to be found competent jurors among the uncivilized or semi-civilized Filipinos, do the gentlemen of the committee realize that this bill goes into effect immediately upon its passage, and therefore, from that instant, every man accused of a crime in the Philippines has the constitutional right of being tried by jury?

Suppose this bill should be passed. All those who at the time are accused of some crime will at once have the constitutional right to be tried by jury and the further constitutional right to a speedy trial. There being no law in the Philippines providing for the qualifications and selection of jurors, a law to this effect shall have to be enacted by the legislature. If the legislature is not in session, as very likely it will not be when this bill becomes law, or even if it is in session, some time must elapse before the necessary legislation can be provided for and put in operation. In this case the courts will either have to try the defendants without jury or postpone the trial for a long period. In either case a constitutional right of the accused would have to be violated, and the court will have no other alternative than to let the crime go unpunished.

As I said in the beginning of my remarks, I am in favor in principle of the jury trial, and so is the Philippine Assembly, but in order to avoid giving a serious shock to the administration of justice the proper course is to let the Philippine Legislature enact such law as is needed to establish the jury system, bearing in mind the conditions of the country as they are. Everybody here agrees that the bill permits the legislature to enact such law, so I think it is wiser not to adopt this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. QUEZON. I have no doubt that the Philippine Legislature will enact the proper law on this subject.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I find that I inadvertently said that the United States Constitution extended to the Philippine Islands. Of course I meant no such thing as that. I meant that the American Government extends all over the Philippine Islands, and civil government extends practically throughout the Philippine Islands.

Mr. BARTLETT. I think the gentleman was right in his original statement.

Mr. MILLER. But when my time expired I had started out to say that there is a large area in the Philippine Islands where jury trials would be absolutely impossible. I called attention to the 400,000 people in northern Luzon. I mentioned the half million or more people in the great island of Mindanao, which comprises more than a quarter of the entire territory of the archipelago; also the entire Sulu group. I should have to add to that also the entire island of Palawan, and north of that the group that you see on the map. I should have to add to it nearly all of the large island of Mindoro, excepting only a few spots on the circumference next the sea. In addition to that there are many areas right in the so-called civilized countries that are entirely inhabited by wild people. For instance, there are the Ilongots in the Provinces of Isabela and Nueva Ecija, 120 or 125 miles northwest of Manila. Then there is the large body of Negritos, who are scattered in areas that you may call reservations for them, all over the islands. Some are in Zambales, almost directly across the bay from Manila. Then I should have to include many other wild tribes scattered through the islands, even in considerable areas in Samar and Panay. When you add all these together you have more than one-half of the entire archipelago whose people would not be able to carry on jury trials at all. So I sincerely trust that it will not be the wisdom of the committee to adopt this amendment.

Mr. QUEZON. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. MURRAY. I withdraw the first amendment and offer a second one.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, nobody knows what that amendment is.

Mr. BARTLETT. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARTLETT. I have an amendment pending to the seventeenth line. Would not that be in order before the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma, which comes lower down?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT], which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 17, after the word "trial," insert the words "by an impartial jury to be selected from the district wherein the offense was committed."

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point that no quorum is present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that no quorum is present.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, it is going to take so much time to call the roll that I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FLOOD of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 18459, the Philippine bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted, as follows:

To Mr. NORTON, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. LANGLEY, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. BRITTEN, indefinitely, on account of illness.

To Mr. STEPHENS of California, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

RESIGNATION OF A MEMBER.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 3, 1914.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

SIR: I beg leave to inform you that I have this day transmitted to the governor of New Jersey my resignation as a Representative in the Congress of the United States for the ninth district of New Jersey.

Respectfully, yours,

WALTER I. MCCOY.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I suppose the resignation will be placed on file and also go in the RECORD. I would like permission to say that I again congratulate the President upon the appointment he has made out of the body of this House. Mr. McCOY as a Member of this House not only made friends among the entire membership of the House, but by his ability showed, in my opinion, that he was one of the best lawyers in the country. [Applause.]

COTTON.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may address the House for 40 minutes on Tuesday morning immediately after the reading of the Journal. I did want to ask unanimous consent to address the House on Monday, but I understand that is unanimous-consent day, and I do not want to interfere with that. I want to address the House for 40 minutes on the distressed condition of the cotton industry of the South.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that on Tuesday next, immediately after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table necessary to be disposed of, he shall be permitted to address the House for 40 minutes on the cotton situation. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to say that I understand there are other gentlemen who will follow my friend from Alabama with similar requests. I do not object to granting him the 40 minutes, but I do not wish this permission given the gentleman from Alabama without my giving notice that I shall feel constrained to object to any similar request coming from any other gentleman. I understand the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] will prefer a similar request.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that if my friend from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] can get 40 minutes to discuss the cotton situation, and he can do it fairly and intelligently, then I shall not make any request.

Mr. GARNER. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that if the gentleman from Alabama gets unanimous consent to address the House for 40 minutes, I shall ask a similar permission for my colleague from Texas, Mr. HARDY.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make this statement: I shall not object, with the understanding that I shall object to any similar consent being given to anyone else. I want to give notice to all that I shall do so.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] that his colleague, Mr. BURGESS, has addressed the House on this subject, and Mr. SLAYDEN, another colleague of his from Texas, has spoken here on the same subject, and I trust that the gentleman will not deny me the opportunity that I and other Members have granted to two Texans already. The gentleman from Virginia is anxious to get along with his bill, and he has just stated that he would not object to the request that I be permitted to speak on the cotton situation next Tuesday; and I appeal to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] not to couple his request with mine. If he does, he will be the direct means of keeping those of us who are trying to secure relief to the cotton growers from discussing conditions in the South and appealing to Congress at this time for aid.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I ask in that connection unanimous consent that my colleague, Judge HARDY, may have 30 minutes in which to address the House on the same subject.

Mr. BARTLETT. At the same time?

Mr. GARNER. At the same time, following the gentleman from Alabama; and I want to state that there is not a man in Congress who represents a greater cotton district in the United States than Judge HARDY. His people are intensely interested in this subject, and he desires to address the House in the interest of the farmer. I do not suppose anyone will object to his addressing the House for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that on next Tuesday, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table, he be permitted to address the House for 40 minutes on the subject of the cotton situation, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] couples with that the request for unanimous consent on behalf of his colleague, Judge HARDY, that he may follow the gentleman from Alabama and address the House for 30 minutes on the same subject. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would suggest to the gentleman from Alabama——

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I am going to ask for the regular order. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is, Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama, coupled with the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, owing to the gross discourtesy of the gentleman from Connecticut, I object.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 11745. An act to provide for certificate of title to homestead entry by a female American citizen who has intermarried with an alien.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, October 5, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on preliminary examination and survey of Corte Madera Channel, Cal. (H. Doc. No. 1171), was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 17343) for the relief of Charles L. Pritchard, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1177), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

By Mr. PADGETT: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 364) to authorize the President to grant leave of absence to two commissioned officers of the line of the Navy for the purpose of accepting an appointment under the Government of Brazil as instructors in naval strategy and tactics in the naval war college of Brazil; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey: Resolution (H. Res. 634) directing the Secretary of the Treasury to advise the House of Representatives what is necessary to be contained in letters to the collector of the port of New York in order to secure a reply thereto; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ASHBROOK: A bill (H. R. 19098) granting a pension to Anna R. Wright; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BROWN of West Virginia: A bill (H. R. 19099) granting an increase of pension to John W. Britton; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CAMPBELL: A bill (H. R. 19100) granting an increase of pension to Cyrus D. Christy; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DOOLITTLE: A bill (H. R. 19101) granting a pension to Columbia Nichols; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. GOEKE: A bill (H. R. 19102) granting an increase of pension to Allen Jemison; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. KIESS of Pennsylvania: A bill (H. R. 19103) granting a pension to George Lee; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 19104) granting an increase of pension to L. Wesley Doyle; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 19105) granting an increase of pension to Isaac F. Wheeland; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. LEE of Pennsylvania: A bill (H. R. 19106) granting a pension to Jonathan Witman; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. TAGGART: A bill (H. R. 19107) granting a pension to Mary Lake; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 19108) granting a pension to Rebecca R. Jones; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 19109) granting a pension to George M. Younger; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 19110) granting an increase of pension to Burditt A. Clifton; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 19111) granting an increase of pension to James R. Johnson; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 19112) for the relief of Abram Rennick; to the Committee on War Claims.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. AIKEN: Petition of P. P. Sullivan and others, of Westminster, S. C., favoring passage of House bill 5308, relative to taxing mail-order houses; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. BAILEY: Petition of Joseph Weckerle, of Pittsburgh, Pa., protesting against revenue tax on cigars; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of M. Nathan & Bro., of Johnstown, Pa., and the Home Electric Light & Steam Heating Co., of Tyrone, Pa., protesting against legislation preventing the purchasing of stamped envelopes from the Government; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. FITZHENRY: Papers to accompany a bill for relief of Joseph M. Howe; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. LANGHAM: Petition of sundry citizens of Skagway, Alaska, favoring House bill 15435, for prohibition in Alaska; to the Committee on the Territories.

By Mr. LONERGAN: Petition of Herman Olsen and 24 other citizens of Skagway, Alaska, favoring prohibition of the sale of intoxicating liquors in the Territory of Alaska; to the Committee on the Territories.

Also, protest of the Locomobile Co., of Bridgeport, Conn., on tax of 25 cents per horsepower for owner and $1 for manufacturer of automobiles; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. J. I. NOLAN: Communication from Local No. 68, International Association of Machinists, of San Francisco, Cal., favoring passage of House bill 17800, to abolish "Taylor system" of shop management; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. O'HAIR: Petition of sundry citizens of Waldron, Ill., favoring national prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

Also, petition of various business men of Sidell, Georgetown, Indianola, Paris, Catlin, Fairmount, Fithian, Metcalf, Hume, and Westville, all in the State of Illinois, favoring House bill 5308, to tax mail-order houses; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. O'SHAUNESSY: Petition of William M. Harris, jr., of Providence, R. I., protesting against an increase in the price of stamped envelopes; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. RAKER: Memorial of Roslynn Parlor, No. 131, Native Daughters of the Golden West, and Local Alameda County (Cal.) Socialist Party, favoring the Hamill bill (H. R. 5139); to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

By Mr. SELDOMRIDGE: Petition of Silverton Commercial Club, favoring certain amendment to the mining law; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. STEPHENS of California: Memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Oakland, Cal., and Brooklyn Parlor, No. 155, Native Daughters of the Golden West, favoring the passage of the Hamill bill (H. R. 5139); to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

By Mr. TAVENNER: Petition of G. H. Campbell, of Joy, Ill., favoring changes in certain sections of the revenue bill (H. R. 13891); to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. TEMPLE (by request): Petition of the New Brighton Branch of the Socialist Party, favoring policies intended to bring an end to the war in Europe; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. TEN EYCK (by request): Petitions of 70 citizens of the twenty-eighth congressional district of New York, favoring the Hobson-Sheppard bill; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. TREADWAY: Petition of Holyoke (Mass.) Clearing House Association, protesting against proposed tax on bank capital and surplus; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SENATE.

MONDAY, October 5, 1914.

(Legislative day of Monday, September 28, 1914.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

EMERGENCY REVENUE LEGISLATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate sundry communications with reference to the proposed revenue bill, which will be properly noted in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The communications were referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

Memorials of the Indianapolis Auto Trade Association, the Gibson Automobile Co., the National Motor Vehicle Co., the Waverly Co., and Nordyke & Marmon Co., all of Indianapolis, Ind., remonstrating against the proposed tax on passenger automobiles, and a memorial of the Washington (D. C.) Clearing House Association, remonstrating against the proposed tax on capital used in the business of banking.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the conference report on House bill 15657.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Johnson	Reed	Swanson
Bryan	Jones	Root	Thomas
Burton	Lane	Saulsbury	Thornton
Chamberlain	Lee, Md.	Shafroth	Townsend
Chilton	McCumber	Sheppard	Walsh
Culberson	Martine, N. J.	Shively	West
Fletcher	Myers	Smith, Mich.	White
Gore	Nelson	Smith, S. C.	Williams
Gronna	O'Gorman	Smoot
Hollis	Page	Sterling
James	Perkins	Stone

Mr. PAGE. I desire to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. DILLINGHAM] and to state that he is paired with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. THORNTON. I desire to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. RANSDELL]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I was requested to state that the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is detained at home through illness. This announcement will stand for the day.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], and the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] are necessarily absent. The senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] is paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], my colleague [Mr. SUTHERLAND] is paired with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], and the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] is paired with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. WALSH. I wish to announce that the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] is absent from the city on imperative duties which could not well be avoided. He will be here in the morning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-one Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. OVERMAN, Mr. POMERENE, Mr. SIMMONS, Mr. THOMPSON, and Mr. VARDAMAN answered to their names when called.

Mr. CLAPP, Mr. KERN, and Mr. OLIVER entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

JOHN BROWNLOW ZIEGLER.

Mr. LANE. I should like to ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution and to have it referred immediately to the proper committee. It will detain the Senate but a moment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 192) granting American citizenship to John Brownlow Ziegler was read twice by its title.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Where does the Senator from Oregon wish to have the joint resolution referred?

Mr. LANE. I presume it should go to the Committee on the Judiciary, but I will defer to the judgment of the Vice President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Why not the Committee on Foreign Relations?

Mr. LANE. He is an American-born citizen who has lost his citizenship temporarily. I believe it should go to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I think it should go to the Committee on Immigration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not the case of an immigrant.

Mr. O'GORMAN. But the Committee on Immigration is charged with the duty of looking into questions of naturalization.

Mr. SMOOT. I will state that in the past the reference of such measures has always been to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. LANE. Very well; let it be referred to that committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. However, this is not the case of a foreign-born citizen. It is that of an American-born citizen. The Chair refers the joint resolution to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

EMERGENCY REVENUE LEGISLATION.

Mr. CHILTON. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD some telegrams in the nature of protests against certain features of the tax bill, and I ask that they be referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the telegrams were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CLARKSBURG, W. VA., October 1, 1914.

Hon. WM. E. CHILTON,
Washington, D. C.:

We desire to protest against the proposed tax of $2 per thousand on capital and surplus and undivided profits of banks. We do not think the banks should be asked to contribute more than their just share of this burden. We are willing to pay our proportionate share of it, but do not think the banking institutions of the country should be singled out and this heavy tax imposed, as they are now taxed heavier than most any other corporation. I hope you will use your influence against this part of the proposed measure.

V. L. HIGHLAND,
President Empire National Bank of Clarksburg.

RONCEVERTE, W. VA., October 1, 1914.

Hon. W. E. CHILTON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The proposed tax on capital, surplus, and undivided profits of banks to the exclusion of tax on other ordinary corporations is very unjust. Will you not use your best efforts to the end that this may be equalized?

RONCEVERTE NATIONAL BANK.
FIRST NATIONAL BANK.

WILLIAMSON, W. VA., October 1, 1914.

Hon. WILLIAM E. CHILTON,
Washington, D. C.:

Our directors appeal to you to oppose the war tax bill. We think the act should be uniform and not be directed against any particular class.

NATIONAL BANK OF COMMERCE.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I send to the desk a telegram bearing on the deficiency tax bill. It is very brief and I should like to have it read.

There being no objection, the telegram was read and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH., October 3, 1914.

Senator WILLIAM ALDEN SMITH,
Washington, D. C.:

The so-called war-tax bill, House bill 18891, should be amended so that the tax of 1 cent per message, for telephone messages at least, may be charged to the telephone user. This can be accomplished by inserting in the paragraph entitled "Telegraph and telephone messages," page 25, after the words "corporation shall" the words "collect and," so that it will read, "corporation shall collect and pay a tax of 1 cent." This tax, if paid by our company, would amount to $4,600 per annum, and on account of the fact that most of our long-distance messages are, in fact, over short distances, and average only a little more than 15 cents each, for this company to assume the payment would be unjust and unduly burdensome.

CHAS. F. YOUNG,
ROBERT D. GRAHAM,
CHAS. E. TARTE,
W. J. STUART,
CYRUS E. PERKINS,
JOHN B. MARTIN,
VAN A. WALLIN,
PERCIVAL B. GARVEY,
E. B. FISHER,
W. J. CLARK,
Directors Citizens' Telephone Co.

Mr. JONES. I desire to present a telegram, to be referred to the Committee on Finance. It is from I. A. Nadeau, of Seattle, Wash., protesting against the proposed tax on life insurance. I think a similar telegram has been put in the RECORD, so I simply call attention to the statement in this telegram to the effect that no foreign countries tax life insurance in any form, not even those engaged in war. I move that the telegram be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. POMERENE. I have a number of telegrams relating to the pending revenue measure. Some of them relate to the provisions relative to life insurance; others to the bank tax; others to the tax on automobiles and gasoline; and one to the time of the making of the returns of telephone companies. I suggest that, for the information of the Senate, they be incorporated in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the telegrams were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COLUMBUS, OHIO, September 28, 1914.

Hon. ATLEE POMERENE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We understand the proposed war-tax bill will provide for the payment of 80 cents per thousand dollars of insurance hereafter issued. This company has heretofore protested against the imposition of taxes on life insurance, because we believe this to be a tax on the policyholders and consequently a tax upon funds which are unselfishly provided by policyholders for the benefit of their families. We now renew this protest, and in addition say that the proposed tax will be such a burden upon the younger life insurance companies as that some of them will probably not survive. This company can stand it if we have to, but it means a burden upon us that we ought not to bear, and so far as our policyholders are concerned it means a burden upon the only payments which men ever make with an unselfish purpose. We think the Government ought to tax automobiles, gasoline, liquors, tobacco, or anything else that may be called a luxury, but we feel that the Government should not impose a tax upon a business that is less selfish than any other business we know of. If the newspapers correctly report the situation the tax is not to be imposed upon some objects because of the number affected. The millions of policyholders in life insurance companies and fraternal societies should not be forgotten. We wish our protest from the standpoint of the policyholders and the company to be recorded most emphatically against the imposition of the proposed tax. We certainly have no funds with which to lobby against such a tax, and we hope that the Democratic administration and majority in Congress will be broad enough and big enough to appreciate the situation.

MIDLAND MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE CO.,

CANTON, OHIO, September 28, 1914.

Hon. ATLEE POMERENE,
Washington, D. C.:

We desire to enter our protest with you against the Underwood bill in so far as it concerns the taxing of banks, as we believe this to be class legislation, and feel that we are already paying more than our share of the taxes. We solicit your support in our opposition to this bill.

W. G. SAXTON, Cashier.

CANTON, OHIO, September 28, 1914.

MARION, OHIO, October 4, 1914.

Hon. ATLEE POMERENE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We have now four taxes—county, wills, corporation, bank inspection, totaling $6,600. Why add fifth burden—$800? Why should legitimate banking be thus punished, and other corporations, having grown from infants to giants in a few years, be exempted? Our 60 stockholders protest.

MARION COUNTY BANK CO.,
W. H. SCHAFFNER, President.

CANTON, OHIO, September 29, 1914.

Hon. ATLEE POMERENE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Please use your best efforts in reducing proposed tax on bank capital, surplus, and profits, and distribute the same on capital, surplus, and profits of all corporations not already affected by proposed tax.

Sincerely,

HOMER ROSE,
Cashier Commercial & Savings Bank.

CINCINNATI, OHIO, September 28, 1914.

Hon. ATLEE POMERENE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The Cincinnati Clearing House Association, by resolution at a meeting duly held, wishes to lodge a protest against the singling out of bank corporations and levying thereon a tax of $2 per thousand against total capital, surplus, and undivided profits of such institutions. The records will show, and it is well known, that the banking institutions are paying in each State their full and unquestioned proportion of the tax assessed in their respective localities. If it is necessary to provide additional revenues for the Government, and to accomplish that purpose one of the means necessary to provide same is in the nature of a tax upon capitalization against all incorporated companies, the Cincinnati Clearing House Association would be favorable to their just and equitable share, but it feels that no special burden ought to be laid on the banks, and that, as far as possible, banking ought to be free of any special burdens, so as to encourage capital to go into it for the purpose of developing and aiding in carrying on the industries of the country.

THE CINCINNATI CLEARING HOUSE ASSOCIATION.

COLUMBUS, OHIO, September 28, 1914.

Senator POMERENE,
Washington, D. C.:

Whereas there has passed the National House of Representatives a measure known as the Underwood bill, which contemplates a tax upon banking capital and surplus, designed as an emergency tax to raise additional revenue: Now, be it therefore

Resolved, That this measure, which contemplates a tax of $2 per thousand on banking capital and surplus and undivided profits, is at once unfair and discriminatory. It is well known that banking institutions already bear their just share of local, State, and national taxation. If the proposed measure is intended to cover a Treasury deficit, the banks are willing further to bear their proportionate share with corporations, but do earnestly protest against being singled out as the only ones to be taxed on their own capital shares. We believe that excessive burdens on banks should be discouraged, in order to attract capital investment and thereby help to expand and conserve business generally.

And resolved further, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the President of the United States, the two Senators from Ohio and the Representative from this district, and the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives.

COLUMBUS CLEARING HOUSE ASSOCIATION,
G. N. HINMAN, Secretary.

CANTON, OHIO, September 28, 1914.

Hon. ATLEE POMERENE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The war-tax bill passed by the House and now before the Senate provides for a tax of $2 per thousand on entire capital, surplus, and undivided profits of banks, which, in our judgment, is excessive and unjust. We urge you to use every effort to have the bill so amended as to include every corporation that is not already taxed under the bill and reduce the rate, so that the same amount of revenue will result as is expected to be raised from the banks alone under the present form of the bill. We believe your well-known sense of fairness will enable you to see the justice of this proposal, and that you will, after full consideration, give it your hearty support. From your great knowledge and study of the subject you well know that banks pay more than a fair proportion of the burdens of taxation, and they can not conceal or evade same if they desire, for their sworn reports are open to officials and the public.

CITY NATIONAL BANK.

COLUMBUS, OHIO, September 30, 1914.

Hon. ATLEE POMERENE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Whereas there is now being considered in the Senate a measure known as the Clayton antitrust bill to supplement existing laws, unlawful restraints, and monopolies, and for other purposes, section 9 of which contains the provisions which prohibit interlocking directorates of banks; and

Whereas we believe the idea of interlocking directorates, when properly carried out, to be conducive to safe, sound, and conservative banking, that many institutions would with great injustice be deprived of the benefits now enjoyed under the skillful guidance of directors and officers holding similar positions with otner banks: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Columbus Clearing House Association most vigorously protest against the enactment of such a measure, because we believe that no good policy of law is subserved by the proposed provisions; that the spirit and intent of the law is not violated unless the director abuses his position by preventing competition between such institution or exercises an undue control in the granting or refusing of credit, in which event we would recommend that the Federal Reserve Board have the power to compel the discontinuance of such practices or to require the resignation of such officer or director from the board.

COLUMBUS CLEARING HOUSE ASSOCIATION,
R. R. RICKLY, President,
C. M. HINMAN, Secretary.

LODI, OHIO, October 4, 1914.

Hon. ATLEE POMERENE,
Washington, D. C.:

Our club unanimously opposed to the proposed war tax on automobiles, believing it would be a detriment to the automobile industry. We urge you to use your influence against the measure.

A. W. NOAH,
President Lodi Automobile Club.

TOLEDO, OHIO, October 4, 1914.

Senator ATLEE POMERENE,
Washington, D. C.:

Re war-revenue bill, why further impose on the automobile and industry? Over hundred thousand of us in Ohio now paying double taxation on autos. Must we be made the goat again?

C. G. THOMPSON,
Secretary Toledo Automobile Club.

CLEVELAND, OHIO, October 4.

Hon. ATLEE POMERENE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The Ohio State Automobile Association strenuously protests against the imposition of a tax on horsepower of motor vehicles. The singling out of one particular class of vehicles using the public highways as an object of greatly increased taxation is unjust, unfair, and drastic in the extreme. On behalf of 120,000 automobile owners in Ohio we urge you to work and vote against this measure.

THE OHIO STATE AUTOMOBILE ASSOCIATION,
CHAS. C. JANES, President,
FRED H. CALEY, Secretary.

COLUMBUS, OHIO, September 28, 1914.

Senator ATLEE POMERENE,
Washington, D. C.:

The Ohio State Telephone Co. foresees difficulty in practical application of that feature of war-tax bill which relates to making sworn statement within first 15 days of month stating number of messages transmitted over its lines during the preceding month, because the wide distribution of this company's business is such that the management does not learn final results of the month's business until much longer than 15 days after the month closes. Our final results never are available until more than 30 days after the close of the month, and in order to secure practical operation of the measure that time should be increased.

THE OHIO STATE TELEPHONE CO.,
S. G. MCMEEN, President.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, on Friday last the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW], speaking in the course of an interruption of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], declared in stentorian tones that the present administration had fallen more servilely under the domination of Wall Street than any that has guided the destinies of the Nation for 25 years. In more diplomatic language the address of the Senator from Minnesota was calculated to convey or disseminate the same view. Yet neither the crass outbreak of the Senator from Kansas nor the more euphemistic utterances of the Senator from Minnesota will go so far to leave that impression on the public mind as the speech of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] delivered from this floor. No less burden of responsibility rests upon him that he had no purpose deliberately to inculcate that notion.

Whatever effect may be produced upon minds controlled by declamation, I am not apprehensive that any considerable body of the reflecting public will be influenced in their estimate of the present head of the Nation or of the record of the party now responsible for the conduct of its affairs by any general objurgation.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Montana has directly charged me with imputing improper motives to the President. I challenge him to put his finger upon a word of my speech, which is now in print, and which was printed the next morning after it was delivered, to justify that charge.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I am going to try to review the speech of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. This is a good time to review that statement. On the contrary, I continually appealed to my Democratic colleagues to abide by the public declarations and messages of the President. Instead of making the charge which the Senator is now ascribing to me, I asserted that the conference report was not in accordance with our platform or with the President's message to Congress, and I have appealed to Congress to abide by the platform and to sustain the message.

As for what was said on the other side of the Chamber, I am no more responsible than is the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I am delighted to know that the Senator from Missouri himself puts quite a different construction upon his speech from that which I am positive the country will give to it. I am very glad to have had this interruption, so that the Senator himself might have the opportunity to disclaim any deliberate purpose to convey the impression which I insist his address was well calculated to disseminate.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it is not necessary for the Senator from Missouri to explain. The Senator from Missouri utterly repudiates the statement of the Senator from Montana as unwarranted, as unjust, and challenges him now and here to put his finger upon a word which the Senator from Missouri has said warranting the unjust charge the Senator from Montana has just made.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator from Montana will endeavor to canvass, with justice to the Senator from Missouri, his remarks.

Mr. President, the faith which the American people have abundantly exhibited in the rectitude and patriotic purposes of the President is not to be disturbed by ill-tempered and acrid criticism that has no better foundation than is afforded by his public acts down to the present time. I proceed to consider how much there is in such countenance as he may have given to the bill under consideration as molded by the conferees, to shatter that confidence or convince the party of which he is the honored head of faithlessness to the cause of the people.

I have no disposition to engage in this debate in any attempt either to answer or to parry the invective indulged in by the distinguished Senator from Missouri in his attack upon the conference report now before the Senate. Nor is there any occasion, in my judgment, to attempt any defense against the gratuitous charge, for such his speech was, that those of his associates who are in any measure responsible for the bill before us in its present form have either basely surrendered their convictions and become the willing instruments of predatory wealth or are so afflicted with intellectual weakness as not to be able to discern that they are being used to accomplish the purposes of criminal trusts and monopolies.

The great burden of the complaint of the Senator is that certain penal provisions have been stricken from the bill. Other complaints he has, but the elimination of the penal clauses is the action about which his denunciation has risen into eloquence. He has persisted in discussing the report of the conference committee as though there were no law now for the suppression and punishment of trusts and monopolies. He assumes the existence of giant combinations in flagrant violation of the Sherman law, the far-reaching scope of which is now commonly recognized, the efficiency of which is being daily vindicated, existing without any effort at suppression and without any law to suppress them, and imagines them engaged in the practices denounced by the act. He assumes that the Democratic Party was called upon to enter upon a new field of legislation and to enact an entire code of laws to deal with the evils of trusts and monopolies as though the ground had never before been worked. He resolutely shuts his eyes to the provision of the existing law and inveighs against the very evils with which, by reason of the more recent activities of the Department of Justice, and the more liberal views announced by the Federal courts, it is quite effectively dealing and which, by resort to its penal provisions, must be obliterated.

He demands more drastic provisions in relation to the character of the decree to be entered in dissolution proceedings, though in no one of the cases in which the public expectation was not realized, as he insists, has recourse been had either to the criminal provisions or the forfeiture clause of the existing law.

I deny that the Democratic platform demanded any new legislation of which criminal penalties should be a feature. The platform demanded the vigorous enforcement of the criminal law—the existing criminal law—against trusts and trust officials, not the enactment of new legislation imposing further penalties. I ask that the platform declaration be printed without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

ANTITRUST LAW.

A private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable. We therefore favor the vigorous enforcement of the criminal as well as the civil law against trusts and trust officials, and demand the enactment of such additional legislation as may be necessary to make it impossible for a private monopoly to exist in the United States.

We favor the declaration by law of the conditions upon which corporations shall be permitted to engage in interstate trade, including, among others, the prevention of holding companies, of interlocking directors, of stock watering, of discrimination in price, and the control by any one corporation of so large a proportion of any industry as to make it a menace to competitive conditions.

We condemn the action of the Republican administration in compromising with the Standard Oil Co. and the Tobacco Trust, and its failure to invoke the criminal provisions of the antitrust law against the officers of those corporations after the court had declared that from the undisputed facts in the record they had violated the criminal provisions of the law.

We regret that the Sherman antitrust law has received a judicial construction depriving it of much of its efficacy, and we favor the enactment of legislation which will restore to the statute the strength of which it has been deprived by such interpretation.

Mr. WALSH. I will detain the Senate to read the following:

A private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable. We therefore favor the vigorous enforcement of the criminal as well as the civil law against trusts and trust officials.

The pending investigation by the Federal grand jury at New York into the organization and operations of the New Haven Railroad is being conducted in fulfillment of this promise.

In any just consideration or as a basis for any fair criticism of the pending bill and its counterpart, the Trade Commission bill, it is essential to have in mind the field covered by the existing law. It was abundantly demonstrated by the Senator from Idaho, who joins with the Senator from Missouri in opposing the conference report, that the Sherman law reaches to every form of combination in restraint of trade, by whatever subterfuge it may be disguised, as said by the Supreme Court in the Tobacco Co. case, and to every monopoly or attempt to establish a monopoly of interstate commerce. Any person entering into any such combination or conspiracy of like character, or making any contract the effect of which is to restrain commerce between the several States, or who sets up or attempts to set up a monopoly of even a part of that commerce, subjects himself to criminal prosecution under the Sherman Act.

The Senator from Idaho opposes the bill because, as he contends, the present law covers the entire field. The Senator from Missouri opposes it because the law we have, as is to be gathered from his speech, affords no relief.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me for the interruption, he can not make that statement in justice to himself.

Mr. WALSH. I have pondered quite deliberately on it.

Mr. REED. I am sorry the Senator will say that he has "pondered quite deliberately" upon any statement that I have opposed this bill upon the ground that the present Sherman law affords no relief at all, because over and over again in my speech I urged the potentiality of the present Sherman Act, and clearly stated that this legislation was intended to be supplemental. What I complained of was that in undertaking to supplement the Sherman Act we have not done so in an effective manner. I am sorry, very sorry, that the Senator says he has deliberately pondered the statement to which I have just called attention, which I am challenging now as in the very teeth of what I said, all of which is printed and open to the Senator's inspection.

Mr. WALSH. I undertake to say, Mr. President, that the ordinary reader of the speech of the Senator from Missouri will be led to the conclusion that there is now practically no law under which proceedings of any force or efficacy whatever can be conducted under which the great trusts can be prosecuted.

Mr. REED. The Senator is not "the ordinary reader of the speech"; and if the speech is so unfortunately couched as to mislead the ordinary reader, a Senator of the United States has no right to rise on the floor of the Senate and make a statement which he can not bear out. I give notice now that I shall reply to the speech, and I give notice to the Senator to be here when I reply.

Mr. WALSH. Of course I shall be glad to be present.

The Senator from Missouri, with all the great power he commands as a debater, with painful iteration, presents the case of some criminal trust torturing a feeble rival by local price cutting and destructive tying contracts until the last flickering breath has left the emaciated body of what promised to be a business rival. If he does not declare it to be so, he leaves it to be inferred, that when this bill is passed the monsters of the industrial world may freely indulge that pastime without dread of any punishment beyond the mild corrective, as he views it, that may be administered by the Federal Trade Commission. He resents the suggestion that there is no need to provide by the pending bill for the case of that or any other practice of such a criminal trust because the very existence of such a trust is forbidden by the law as it stands and any person who controls its activities, either directly or indirectly, is punishable thereunder. That law, in the language of Judge Buffington in United States against Reading Co., "is directed not only at the illegal acts an illegal combination does, but also at the existence and continuance of such illegal combinations." If any such persecution of a trade competitor as the Senator so eloquently portrays should be entered upon, the outraged citizen could demand of the United States attorney and the Attorney General that the officers of the trust offending be indicted, not only for the practices of which he complains, as an attempt to monopolize commerce, but for maintaining and continuing in the conspiracy in restraint of trade in consequence of which the unlawful organization came into existence. It is imaginable, indeed, that recreant officers of the law might decline to invoke the criminal provisions of the existing law in his behalf. These practices have gone on in the past in defiance of the law, while its sworn guardians have supinely observed the process of the eradication of competition in not a few of the great industries of the country.

The law is, and since the enactment of the Sherman Act always has been, ample not only to suppress these piracies perpetrated by the great trusts to fasten monopoly upon the people, but to punish those responsible for the existence of such trusts, whether they pursue the practices so generally condemned or cautiously observe a more benign policy in the hope that the unlawful character of their organization may not be challenged by appropriate civil and criminal proceedings. The trouble has been not that the law was inadequate in the case of the giant industrial and transportation corporations but that it was not enforced. Not one of them has been proceeded against in the last 15 years that has not been found to exist in violation of the law, notwithstanding the interpretation given to it by the Supreme Court in the Standard Oil and Tobacco Co. cases.

Despite the severe and often intemperate criticism of the opinions in the cases referred to, it is noteworthy that no amendment was offered to the pending bill from either side of the Senate, nor, so far as I have learned, from either side of the House, to give to the statute a significance essentially different from that attributed to it by the Supreme Court in them. Though the Senator from Missouri found it, for some reason, advisable to repeat in his inimitable, forceful style the strictures once freely indulged in toward those opinions, not even he became sponsor for an amendment which would give expression to the view he proclaimed touching their unrighteous character.

Relief is to be sought in the vigilant prosecution of those guilty of the infraction of the law as it stands, not in the imposition of identically the same penalties for the commission of acts now denounced and punishable criminally under the law. If it is feared that the Attorney General and his subordinates will not proceed against such under the existing law, what reason is there to hope they will be more responsive to duty if the penalty now imposed shall be reenacted?

In the course of the remarkably able address delivered by the Senator from Idaho on Wednesday, September 30, he said:

> I desire now to take up some of the decisions which discuss the Sherman law, its wide reach, and its most comprehensive scope, with reference to all times and conceivable forms of monopolies and restraints of trade. As I do so, I wish to submit to the Senate this proposition and have it answered, if anyone can conceive of an answer; that is, What form of monopoly, what possible combination in restraint of interstate commerce, can you conceive of that may not be reached and destroyed under the principles which are now established by the Supreme Court in its decisions under the Sherman antitrust law? Is there any form of monopoly or monopolistic practice or restraint of trade which directly affects interstate commerce that will not be found to come within the clear announcement of the principles of the Supreme Court in the rendition of these different decisions? They have covered the entire field and dealt with all kinds of practices and have not only denounced the specified practices but announced general principles which are a guide as to future practices. It seems to me that we are fairly safe in saying that every conceivable form of conduct heretofore arising has been specifically referred to, and where not specifically referred to, general principles have been announced which bring them within the law, whatever they may be.

Having reviewed the decisions of the Federal courts, and particularly the court of last resort, to sustain the view thus expressed, he declared that—

> The question of lowering prices for the purpose of putting a competitor out of business while keeping prices up in another part of the country, the question of sending spies to spy upon an independent industry or to foment strikes within an independent industry, the question of purchasing competitors and dismantling projects and putting them out of business, are all so flagrant, so open, and such unquestioned acts in violation of the statute that no man guilty of them would have any question at the time of their doing or achievement that he was within the inhibition of the law.

From this conclusion no careful student of the trend of the decisions can withhold his concurrence. I shall be glad to allow the Senator to signify whether he does not agree with me.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, since the Senator directs that statement to me immediately, I desire to ask the Senator, if all that is true, if all trust practices are within the present law, completely condemned by it and completely met by it, why this legislation at all? Why take from the courts—which now, according to this theory, have the right to punish by fine and imprisonment—any part of their jurisdiction by turning it over to a commission?

Of course the Senator will say we have not taken it away, and that is true. It still remains. But why, to aid a commission, do that which the Senator now affirms the courts can do, and deprive the commission of the power to do anything except prevent by decree?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, of course the Senator has not answered my question.

Mr. REED. I tried to answer it.

Mr. WALSH. He answered my question by asking me one. I have endeavored to put in formal shape the views that I entertain touching the question that the Senator has now addressed to me, and I am just about to answer it.

Mr. REED. Since the Senator says I have not answered his question, if he will pardon me the interruption I will try to answer it.

It is my opinion, and has been my opinion, that the Sherman law, properly construed, reached all forms of restraint of trade and reached all forms of monopoly; but I have been impressed with the idea that in order to prove the restraint of trade and the existence of monopoly a wide field of evidence must necessarily be traveled over, and that the purpose of this legislation was to single out certain particular practices usually employed by the trust or by the concern engaged in restraining trade, and make the doing of those acts sufficient to bring the condemnation of the law. If that be not the purpose of this legislation, then it would seem that no purpose can be assigned to the legislation.

Mr. WALSH. Any fair review of the legislation that is now under consideration must regard it, as the title to the bill before the Senate declares it to be, as supplementary to "existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies"—not as intended to reach cases within or to practices or parties now amenable to the law but to those practices and transactions not now denounced by it, but which if persevered in and extended will or may result in monopoly or in consolidation which, by eliminating competition pro tanto, makes monopoly probable if not inevitable.

The primary purposes of the provisions so viciously assailed is to arrest monopoly in the making, in its initial stages, to condemn practices the tendency of which is to foster eventual monopoly, even though no such purpose may have been entertained in any particular transaction.

It was hoped that by the vigorous enforcement of the civil as well as the criminal provisions of the law, as demanded in the Democratic platform, the existing unlawful combinations in restraint of commerce might be destroyed, and that by the operation of the new legislation new ones could not come into being. Thus it was intended "to make it impossible for a private monopoly to exist within the United States."

In this attempt to reach conditions not covered by the law as it stands, the force and efficacy of which was to be in no wise weakened, two methods were suggested. One was to single out the practices which might be described as monopolistic in their tendencies, to define them with such accuracy as was possible and to forbid them under penalties; the other was to subject each individual case to the scrutiny of a commission and to enjoin it through the action of such a body if, under the peculiar circumstances, it should appear inimical to the public welfare. The latter addressed itself to the Congress as the more advisable, if not the more efficacious course. The Trade Commission bill received the assent of both Houses of Congress and of the President. It denounced all forms of unfair competition as unlawful, and authorized the suppression of such by order of the commission, including local price-cutting and tying contracts forbidden by sections 2 and 3 of the pending bill as it came from the House under penalties prescribed therein. The bill came to the Senate framed on the theory that the new legislation should be enforced by penalties. Meanwhile the Senate added to the House Trade Commission bill section 5, above referred to, which embodied the principle of the suppression of the practices to which sections 2 and 3 of the pending bill, popularly known as the Clayton bill, refer, through the commission. The House sanctioned the adoption of that method by giving its approval to the Trade Commission bill, which passed that body by a vote of 277 to 54, but one Democrat voting against it. In this branch it was supported on final passage by a vote of 53 to 16, only two Democrats voting against the measure. Among these, strangely enough, the Senator from Missouri was not numbered, though his voice was raised at all seasonable times during the debate against the central idea of the bill as it passed—that all unfair practices in trade should be suppressed through the commission created by the act. In fairness to the Senator it perhaps should be said that he indulged some hope that section 5 might be eliminated in conference, but the members of his party in the House gave their all but unanimous consent to the system it inaugurated; but one, as stated, being impressed with the view now so insistently urged by the Senator that he was surrendering to the trusts or weakly allowing them to wheedle him into acquiescence in their plans to obtain immunity from prosecution for their misdeeds.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator knows perfectly well that I stated on the floor of the Senate, in my various remarks, that there were many good features in the bill; that I was in favor of many of the features of it.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator refers to the Trade Commission bill?

Mr. REED. Yes. He also knows that when I was put to the proposition of voting against the entire bill, and thus striking down the good features with this doubtful feature, I took my choice. I think he also knows that there were many Democrats in this Chamber who were controlled by similar motives.

Mr. WALSH. I do not know that the last sentence uttered by the Senator is correct. I have given him credit, so far as his own motives are concerned, for everything he has now suggested. He hoped, I have no doubt, that section 5 would be eliminated in the conference. On the contrary, the House, by an overwhelming vote, gave its concurrence to the principle expressed in section 5.

It is idle to advance that they contemplated that having provided for the suppression of all unfair methods of competition through the Trade Commission, they yet hoped that some unfair methods would be penalized. The two systems of dealing with unfair practices do not run together. The adoption of the one signifies to a logical mind the rejection of the other.

It is not my purpose now to review the considerations which prompted both Houses of Congress by an overwhelming vote to give their adherence to the method of suppression through a commission rather than by the imposition of criminal penalties. The arguments in favor of the rival systems will be found elaborated in the debates. Briefly, it was contended that if penalties were to be imposed the acts condemned and the conditions stamping them as criminal must be carefully and precisely defined in the statute, and that the ingenuity of the legislator in framing the statute might not equal that of the adroit rogue in devising other methods of unfair competition through which to crush a rival. It was thought the better plan to denounce all forms of unfair competition and authorize the commission to deal with each particular case as it arose. Moreover, it was found no easy task to frame a statute which would reach the case of a plundering monopolist which would not only not hamper many legitimate transactions, but not be oppressive to a struggling industry contending for trade against a competitor enjoying a practical monopoly or one long established and supported by unlimited capital. To illustrate: No one would hesitate to subject to the pains and penalties of the criminal law institutions like the Standard Oil Co., which cut prices within the legitimate territory of a weak rival until it is forced into bankruptcy. But the weak rival might want to enter the territory theretofore exclusively served by the Standard Oil, and might be willing to shade the price below what it asks in other localities in order to get the business. Would anyone care to jail the ambitious producer of refined oil for his attempt to introduce some competition into a community where none existed before?

The independent makers of sewing thread contend against a powerful rival that puts out the Clark's and Coats's brands. Would it be wise to deny to one of them the right to offer a special inducement in price to a dealer in a community exclusively supplied by the trust in order to induce him to take the less-known article, which may be just as good, and recommend it to his customers as such?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I understood the Senator to say he would deem it unwise to punish those who were seeking to introduce competition where there was no competition before.

Mr. WALSH. I should.

Mr. BORAH. For instance, those who might be fighting the Standard Oil Co.?

Mr. WALSH. I maintain that the whole purpose of the legislation is to encourage competition.

Mr. BORAH. As I understood the Senator, the strength of the argument which he is making consists in the fact that small business men might desire, through unfair methods, to introduce competition where there was not competition before, and that therefore it would be unwise to punish them for doing that.

Mr. WALSH. The methods would not be unfair under the circumstances the Senator talks about. They are only unfair when they contemplate the destruction or crippling of a rival or are otherwise contrary to the public interest.

Mr. BORAH. Then, if it would not be unfair, the trade commission would not have jurisdiction of it at all.

Mr. WALSH. It would have jurisdiction to inquire whether under the circumstances it is unfair.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly; and if it has a small man on one side and a large man on the other, that would settle the question.

Mr. WALSH. That would not settle the thing at all. All the facts and circumstances would be taken into consideration for the purpose of arriving at a just conclusion as to whether the continuation of the practices would be destructive of competition or whether they would be encouraging to competition.

The purpose of the legislation of which the pending bill forms a part is to preserve competition where it exists, to restore it where it is destroyed, and to permit it to spring up in new fields. It is in the last degree questionable whether more harm than good would not result from a penal statute denouncing local price cutting. The friends of the pending measure believe that the Standard Oil magnates and the officers of the Thread Trust may be and ought to be prosecuted criminally under the Sherman Act should they resort to local price cutting to destroy or cripple a weak rival. The latter would be immune, as he ought to be immune, from criminal responsibility for attempting what it is the end of the law to encourage—competition in trade.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. REED. I should like to get the Senator's idea a little clearer, if, indeed, anything can render any more clear the very lucid statement the Senator is making.

Does the Senator contend that if a large concern cuts prices locally and does it for the purpose of destroying a competitor its proprietor should be sent to jail, but that if a smaller concern does identically the same thing——

Mr. WALSH. For the purpose of destroying a competitor.

Mr. REED. For exactly the same reason and purpose does the Senator think that this proprietor should not be treated in the same way? Does the Senator think it is possible in this country to have one law for a man with a large amount of money and another law for the man with a small amount of money? If the Senator does so believe, I wish he would indicate to the Senate for its enlightenment and the enlightenment of the country just how much money a man must have to be within the purview of the criminal statutes and just how little he must have to be exempt.

Mr. WALSH. Of course I am not going to attempt to answer that kind of a question. It is not intended or calculated to elucidate any very clear idea about this legislation. You can not determine the question as to whether a certain practice is fair or unfair by the amount of money the man has who does it. If the great Standard Oil with a capital, as my recollection is now, of something like $700,000,000 should get into a certain community in which the Montana-Wyoming Oil Co. markets its product and should immediately proceed to cut prices below those prevailing there and in adjacent territory, the presumption would very likely address itself to most minds that it was done for the purpose of destroying that rival. On the other hand, if the little Montana-Wyoming Oil Co. should offer the people of Billings, for instance, oil at a less price than they sell at Sheridan, you would have to have some other proof that it started out to put the Standard Oil out of business.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will pardon me, we will concede that if the Standard Oil Co. went into the State of Montana for the purpose of driving out the Montana company and cut prices locally in Montana, and did succeed in driving out the Montana Oil Co., it would be a wrong to the Montana Oil Co. and would be something that ought to be prohibited.

Now, suppose that the Montana Oil Co., desiring to put out of business a local dealer in Billings, Mont., inspired by the same diabolic motive and pursuing the identical plan of the Standard Oil Co., were to proceed in Billings to cut the life out of the small dealer there, would not this Montana Oil Co. be subject to the same laws and the same penalties as the Standard Oil Co.?

Mr. WALSH. Unquestionably.

Mr. REED. Again, suppose that the local oil dealer in the city of Billings, being somewhat larger and more powerful than some rival he had in that city, for the purpose of driving that rival out of business cut prices locally for the same evil reason, would he not be subject to the same law?

Mr. WALSH. Undoubtedly he would.

Mr. REED. Then it seems to me, Mr. President, when we are passing this law we must make it universal in its application, and if the prison doors are to swing open to receive one man who has cut prices locally in order to destroy a rival, and if those doors will be opened by the key of the Sherman law, if I may use so poor a metaphor, then it ought to apply clear down the line.

I am, I think, a somewhat persistant advocate of the fact that trusts and monopolies ought to be wiped out, but I believe that larceny by a rich man is no worse than larceny by a poor man, and that larceny by both ought to be punished in the same way. I think they should be tried in the same tribunal, as the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] suggests to me, and subject to the same penalties.

Mr. WALSH. I will interrupt the Senator to say that they are subject to the same laws and punishable under exactly the same conditions and by exactly the same tribunals.

Mr. REED. If they are, and if the Sherman law absolutely covers them all and reaches this practice from its inception to its conclusion, has not the Senator demonstrated that there was no necessity for this practice ever to be brought before the Trade Commission? Has he not demonstrated this bill out of court?

Mr. WALSH. I have already, Mr. President, replied to the question now addressed to me by the Senator from Missouri, but I digress for the purpose of saying that as this bill came from the House it carried penalties, the theory being that it was to be enforced by penalties, and not through a commission.

It provided that local price cutting should not be criminal unless it was done with intent thereby to destroy or wrongfully injure the business of a competitor. If there is another small company engaged in the oil business in Billings, and the Montana-Wyoming Co. cuts prices for the purpose of destroying that rival it encounters the criminal penalties of the Sherman law just exactly the same as the Standard Oil Co. does.

Mr. President, in determining whether prices were cut for the purpose of destroying a rival or not, the Senator is an able criminal prosecutor, in a case of that character, when he is making a charge of that kind, he would not fail to demonstrate, by proof, if it could be secured, that the defendant was a powerful, wealthy organization and its rival was a puny and impecunious one. It is a most important consideration, Mr. President, in considering whether the criminal intent existed or not, whether the power exists to do the act—that is, if it appears that the little struggling competitor in all human experience has not the power to destroy or cripple the Standard Oil Co.—the reasonable probability is that the Trade Commission or a jury would say that it did not have any such purpose at all, and it would be acquitted.

Mr. REED. Of course, if they have not the power to injure anybody, nobody will be injured and nobody will complain. That answers itself. There must always be the power to injure before anybody is injured, and somebody must be injured before he complains. But the point is, shall we have two tribunals and two methods of procedure, one for the big man and one for the little man? I did not so understand the purpose of Congress when it enacted the Trade Commission bill. I supposed that bill was to apply to all classes of the people, big and little.

Mr. WALSH. I think that idea is generally entertained; at least the friends of the measure hold that notion about it.

And so with tying contracts. One can readily imagine, indeed, the business world can testify to the most outrageous abuses, monopolistic in character, of some of the criminal trusts through contracts of this character. They are usually employed in connection with the sale or lease of or license to use patented articles. Standard articles and those sold under well-established brands may serve as a basis for such contracts, but if abuses have sprung up in connection with the same they have not become so flagrant as to attract public notice. The party controlling the patent refuses to sell or lease or to license the use of the machine embodying it except upon condition that the purchaser, lessee, or licensee supplies himself with his needs in other lines from the owner of the patent or some one named by him. Thus is built up a monopoly not only in the patented article, but in all others, by such contracts tied to it. It is an indefensible practice. The Government gives the patentee or his assignee a monopoly of the right to manufacture, use, and sell the patented article. He has a monopoly of it and ought not to be allowed to use it to establish a monopoly of an article to which his patent does not extend.

But the bill as it came from the House penalized all tying contracts, the effect of which is to lessen competition, whether they related to patented or to unpatented articles. It prohibited, under a penalty, the making of a contract by which one obligated himself to buy of the seller, if he bought of anyone, another article as a condition of the purchase he was making, provided it had such effect. I offer my horse for sale at $200, but agree with the buyer to abate $25 from the price if he will agree to buy my carriage at $250, if he buys a carriage at all. If it should appear to a jury that competition in the sale of carriages was thereby lessened, I would be held a criminal. The Senator from Missouri himself illustrated the possibilities of a general denunciation of tying contracts. He instances as follows—and I quote from the RECORD of September 28, page 15830:

> I make a contract with A, by which, if I sell him one horse he agrees to buy five other horses from me, if he needs them.

This kind of a contract he would inhibit under a penalty. Anyone who differs with him concerning the wisdom of such a policy is a traitor to Democratic principles, a hypocrite in his profession of hostility to trusts and monopolies, and the deserving victim of the coming wrath of an outraged constituency.

He may be right in his view concerning the wisdom of the policy advocated by him that penal laws offer the only remedy for the evils with which the legislation under consideration attempts to deal. He may even be right that such contracts as the one supposed by him ought to be condemned in order that the great offenders in trust organization and direction may be reached. The majority of his colleagues do not think so. They are of the opinion that the great offenders can be punished under the Sherman law, and that in the cases to which that law, comprehensive as it is, far-reaching as the decisions under it show it to be, do not extend, in which it is charged that practices are being pursued calculated to build up a monopoly, but which are not of so flagrant a character or are not indulged in by parties so circumstanced as to fall under the condemnation of the Sherman law, the question of guilt may safely be left to the determination of the Trade Commission.

It is true that "unfair competition" in all its forms, that local price cutting and tying contracts as notorious varieties of "unfair competition" specifically denounced by this bill, may be and are practiced by the giant industrial organizations that have sprung from competing units, as well as by individuals and associations, big and little, financially and industrially, who are not amenable to the Sherman Act. It is true that with reference to the former the remedy before the Trade Commission will be cumulative, and that the officers charged with the execution of the law may choose to prosecute before the Trade Commission for such unfair practices, and omit to resort to the remedies, civil and criminal, warranted by the Sherman law.

It is conceivable that an Attorney General will tolerate the continued existence of a criminal trust, so long as it indulges in no vicious practices in trade, imposes no tying contracts on its customers, and refrains from local price cutting to ruin competitors. But why assume that he will be so indifferent or tolerant? In his department he is under a continuing obligation to carry out the policy of the President, who is responsible for his action or his inaction. A Cabinet officer can not hold his post for a day against the wishes of the President. Any dereliction on his part is, accordingly, justly attributed to his superior if dismissal does not follow on its becoming known.

The idea of making the Federal Trade Commission a haven for the trusts contemplates, accordingly, the concurrence or connivance of the President of the United States, sworn to see that the laws—all the laws—are faithfully executed, and who discharges the duties of his high office under the constant watchfulness of a jealous public, not to speak of captious critics ready to turn to political advantage any lapse from the highest standard of official rectitude. There is no more reason to apprehend that when there are three remedies open—two under the Sherman law and one under the Trade Commission law—the latter will be pursued to the exclusion of both that are available under the old law, than there is why, when the civil remedy is followed under the Sherman law, the criminal clause will be allowed to fall into innocuous desuetude. The two remedies are now being pursued concurrently in the New Haven case. The civil action is still pending to dissolve the unlawful combination, and the grand jury is now at work, under the direction of the Department of Justice, investigating the transactions on which the civil suit is founded, with a view to bringing the parties responsible for them to trial under the penal provisions of the Sherman law. Are we to believe that if the existing law had been in effect and the company had been brought in some manner before the commission, under its provisions for investigation, there would have been no prosecution under the Sherman Act? Indeed, what happened was quite analogous to what will occur regularly when proceedings are instituted under the Trade Commission act against any flagrant violator of the original antitrust law. The Senate ordered an investigation of the New Haven before the Interstate Commerce Commission. The revelations were so noisome that public opinion would have forced resort to the criminal law even by an administration not unfriendly to those responsible for the conditions exposed. Why may we not indulge the hope that similar results will flow from an investigation upon a charge before the Trade Commission of unfair competition, or before that body or the Interstate Commerce Commission under the provisions of this bill? The testimony taken would promptly reach the public ear, and a laggard Attorney General would be spurred to vigorous action in every case in which either the character of the offender or the practices shown to have been pursued merited condign punishment. The commission would enjoin any future violations of the law aimed to uproot unfair methods of competition; the Department of Justice would follow the offender through the criminal courts for past transgressions. The hope that such will be the operation of the present legislation may be vain; but is one to be maligned because he cherishes it, or to be convicted of weakness of intellect because he harbors the expectation or holds to the belief that it will?

If he does, there is but one course to pursue. It is utterly illogical to repose in the Trade Commission by one act the power to investigate charges of unfair methods of competition and to restrain all such, and to single out 2 among 20 varieties of unfair competition, attempt to define them, and affix criminal penalties by another act. The general language "unfair competition" was used in the Trade Commission bill because of the inherent difficulty of defining the several varieties. The plan of dealing with the subject by a Trade Commission having been adopted, there was no longer any reason for retaining in the pending bill the provisions, by which an attempt was made to define two varieties. The Senate pursued a perfectly logical course in striking them out altogether. But it was advanced with much reason that the Trade Commission could not declare the tying contract unlawful or assert that the use of it in connection with the sale or lease of or license to use a patented article constituted unfair competition, because the Supreme Court of the United States had approved of such a contract in the case of Henry against Dick, Two hundred and twenty-fourth United States, page 1, as being strictly within the rights of the patentee under the law as it stood. To meet such a contention, the tying contract, founded upon a patent, was declared unlawful by an amendment which has taken my name, and which specifically declared that any condition of the sale or lease or license to use a patented machine or article restricting the purchaser, lessee, or licensee in his right to buy other wares, wherever he might choose, should be void. To that amendment a penal clause was attached by an amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri. I voted against it. It was entirely unnecessary. The condition being void, it bound no one. The party signing a contract containing it was at perfect liberty to provide himself elsewhere as though he had never signed it. If, notwithstanding the invalidity of the condition in the contract, it could be made an engine of oppression—a result scarcely conceivable—the Trade Commission could give relief, as in the case of tying contracts dealing with unpatented articles; and in flagrant cases, such as the United Shoe Machinery Co., the Sherman Act might be effectually invoked. The addition of the penalty made the amendment incongruous and out of harmony with the legislation of which it formed a part.

The House conferees, acting in strict accord with the sentiment of that body, as evidenced by its adoption of the Trade Commission bill, expressive of the view that "unfair competition" as such should be dealt with by the commission and not through the machinery of the criminal law insisted on a provision that contained no penal clause and specifically reposed the enforcement of the section in the Trade Commission. The provision of the House bill denouncing all tying contracts the effect of which may be substantially to lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly was adopted. The conferees were, so far as the Representatives of the House are concerned, entirely justified in insisting on the elimination of the penal provision; they marred the symmetry of the legislation by attempting to define either the particular kind of tying contract or the particular kind of price cutting that is unlawful; that is to say, the kind that constitutes "unfair competition." I should very much have preferred to leave it to the Trade Commission to determine whether any particular contract or practice said to be unfair falls under the condemnation of the act. However, I had no hope that the conferees would adjust the differences between the two Houses exactly as I would like. The force of the amendment of which I am the reputed author is not, in my judgment, weakened in the least degree by the substitute, or rather the latter is to my mind, quite as efficacious. In one respect it is strengthened, for the substituted section extends by specific reference to the case of a discount or rebate given or a price fixed on one article upon condition that others are not procured except from the vendor, lessor, licensor, or his nominee. The conferees did, indeed, add the clause "where the effect of such lease, sale, or contract for sale, or such condition, agreement, or understanding may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce."

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SWANSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. CHILTON. I should like to put into the RECORD at this time, and to call the attention of the Senator from Montana to the fact, that what is known as the Walsh amendment was taken largely from what is known as the Gore bill, which was introduced in the Senate. The main part of that was taken bodily, practically word for word, from chapter 29 of seventh Edward VII, the English act regulating tying contracts, but the exceptions were not inserted. The exceptions in that original act show why the conferees made the decision which they did.

Mr. REED. May I interrupt to ask what was the penalty in the Edward VII act?

Mr. CHILTON. I do not recall; but I have the act here, and I will hand it to the Senator.

Mr. REED. There was a penalty attached, was there not?

Mr. CHILTON. I do not recall whether or not there was; but I will let the Senator know as to that later.

Mr. REED. In what year was the Edward the Seventh act passed? Can the Senator state that approximately?

Mr. CHILTON. It was during the reign of the late King Edward of England.

Mr. REED. I know; but in what year?

Mr. CHILTON. It was in the seventh year of his reign. It is a very recent act. There is no doubt in the world that the drafter of the Gore bill took the language from that act, and did not put in the exceptions which that act contains. We framed this measure in a general way, so as to make the act conform practically to the intention of the law.

Mr. WALSH. I dare say the English act is enforced through a penalty clause. Of course that is important only provided England has another act substantially the same as our Sherman Antitrust Act, and has not a commission equivalent to our trade commission, by which to enforce it. If she has both of those, and then there is a penal clause in the act, it would be pertinent in this connection. But it is only in cases in which competition is likely to be suppressed or a monopoly eventually result that we are in any wise concerned. It is for just such conditions that this legislation is intended. It is conceivable that this clause may be used as a shield by some daring buccaneer in the industrial world; but the chances of its being successfully employed are too remote to cause anyone on that account to vote to reject this report. The distinguished Senator from Minnesota, who spoke in his usual forceful style, in opposition to its adoption, pointed out the omission of the clause in the amendment offered by me, to the effect that the inhibited condition should be void. The language pointed out added no strength to the amendment. It being declared to be unlawful to insert such a condition in a contract, it becomes invalid without any specific declaration to that effect. It is well understood that the Senator from Minnesota opposes the entire bill because of the provisions in it relating to labor, and his criticism of the conference report is to be weighed in the light of that fact.

Because of my interest in the amendment which became section 2 of the Senate bill, denouncing tying contracts applicable to patented articles, representatives of many factories victimized by the practice at which is was aimed have conferred with me repeatedly concerning it. Not one has expressed to me any disappointment at or dissent from or opposition to the substitute of the conferees. If it were open to serious criticism, it is inconceivable to me that I should not have heard from them.

In view of the clamor that has been raised about the work of the conferees, it is but just that I should say that the penalty clause added to the so-called Walsh amendment on the motion of the Senator from Missouri was the only penal provision that went out in conference.

The distinguished junior Senator from Massachusetts, in his able address of Thursday, referred approvingly to an editorial appearing in the new St. Louis Star of the 29th ultimo, making mention in a commendatory way of the address of the Senator from Missouri, who is to be congratulated upon the appreciation of his effort expressed by the Senator from Massachusetts, the greater portion of whose speech consisted of a eulogy of the United Shoe Machinery Co. and a defense of its tying contracts. I ask that the article be printed as an appendix to my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered. The Chair hears none.

The article will be found in the appendix to Mr. WALSH'S remarks.

Mr. WALSH. I read from the editorial the following:

> During the framing of the bill and its passage through both Houses the usual influences were at work to make the bill formidable only in its aspect, but impotent in its actual power.
> Every effort possible was made to make the bill a "glittering generality," which would practically permit the trusts to continue undisturbed.
> As the bill passed the House it was powerless to destroy trust monopoly.
> But when it reached the Senate it was attacked for its fatal defects by Senator REED and others, and who made such a fight that it was amended so that penalties for its violation were made specific and mandatory, and interlocking directorates and holding companies were specifically forbidden.

Of course it is well known that as the bill came from the House it imposed all the penalties which the Senator from Missouri insists should be in the bill, and, of course, it contained provisions denouncing intercorporate holdings and interlocking directorates, with penalties also.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. REED. As I am not responsible for the editorial——

Mr. WALSH. Oh, no; but the Senator will remember that I charged a moment ago, much to his discomfiture, that he was giving this impression to the country, and I am endeavoring to show him that that is the case.

Mr. REED. Oh, Mr. President, the Senator has not added a particle to my discomfiture, except in the one respect that I had thought him to be too fair a man to misrepresent my position. The solitary discomfiture I feel is because I am compelled to revise my opinion. It is not because of anything the Senator has said in the way of argument or logic that has added anything to my discomfiture.

Now, so far as this statement in the paper is concerned, it is, of course, like many other statements, in some respects inaccurate. The House bill did contain criminal penalties. I did not originate any criminal penalty, but the Senator will have to say, I think, that in the committee I contended for a retention of the penalties, and upon the floor of the Senate I contended for their retention.

Mr. WALSH. Exactly; and in my poor way I am endeavoring to correct the misunderstanding concerning this bill that has gone out to the country, very largely, I fear by reason of the speech of the Senator from Missouri. I continue:

> That the defenders of the trusts were able to do more with the House than with the Senate was a reversal of form. In the past the Senate has been the very home of the defenders of monopoly and special interests.
> It was there the Democratic Party's pledge to the people was expected to be broken, not in the House, but the House broke it, unrebuked by the administration, if not approved by it, and but for the determined fight made by Senator REED and associates the Senate would have approved the betrayal.
> But this fight seems to have been in vain.
> In conference the Senate amendments, which gave the bill vitality and "teeth" with which it could attack and destroy monopoly, were either amended to make them harmless or dropped.

It will be remembered that the Senate took out every one of the penalties; they were taken out right here on the floor of the Senate in accordance with the recommendations of the Judiciary Committee; and then eventually there was restored, upon motion of the Senator from Missouri, only the penalty to the so-called Walsh amendment.

Mr. REED. But the Senator ought to add that the Senate put in the provision extending the statute of limitations, which was taken out in conference; that the Senate put in the provision that a corporation doing business contrary to the laws of the State of its existence or the State where it was doing business, should not be permitted to engage in interstate commerce; and the Senate put in the provision that when a corporation was convicted of being a trust it should be really dissolved; and those provisions did disappear in conference.

Mr. WALSH. We all understand, Mr. President, that the Senator has made complaint about a good many things in the conference report, but his fight has been because the penalties are not here.

I continue:

> In this emasculated form it is back in the Senate for approval, and Senator REED is again attacking it with the same vigor as he did when he forced adoption of his amendments.
> Should he fail, which is predicted, and the Senate approve the conference report, the bill in its impotent form will go to the President for his signature.

The Senator from Missouri can not be held responsible either for the appearance of this article nor for the gross misrepresentation of the facts made in it, and yet it is not strange that his unrestricted denunciation of the Senate conferees, of whom I was not one, should have left upon some susceptible minds the views it so unwarrantedly expresses.

The fact is that as the bill came from the House it prescribed penalties in connection with every prohibitory provision. It was framed on the theory of enforcement by penalties, not through the commissions. As the bill came from the House it was ideal in that respect in the opinion of the Senator from Missouri, and the RECORD will disclose that, never having had any confidence in the Trade Commission or in the idea of suppressing unfair trade practices through its instrumentality, his great fight made during the consideration of the bill was to restore the penalty clauses, all of which were stricken out, not by the conferees, but by the Judiciary Committee before the bill came before the Senate for debate at all; that is to say, the Judiciary Committee reported the bill with amendments providing for the elimination of the penalty clauses. It so reported because meanwhile the Senate had passed the Trade Commission bill, signifying thereby its adherence to the policy of preventing unfair practices in trade by a commission instead of through the criminal courts. The committee simply yielded to the voice of the Senate, whose servant it was. The Senator from Missouri made a most persistent fight to defeat the recommendation of the committee, but he did not prevail, and the penalty clauses of the bill as it came from the House that were excised all went out in the Senate. It afterwards added, as stated, on the motion of the Senator from Missouri, a penal clause to the so-called Walsh amendment, which alone was dropped in the conference, the substituted section being practically the provision of the House bill on the subject, without the penalty clause, but with an amendment to the appropriate section providing for enforcement through the Trade Commission. Of course, despite the statement in the editorial, the bill came to us from the House with specific provisions in relation to interlocking directors and holding companies.

The Senator from Missouri owes it to himself, to his associates, and to the paper which writes in just admiration of his talents to make a frank statement from the floor in accordance with the facts. Unfortunately, it will not be so easy to obliterate many other no less grossly erroneous ideas likely to be harbored in consequence of the address of the Senator. Much of his criticism may be justly weighed in connection with his unrestrained condemnation of the conferees for restoring the word "substantially" to the bill. It was in both clauses of section 8 as the bill came from the House—the one dealing with intercorporate holdings and the one dealing with holding companies—and though that section was considered long and earnestly by the Judiciary Committee, of which the distinguished Senator from Missouri is a member, and some changes of an important character were made in it, the word "substantially" was not touched. The House bill and the bill as reported by the Senate committee alike forbade intercorporate stockholdings and holding companies "where the effect of such acquisition is to eliminate or substantially lessen competition." The crying evil in the word "substantially" was not sufficiently audible when the bill was in the Judiciary Committee to address itself to him. I violate no confidence when I say he was not moved to action there. Moreover, though the Senator was untiring in his efforts to perfect the bill when it was before the Senate—and I credit him with the most patriotic purpose, however he may have cast suspicion on those who differ with him—it never occurred to him that there was danger lurking in "substantially." The word went out on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], and without argument; and it went out without argument because there is not enough in the word to provoke argument.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator mean to say that in the committee I did not object to the word "substantially"? Does he mean to say that in the committee I did not insist particularly, with reference to that word, that it should not be used in the section dealing with interlocking directorates and the ownership by one corporation of the stock of another? Does he mean to say that I did not insist there and here that the practice of one corporation owning the stock of another should be entirely stopped?

Mr. WALSH. Oh, no; I do not mean to say anything of that kind. The Senator was with me upon the proposition of condemning holding companies. I said, as did the Senator, that there is no occasion in the industrial world for a holding company. We were beaten on it. What I do say is that the Senator did not, either on the floor or in the Judiciary Committee, move to strike out "substantially." That motion came from the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS].

Mr. REED. I want to say to the Senator that his recollection——

Mr. WALSH. Of course, in speaking about the Judiciary Committee I speak solely from recollection, but it is quite definite with respect to that matter.

Mr. REED. The Senator's recollection is erroneous. Whether there was a motion made or not, I have a distinct recollection of opposing the interjection of the word "substantially" as a qualifying phrase into this legislation.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, let me see if I can refresh the Senator's recollection.

Mr. REED. Just a minute. Now, there were many things discussed there as to which no formal motions were made, because it was found to be useless to make them; but that I have opposed the word "substantially" being in this bill from the first can hardly be disputed by men who are familiar with the facts. I do not think it is very important in this discussion, however.

Mr. OVERMAN. If the Senator will recollect, his fight was not to strike out the word "substantially," but to strike out the word "eliminate," which was done.

Mr. REED. I remember making a fight to strike out the word "eliminate."

Mr. WALSH. The word "eliminate" went out.

Mr. REED. I also know that I have been opposed to the word "substantially" being in there, and the Senator will remember that I was opposed generally to these qualifying clauses. I wanted to prohibit the act itself. Will not the Senator do me the justice of saying that that was my position?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not doubt that that was the Senator's position; but, as far as the word "substantially" was concerned. I do not think the Senator made any point about that. I think it was the word "eliminate," which was stricken out.

Mr. REED. Oh, yes; that was one of the words. As I say, it was not very important in this discussion.

Mr. WALSH. It went out without argument, because there is not enough in the word to provoke argument. If it were out, the language would receive the same construction, because no court would find that competition was lessened unless it was "substantially" lessened. The Sherman Act denounces all combinations in restraint of commerce, but no combination falls under the ban of the statute unless commerce is restrained to a "substantial" extent. De minimis non curat lex. How much reason there is to dread disastrous results from such a construction is exhibited by the decision in the Union Pacific-Southern Pacific case, in which the traffic affected by the combination amounted only to eighty-eight one-hundredths of 1 per cent of the total tonnage of the Southern Pacific. Yet the court held that the restraint of trade was substantial enough to bring the combination under the condemnation of the law.

The bill is not in all respects as I should like to see it. It is a matter of regret to me that the House conferees did not insist on the provision of the bill as it was framed in that body, making judgments against unlawful combinations fixing their character as such, conclusive evidence of the facts adjudicated, in actions for damages brought by private parties against the outlawed organization under the Sherman Act. The Senator from Missouri was against me in my efforts to defeat the amendment proposed by the committee, making the judgment prima facie evidence only. In justice to him and to the committee it should be said that they inclined to the view that Congress is without power to give such a judgment a conclusive character in what may be called the subsidiary action. I have heard no argument, not even from the Senator from Missouri, that has shaken me in my view that such a statute is not beyond the power of Congress. I endeavored to keep in the bill the House provision, but the Senate determined otherwise, and in the debate expressed the view, which I still entertain, that the provision is of very little practical importance as it was adopted by the Senate, merely changing the burden of proof from the plaintiff to the defendant.

A very gross misapprehension has found lodgment in some minds in connection with this section. Why should not one who sues the Standard Oil Co. have the benefit of the testimony taken by the Government in that suit, is asked. There is no reason why he should not, but nothing in the bill in any of its forms gives the right to use the testimony taken in the Government action. Under the bill as it left the Senate one suing a corporation adjudged to exist in violation of the Sherman Act, or to be guilty of practices denounced by it, may introduce the judgment pronounced against it; not the testimony, but the judgment. The defendant is then at liberty to introduce its evidence. It may call the same witnesses or it may call witnesses other than those used in the Government suit. The plaintiff may then introduce his proof, if, indeed, he is not required, at the risk of being shut out altogether, to supplement his prima facie case in the first instance by such evidence as he can command. But he must call the witnesses; he can not introduce the evidence taken in the Government case. Then the whole matter is submitted upon the new as well as the old evidence to the court or jury, the side on which is the preponderance prevailing. The value of the rule established by the bill is so inconsequential from the standpoint of a trial lawyer who has actually handled cases of a like character as to be negligible. I see no reason why judgments rendered heretofore as well as those rendered hereafter should not be included within the provision. I voted for the amendment to so extend its operation offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], but the right granted is so shadowy in character, whether it is granted in connection with all judgments or only those hereafter rendered, that I shall not vote to reject the report to have the change made. Were it not for the character of the attack made by the Senator from Missouri I might be disposed to vote, in effect, to recommit that this and other important changes might be made on further reflection. But inasmuch as the rejection of the report may be interpreted as an indorsement of the wholesale charges made by him, I shall not indulge my disposition in that regard.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I take it that the Senator, then, is going to vote for a bad bill because I made a bad speech?

Mr. WALSH. No.

Mr. REED. That is the logic of his remarks.

Mr. WALSH. I am going to vote for a bill which might have been made better were it not for the speech of the Senator.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, my speech has not tied the hands of Congress. It has not stopped the highways of virtue. Those who bear the white banners of perfection can still march along unobstructed. Their sensibilities may have been wounded, but they ought not to do evil because I have offended against what they deem correct.

Mr. WALSH. Much is made of the provision taking consent judgments out from the operation of the section. Applying the rule to the case of judgments heretofore rendered, there is a measure of justice in the contention that the stipulation for judgment was signed in view of the law as it was and the consequences which it attached to the act at the time it was entered into and that it should not be given a significance by later legislation that it did not bear when the contract—for so it may be referred to—upon which the judgment was founded was made. But my acquiescence rests upon an entirely different basis.

As illustrative of the spirit in which this measure, and particularly the report of the conferees, has been canvassed by the Senator from Missouri, I quote from his speech the following:

> Why, I say, should a tobacco dealer in any State of the Union who believes he has been robbed and despoiled by the practices of the Tobacco Trust and who desires to bring a suit for treble damages be compelled to travel up and down the earth to produce the same witnesses and bring forward the identical evidence that has already been gathered by the Government, preserved in bills of exception, approved by the final decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, and solemnly crystallized into a degree by that great court? Why this tenderness for the Tobacco Trust? Why deal so gently and so kindly with these concerns that have ridden roughshod over the law; that have defied the courts for an entire lifetime?

Section 4 as it was reported by the Judiciary Committee was the work of a subcommittee of which the Senator from Missouri was a member. It underwent no change in the Senate except that its provisions were made applicable to past judgments as well as those rendered in the future. The Senator knows—he is too good a lawyer not to know—that neither under the section as he drew it nor as it passed the Senate will it be possible to introduce, in the private action, the evidence taken in the Government suits. It is the judgment only that is admissible, not the evidence upon which it was founded. The law should provide that the evidence may be admitted; but the Senator is himself responsible, not the conferees, for the bill in that respect is as he himself drafted it.

Mr. REED. May I inquire at what time the Senator offered a motion, either in the Senate or in the committee, to include the evidence?

Mr. WALSH. I offered none.

Mr. REED. And at what time did he call the attention of either the Senate or the committee to the construction he now places upon the bill—that the evidence can not be used when preserved in bills of exception?

Mr. WALSH. I offered none. The matter never was debated, never was considered. It never occurred to the Senator from Missouri. It never occurred to me. It never occurred to the eminent lawyer who is the chairman of the committee. Why, now, should the conferees be denounced for doing something or omitting to do something of which we are all guilty, if anybody is guilty?

Mr. REED. The conferees have not been denounced, but their work has been criticized because they cut the country off from the benefit of the decisions that heretofore have been rendered in some 86 cases, and practically cut them off from the benefit of any decisions which may be rendered in any of the 46 pending cases. That has been the burden of my criticism so far as the claim that the evidence can be used is concerned.

Mr. WALSH. I have read from the RECORD the language of the Senator, who complains that they have so framed the bill that the evidence can not be used.

Mr. REED. The Senator has read a small excerpt from what I said. I undertake to say now that I can demonstrate, and will undertake to demonstrate, that in all substantial respects the benefit of this evidence could have been obtained if this bill had not been emasculated by limiting it to judgments hereafter rendered.

Mr. WALSH. As the bill passed the Senate, one damaged by the acts charged against a combination against which a consent judgment was entered would be at liberty to introduce it in his cause. What then? Then the defendant would be at liberty to introduce all the evidence which it would have introduced had the Government's case been tried. The plaintiff must then offer testimony to controvert the defendant's case. Now, what good to him is the presumption arising from the consent judgment. Simply that it balances the scale in his favor should it so chance that it hangs even. I shall not try to send the report back under the circumstances attending this debate, because of a change of so little practical importance.

For years powerful agencies have been at work to intercept legislation, in character like the important provisions of this bill, touching the rights of labor. The Senator from Missouri rendered the country a signal service in exposing through the instrumentality of the lobby committee the pestiferous character of the means employed and the despicable character of the agents through which the enemies of the legislation acted. I am willing to accept some imperfections in this bill in view of the relief it brings to those who for 20 years have suffered from "hope deferred that maketh the heart sick."

There is, as stated, no need to burden and hamper legitimate business by added penalties in this bill in order to reach either the class of offenders or the practices so unsparingly and so justly denounced by the Senator from Missouri. If he were the Attorney General of the United States, he could feed fat his appetite for criminal prosecutions by proceeding against the notorious offenders against the Sherman law guilty of the practices against which he inveighs. He could glut his vengeance and the just anger of a long-suffering people against the oppressors of industry operating through local price cutting and villainous tying contracts by indicting them, in the language of the Sherman Act, for an "attempt to monopolize" even a "part of the trade or commerce among the several States."

He could see as many victims of outraged law through the barred doors of the prison whether the acts were made penal by one statute or by two.

But, Mr. President, he might see less with two. When two of twenty or more practices, more or less pursued, all in contravention of the existing law, all punishable by its terms, are singled out and declared to be criminal, it is at least debatable whether all other practices similar in character are not impliedly declared not to be criminal. And the argument would gain strength if the new statute imposed identically the same penalties as did the old law, as the House bill did.

Espionage is a method of unfair competition, a reprehensible trade practice, condemned by an enlightened public sentiment, no less than local price-cutting or tying contracts. Does the Senator from Missouri not feel that if one were indicted under the Sherman Act for breaking or endeavoring to break a rival by introducing spies into his counting house and robbing him of his business secrets or getting possession of information concerning the methods that brought him success, does not the Senator feel that the success of the prosecution would be imperiled by a law which specifically made local price-cutting and tying contracts criminal and said nothing about espionage?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if that is true, if that argument is sound, then by naming the four practices that are named in this bill and denouncing them, we have absolutely limited the meaning of the term "unfair competition," and the jurisdiction of the Trade Commission to the four practices thus denounced. Moreover, if the argument be a legitimate one, as it deals with the question of trusts and trust practices, it might be argued just as well that to that extent it had altered and changed the Sherman Act; and I think there is some danger that that has been done.

Mr. WALSH. I am very much afraid that the argument will be made that because we denounce two specific kinds of unfair practices and that those are the only kind condemned we tolerate all others. I do not think it can be effectively made, but I say it was dangerous to attempt to define these particular varieties of unfair competition in this statute. It should have been left as the Senate put it in the first place, absolutely outside of this statute, to be controlled and governed by the general denunciation in the Trade Commission act of all unfair practices in trade.

Mr. REED. Then there are three additional reasons that the Senator ought to announce why the report of the conference ought to be rejected. But I suppose because I made a very bad and a very wicked speech he will, of course, swallow the wickedness of the bill without even a regret.

Mr. WALSH. Would it not be a powerful argument to say that though all forms of "unfair competition" were once criminal under the Sherman law Congress expressed the view that the two forms mentioned should be thereafter of that character, and that none others not specifically denounced by some statute should? Expressio unius est exclusio alterius. Where, then, would stand the other protean forms of unfair competition? What could be done in the way of a criminal prosecution with bogus independent companies? With fighting ships and brands? With oppression through banking connections? With exclusive sales and purchase contracts? I am glad to comfort my friend the Senator from New Jersey with the assurance that all those who oppress their competitors through these nefarious practices now make themselves amenable to the criminal law. The bill before us expressly provides that they can claim no exoneration by reason of any order of the Trade Commission. The law is weakened—not strengthened—by singling out specific practices and making them criminal.

This bill could have been returned to the committee for further correction, I should gladly myself have voted to return it in the hope that, after discussion and debate touching features that could not or did not engage the attention of the Senate when the measure was before it and open to amendment, some of its provisions not altogether to my liking might be changed. Several of them have been adverted to in the course of these remarks. But the issue has been made up by the character of the attack of the Senator from Missouri. Whatever may be the private reasons controlling the action of any Senator, the rejection of the report will be interpreted by the country as an indorsement of his attitude and a recognition that the sinister powers against which he has so impassionately inveighed were not without influence in shaping the legislation. I am not willing to give countenance by my vote to any such idea, and trust the report may have the well-nigh unanimous support of this side of the Chamber at least.

APPENDIX.

SHALL THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY KEEP FAITH?

If the Democratic Party in Congress passes the Clayton bill in the form in which it has been reported from conference it will violate its specific promise and betray the trust reposed in it by the people when the present administration and congressional majority were elected.

The Democratic Party specifically promised to pass legislation which would destroy the power of the trusts to monopolize or control business.

On this issue as much as on that of the tariff it made its campaign.

The Clayton antitrust bill is the proposed fulfillment of this promise.

It will not do the work if it passes as now before the Senate from the conference committee.

During the framing of the bill and its passage through both Houses the usual influences were at work to make the bill formidable only in its aspect, but impotent in its actual power.

Every effort possible was made to make the bill a "glittering generality" which would practically permit the trusts to continue undisturbed.

As the bill passed the House it was powerless to destroy trust monopoly.

But when it reached the Senate it was attacked for its fatal defects by Senator REED and others, and who made such a fight that it was amended so that penalties for its violation were made specific and mandatory, and interlocking directorates and holding companies were specifically forbidden.

That the defenders of the trusts were able to do more with the House than with the Senate was a reversal of form. In the past the Senate has been the very home of the defenders of monopoly and special interests.

It was there the Democratic Party's pledge to the people was expected to be broken, not in the House; but the House broke it, unrebuked by the administration, if not approved by it, and but for the determined fight made by Senator REED and associates the Senate would have approved the betrayal.

But this fight seems to have been in vain.

In conference the Senate amendments which gave the bill vitality and "teeth," with which it could attack and destroy monopoly, were either amended to make them harmless or dropped.

In this emasculated form it is back in the Senate for approval, and Senator REED is again attacking it with the same vigor as he did when he forced adoption of his amendments.

Should he fail, which is predicted, and the Senate approve the conference report, the bill in its impotent form will go to the President for his signature.

It will then depend upon President Wilson to say whether or not the promises made by the Democratic Party shall be kept.

If the President signs this bill in such a form, what are the people going to do to the Democratic Party when they realize how it has broken its promise to the hope, while pretending to keep it to the ear, and has permitted the trusts to shape the bill to prevent it from doing what the people expect it to do?

There is no such haste in this matter as will excuse any failure to make the bill rock ribbed and water-tight against trust violation of its provisions, or justify the omission of any provision necessary to put an end to monopoly practices.

There is plenty of time to make a proper bill.

If the bill in its present form is passed, President Wilson should veto it and tell Congress plainly to pass a proper one at the next session.

No excuse of haste or imperative need of immediate action can justify such a betrayal of the hopes of the people and the promises of the Democratic Party.

If this bill becomes a law in its present form, more than one Missouri Democratic seat will be vacated in November. Senator REED in making his fight on this bill is really fighting for the honor and the supremacy of the Democratic Party.

Mr. REED obtained the floor.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. REED. I yield.

COTTON SITUATION IN THE SOUTH.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Wednesday, immediately after the noon hour, I will address the Senate on the subject of the cotton situation in the South. I desire to present some views that, if adopted, will, in my opinion, clear up the situation and bring the relief sought.

In order that Senators may not be disappointed I will say now that there is nothing new or novel in the plan I desire to submit. It is as old as panics and threatened disasters in financial affairs. It is simple, conservative, and financially sound. I hope the Senators will do me the honor to listen. I believe that I will be able to interest them.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, executive clerk, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts:

On October 3, 1914:

S. 1930. An act granting to the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Co. a right of way through the Fort Wingate Military Reservation, N. Mex., and for other purposes; and

S. 3550. An act ratifying the establishment of the boundary line between the States of Connecticut and Massachusetts.

On October 5, 1914:

S. 657. An act to authorize the reservation of public lands for country parks and community centers within reclamation projects, and for other purposes.

PROPOSED ANTITRUST LEGISLATION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, in my entire life I have not been more greatly surprised than by the speech which the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has this moment concluded. The speech was in the nature of a personal attack. He did not attempt to reply to my argument; neither did he seek to show that I had erroneously stated the facts.

He did, however, undertake, both by direction and by innuendo, to convince the Senate that the speech I made a few days ago in support of a motion to recommit this bill was inspired by some evil purpose.

The Senator is one of the last men whom I should have expected to ascribe such motives to me. He appears to be suffering an attack of irritation occasioned by my opposition to certain features of the bill with which he has been intimately connected. I discussed these various propositions upon their merits. My argument was entirely impersonal. I attacked the principles, not their authors.

Those who live by the sword should not be so sensitive at a little bloodletting. The Senator himself handles his rapier with great skill, many graceful flourishes, and dramatic poses. All of which catch the eye, please the fancy, and are calculated to convince the observer that the performance is a mere exhibition. Nevertheless, he is a somewhat merciless antagonist. I know of no man who can more thoroughly get on one side of a case and stay there than the Senator from Montana. Upon such an occasion his ordinarily clear vision is completely obscured in a cloud of prejudice. He translates an attack upon a law into a personal assault. He allows his animosities to control his conduct. There could be no better illustration of this fact than is afforded by the statement of the Senator to which I am about to refer.

Mr. President, long ago the doctrine "Let us do evil that good may come" was condemned. To-day the Senator from Montana accentuates the ancient heresy by exclaiming, "Let us do evil because a poor speech has been made." He is irritated by the overwhelming demonstration that this bill is violative of Democratic principles. He is forced to admit the justice of the criticisms. He concedes that the bill is bad in many particulars. He states that he intended to vote to recommit it; but, now that I have made a speech he does not admire, he intends to vote for the bill. He does not claim that anything I said convinced him his opinions were wrong. He is simply irritated. The people therefore should be made to suffer. His logic is that because I made what he considers a bad speech he proposes to cast what he knows is a bad vote.

Mr. President, if this were a personal controversy between him and me, he might be excused for the unwisdom of biting off his own nose to spite his face. He perhaps might justify himself for permitting an envenomed spirit to control a calm judgment. He might be pardoned for doing something injurious to himself in order to punish me individually.

But, sir, this is not a personal controversy between the Senator from Montana and the Senator from Missouri. The question under discussion concerns neither of us personally. The legislation we are about to enact affects 90,000,000 people. It bears directly upon their welfare. If I were the most arrant knave unhung, no act or speech of mine could justify a betrayal of the high commission placed in the hands of Senators by the people who sent them here to legislate for this great country. I am unembarrassed by the criticism of any Senator who admits his course is controlled by such a motive.

The Senator states that I have given the country a wrong impression of this bill. The country is not dependent upon me for a construction. In every community of the United States there are numerous people who keep track of legislation. These myriad minds, by their own processes of independent reasoning, arrive at conclusions regardless of any man's speech.

I propose, however, just for the sake of correct history, to follow the Senator briefly through his manuscript deliverance.

The Senator, in effect, states that by opposing this bill I attacked the President of the United States. That assertion, of course, implies that the President is the responsible author of this legislation, that I knew the fact, and was actuated by a desire to embarrass the President.

Sir, things have come to a strange pass when a Senator cannot express his opinion with reference to pending legislation without subjecting himself to a charge of attacking the President. Even if the President had written the bill with his own hand and sent it to Congress, it would, nevertheless, not follow that a Senator who in the discharge of his sworn duty opposed the bill could be justly charged with attacking the President. To claim that opposition to a bill is for such a reason improper is to declare that Congress should abdicate its high duties and that the Senate of the United States and the House of Representatives should become nothing more than boards of registrars authorized to record decrees of a monarch. The establishment of such a doctrine would destroy the American Republic. It would shake the temple of liberty to its foundation. Whoever asserts the President seeks to thus usurp the powers of Congress brings against him an indictment that I utterly repudiate. Such a one gravely attacks the President.

But, sir, who has the authority to assert this is the President's bill or to say that the President demands the passage of this bill without amendment? Where is his mouthpiece and spokesman who will now and here assume to speak for the President?

If I know anything about the law of the land, the President should communicate his wishes either in person upon the floor of Congress or by written messages duly transmitted to Congress. I do not pretend to speak for the President. I know of no man authorized so to do, although frequently some assume that right.

Mr. President, I not only affirm that no man has the right to assume or assert that this is the President's bill, but I assert that the bill is utterly inconsistent with the messages and public declarations of the President. In the weak and apparently offensive argument I delivered against the conference report, I quoted somewhat from the President's utterances. I propose now to further show that the bill as reported by the conferees flouts the recommendations of the President. If I shall so demonstrate, I ought to go acquit of the charge just made that I have assailed the administration.

When did we adopt the doctrine that insistence upon the redemption of party pledges constitutes party perfidy? The only permanent injury the Democratic Party may receive is at the hands of a traitor, who betrays it. The soldier who calls upon all to defend the citadel, who helps to keep the guns manned and shotted, is a patriot. The only enemy to fear is the traitor who, loudly vowing his fidelity to the cause of Democracy, seeks to betray us into the hands of our ancient foe.

There are here a few men who appear to imagine they constitute the Democratic Party. Whoever opposes them is, in their views, an enemy of Democracy. Let me remind these modest individuals that the Democratic Party is composed of some 7,000,000 sovereign voters of the United States. This vast army of the people is devoted to the cause of human liberty. It is held together by a common belief in certain great principles of government. These principles the Democracy of the Nation has hitherto enunciated in party platforms adopted by conventions composed of delegates authorized to act for the entire body of the Democracy. This vast multitude constitutes the Democracy; not the half dozen men who in this body pose as the Democratic Party and arrogate to themselves the right to overrule party platforms and to denounce all those who do not submit to their dictation. As winter's snows vanish before the springtime sun, so will these self-anointed leaders in due course of nature disappear; and when they go, the Democracy will suffer no greater convulsion than does the ocean when a drop of water is withdrawn from its illimitable hoard. The principles of the Democratic Party will live as long as men love the name liberty. When I stand upon Democratic platforms and demand that this bill be made to accord with the articles of our public creed. I, sir, am not attacking the Democratic Party; I am defending it.

In all that I may do, I will not be controlled by any consideration save the desire to serve my country. I can not follow the example of the Senator from Montana, who proposes to vote for a bad bill because he did not like my speech. Truly, this is a noble philosophy. If it is to be followed, then hereafter we shall not cast our votes according to the merits of matters, but as the pique, disappointment, or irritation of the moment shall dictate.

My contention is that the bill ought to be sent back to conference with instructions to reinsert the criminal penalties, and to strike out the conference amendments which have destroyed the force of this so-called antitrust legislation.

I assert that in demanding that those who control great business institutions shall be held to a personal responsibility, and that oppressive and dishonest practices shall be punished by fine and imprisonment, I am standing squarely upon the Democratic platform. I further assert that I am in strict accordance with the public declarations of the President, including his special message to Congress on January 20, 1914. I propose to discuss these two propositions in their order.

There is not a word in the Democratic literature of recent years which does not clearly demand the application of criminal penalties.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, before the Senator starts in on that I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VARDAMAN in the chair). The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Borah	Johnson	Overman	Smith, S. C.
Bryan	Jones	Owen	Smoot
Burton	Kern	Page	Sterling
Camden	Lane	Penrose	Swanson
Chamberlain	Lea, Tenn.	Perkins	Thomas
Chilton	Lee, Md.	Poindexter	Thompson
Clapp	McLean	Reed	Thornton
Culberson	Martine, N. J.	Root	Vardaman
Fletcher	Myers	Saulsbury	Walsh
Gore	Nelson	Shafroth	Warren
Gronna	Norris	Sheppard	West
Hollis	O'Gorman	Shively	White
James	Oliver	Smith, Ariz.	Williams

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Fifty-two Senators have responded to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, to present with some order this proposition I solicit attention to a clause of the Baltimore platform, which I maintain, notwithstanding the construction of my very good friend from Montana [Mr. WALSH], does demand that the existing antitrust laws shall be strengthened by supplemental legislation, and does demand the application of criminal penalties to those who violate such supplemental legislation. The platform reads:

> A private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable. We therefore favor the vigorous enforcement of the criminal as well as the civil law against trusts and trust officials, and demand the enactment of such additional legislation as may be necessary to make it impossible for a private monopoly to exist in the United States.

There is a distinct demand for additional trust legislation; there is a distinct demand for the enforcement of its criminal as well as of its civil provisions. Only a lawyer accustomed through long years to find flaws in indictments or to construe a section of a law so that a criminal whom it was intended to catch can escape would, I think, claim that the spirit of that declaration is not a pledge to amend the existing trust laws and to apply criminal penalties to such amendments. In the same section of the platform is this:

> We favor the declaration by law of the conditions upon which corporations shall be permitted to engage in interstate trade, including, among others, the prevention of holding companies, of interlocking directors, of stock watering, of discrimination in price, and the control by any one corporation of so large a proportion of any industry as to make it a menace to competitive conditions.
> We condemn the action of the Republican administration in compromising with the Standard Oil Co. and the Tobacco Trust and its failure to—

To do what?—

> to invoke the criminal provisions of the antitrust law against the officers of those corporations after the court had declared that from the undisputed facts in the record they had violated the criminal provisions of the law.

Then follows this criticism of the Supreme Court:

> We regret that the Sherman antitrust law has received a judicial construction depriving it of much of its efficacy, and we favor the enactment of legislation which will restore to the statute the strength of which it has been deprived by such interpretation.

Mr. President, we were dealing with the subject of the anti trust law, demanding amendments to it. We specified some four or five practices that were to be expressly inhibited and demanded criminal penalties. Any attempt to evade that construction requires a species of special pleading inconsistent with candor.

But, Mr. President, that platform early received a construction by a very eminent man. I refer to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], who presided over the Baltimore convention. Senator JAMES was made the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to notify Mr. Wilson of his nomination.

In his speech of notification Senator JAMES, in part, said:

> We all recognize the mighty task in front of you. Sixteen years of Republican rule have riveted the chains of monopoly, special privilege, and greed upon every field of industrial and commercial endeavor, upon every market place, upon every avenue of trade. Trust and monopoly walk with arrogant and brutal tread, fixing with equal insolence and oppression the market of the buyer and the seller. The Republican Party has taught the trusts that it only barks and never bites. Their prosecutions against these outlaws are but a signal to play a rising market, to drive higher the value of the stocks they own, to increase the prices of articles they sell, and to grant greater dividends to those who are interested in them. The people call for a President—and they believe they have found him in you—who will not alone proceed in chancery against these men who defy the laws, who oppress the people, who drive men, women, and children to desperation by reason of hunger, who deny them the necessaries of life by their monopolistic prices, but one who will demand that the stripes of the felon shall be placed upon them and who will give a vigorous and genuine democratic people's-rule enforcement to the criminal laws against malefactors of great wealth.

There is nothing said there about specifying acts as illegal and adding no penalty; nothing there about providing an easier and gentler method of dealing with law violators. As the great Senator from Kentucky towered above that audience, he thundered the demand for criminal penalties for those who oppress and plunder the people.

A little farther on Mr. JAMES said:

> What the people want, what they demand, is a President who will enforce the law to the utmost letter and prosecute all trusts; not one who is friendly with some and unfriendly with others, but a President friendly to the people and friendly to the law, and unfriendly to no legitimate business, one who will draw the sword of justice and law against all monopolies.

That is not a mewling utterance.

Mr. BORAH. It would be appropriate, in view of that deliverance, to put in here the fulfillment with reference to punishment.

Mr. REED. Very well. There will be a more appropriate occasion hereafter, but I yield now to my friend.

Mr. BORAH. Section 2 of the conference report provides:

> SEC. 2. That it shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, either directly or indirectly, to discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities, which commodities are sold for use, consumption, or resale within the United States or any Territory thereof or the District of Columbia or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States, where the effect of such discrimination may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce.

And then the enforcement of it is turned over to the Trade Commission, which has no power at all to impose punishment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, after that great speech was delivered, not for the benefit of the President but as a proclamation to all the land, the President responded. You will find that portion of his remarks to which I now refer on page 349 of the same Democratic Handbook. As I read it, ask yourselves whether this legislation was intended to deal with trusts, monopolies, and restraints of trade or whether with the little fellow at the crossroads, as my friend from Montana would have us believe. Let us determine the purpose of this legislation out of the mouth of the President—may I not be permitted to quote him without being charged with attacking the Democratic Party?

> The general terms of the present Federal antitrust law, forbidding "combinations in restraint of trade," have apparently proved ineffectual.

Thus said the President immediately after the convention, and thus I think he says now. I read on:

> Trusts have grown up under its ban very luxuriantly, and have pursued the methods by which so many of them have established virtual monopolies without serious let or hindrance. It has roared against them like any sucking dove. I am not assessing the responsibility; I am merely stating the fact. But the means and methods by which trusts have established monopolies have now become known. It will be necessary to supplement the present law with—

What? A trade commission? Ah, no—

> It will be necessary to supplement the present law with such laws, both civil and criminal, as will effectually punish and prevent—

What? The monopoly itself, the trust itself, the restraint of trade itself, now within the purview of the present law? Ah, no—

> It will be necessary to supplement the present law with such laws, both civil and criminal, as will effectually punish and prevent those methods, adding such other laws as may be necessary to provide suitable and adequate judicial processes, whether civil or criminal, to disclose them and follow them to final verdict and judgment. They must be specifically and directly met by law as they develop.

With that statement before him, will the Senator from Montana or any other have the temerity to say that this legislation was intended to reach only the practices of small concerns, that we did not promise to deal with the practices of trusts, that we did not propose to add to the trust statutes, that we are not pledged to proceed by fine and imprisonment? The man who so asserts is deaf to argument, blind to evidence, and either unwilling to be convinced or incapable of conviction.

A flood of light is thrown upon the statement of the President in accepting the nomination, which I have just read, by the utterance of Mr. Wilson before the American Bar Association at Chattanooga, Tenn., August 30 to September 1, 1910. No fair man can read this address and thereafter maintain that Mr. Wilson was not thoroughly committed to the doctrine of personal guilt and to the policy of the suppression of oppressive trade practices by the application of criminal penalties. In part, he said:

Corporations do not do wrong. Individuals do wrong, the individuals who direct and use them for selfish and illegitimate purposes, to the injury of society and the serious curtailment of private rights. Guilt, as has been very truly said, is always personal. You can not punish corporations. Fines fall upon the wrong persons, more heavily upon the innocent than upon the guilty as much upon those who knew nothing whatever of the transactions for which the fine is imposed as upon those who originated and carried them through—upon the stockholders and the customers rather than upon the men who direct the policy of the business.

Society can not afford to have individuals wield the power of thousands without personal responsibility. It can not afford to let its strongest men be the only men who are inaccessible to the law. Modern democratic society, in particular, can not afford to constitute its economic undertakings upon the monarchical or aristocratic principle, and adopt the fiction that the kings and great men thus set up can do no wrong which will make them personally amenable to the law which restrains smaller men; that their kingdom, not themselves, must suffer for their blindness, their follies, and their transgressions of right.

* * * * * * *

We can have corporations, can retain them in unimpaired efficiency, without depriving law of its ancient searching efficacy, its inexorable mandate that men, not societies, must suffer for wrongs done.

* * * * * * *

The major premise of all law is moral responsibility, the moral responsibility of individuals for their acts and conspiracies; and no other foundation can any man lay upon which a stable fabric of equitable justice can be reared.

* * * * * * *

The managers of corporations themselves always know the men who originated the acts charged against them as done in contravention of the law; is there no means by which their names may be disclosed to the officers of justice? Every act, every policy in the conduct of the affairs of a corporation, originates with some particular officer, committee, or board. The officer, the committee, or the board which orders an act or originates a policy contrary to the law of the land or intended to neutralize or contravene it, is an insurgent against society; the man or men who originate any such act or policy should be punished, and them alone.

* * * * * * *

You will say that in many instances it is not fair to pick out for punishment the particular officer who ordered a thing done, because he really had no freedom in the matter; that he is himself under orders, exercises no individual liberty of choice, is a dummy manipulated from without.

* * * * * * *

I reply that society should permit no man to carry out orders which are against law and public policy, and that if you will but put one or two conspicuous dummies in the penitentiary there will be no more dummies for hire. You can stop the traffic in dummies, and then, when the idea has taken root in the corporate mind that dummies will be confiscated, pardon the one or two innocent men who may happen to have got into jail. There will not be many, and the custom of the trade will change.

On January 20 the President delivered a special message to Congress, in which he specifically dealt with the question of supplemental trust legislation. In that message he said:

We are all agreed that "private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable and our program is founded upon that conviction. It will be comprehensive, but not a radial and unacceptable program, and these are its items, the changes which opinion deliberately sanctions and for which business waits.

He then specifies the prohibition of interlocking directorates, the overcapitalization of railways, and adds:

The business of the country awaits, has long awaited and suffered because it could not obtain further and more explicit legislative definition of the policy and meaning of the existing antitrust law. * * * Surely we are sufficiently familiar with the actual processes and methods of monopoly and of the many hurtful restraints of trade to make definition possible, at any rate, up to the limits of what experience has disclosed. These practices, being now abundantly disclosed, can be explicitly and item by item forbidden by statute in such terms as will practically eliminate uncertainty, the law itself and the penalty being made equally plain.

He then speaks of a commission, but the plain intendment of the message is that the commission is to gather information and to act merely as a corrective agency. He then adds:

I hope that we shall all agree in giving private individuals who claim to have been injured by these processes the right to found their suits for redress upon the facts and judgment proved and entered in suits by the Government where the Government has upon its own initiative sued the companies complained of and won its suit, and that the statute of limitations shall be suffered to run against such litigants only from the date of the conclusion of the Government's action. It is not fair that the private litigant should be obliged to set up and again establish the facts which the Government has proven. He can not afford, he has not the power to make use of, such processes of inquiry as the Government has command of.

I call especial attention to the language "and the penalty being made equally plain." Was he talking about penal statutes when he used the term "penalty"? Was he talking, as my friend from Montana would have you believe, simply of little practices by little men when he went on to say, as I have read, that the practices of trusts and monopolies are now well known and should be specifically defined? Let those who seek to find an opening through that language of the President resort as much as they may to sophistry, they will convince no practical mind that the President was not talking about trusts and monopolies and their practices and demanding criminal penalties. They will not convince the public mind that the President was not demanding that the trust laws should be amended, strengthened, and made specific.

The Senator from Montana would have you believe that we were trying to do nothing but reach the little fellow and stop him from cutting prices in some neighborhood, thus injuring some other little fellow. The Government of the United States has no time to hunt for minnows in an ocean teeming with sharks; we engage in no such trifling, inconsequential, and ridiculous performance as that. Let the Senator consider his maxim, "De minimis non curat lex," in this behalf. It was not in the mind of the House of Representatives, nor in the minds of those who framed our platform.

What has the committee itself to say with reference to this message? The committee of the House, by the way, wrote so admirable a report that the Judiciary Committee of the Senate simply added a few prefatory words and adopted as its own the House report. Thus, said the committee of the House with reference to the President's message:

Your committee, after the delivery of a message by the President of the United States, on January 20 last to the Congress, making certain recommendations—

Relating to what? Relating to certain unfair practices? No—

Relating to the matter of trusts and monopolies, immediately prepared and published tentative bills which were designed to give legislative expression to the views contained in the President's message. * * * The salient principle of the tentative bills as finally agreed upon with additional provisions have been embodied in the one comprehensive bill now reported.

After some comment the committee adds:

The able and patriotic message of the President has been ever before us and the program which he proposed is contained in the provisions of the bill, and if enacted into law will in truth be "additional articles in our constitution of peace—the peace which is honor and freedom and prosperity."

What were the trust provisions in that bill which the House committee charges directly to the President, to his message, and to his influence?

They were four. The provision prohibiting local price cutting, providing that the guilty party should wear the stripes of a felon; the condemnation of tying contracts, followed by the provision that whoever violated this section should be guilty of a misdemeanor and punished by a fine of not less than $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than one year in the penitentiary, or both, at the discretion of the court; the provision against corporations gaining control of other corporations through stock ownership. Included in which was the inhibition of holding companies, with a penal clause identical with the one which I just recited and the other provisions which I will not now stop to discuss, because it is no longer in the bill. Every one of these sections carried a criminal penalty.

If that bill was drawn in consonance with the message of the President, with the desire of his heart, with the policy in his mind, and had these criminal penalties in it, every section being penal, will some one tell me if I am wrong in my construction of the President's message, namely, that it was intended to provide criminal penalties? Has the President changed his mind since his last message to Congress? Who has warrant for so asserting? I do not believe he has changed his mind. I believe if he had he would send a message here to Congress frankly avowing his altered opinion.

But was the committee dealing with the small concerns and the trifling things, as the Senator from Montana would have us believe? Not at all. Hear the report of the committee of the House. Note whether it deals with the little or with the great thing, whether it deals with legislation to supplement and strengthen our great trust acts or was merely intended to be a pettyfogging performance, touching certain trifles.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VARDAMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator will recognize the fact that when that report was prepared and when the bill was prepared the Trade Commission bill had not passed the Senate and section 5 had not been incorporated in the bill.

Mr. REED. I understand that perfectly; but section 5, when it was passed did not pretend and does not now pretend to affix any criminal penalties. Neither does it define or prohibit specifically the acts of monopoly. If we are pledged by our platform and by the messages of the President to specifically define the acts of monopoly and to penalize them, we can not escape that duty by pleading that the Senate has adopted a law dealing in some measure and to some degree with trade practices, which also fails to penalize the wrongful practices. We can not justify one failure by pleading another. Two wrongs never yet have made a right.

The argument of the Senator attempts to justify the repudiation of our platform and the message of the President upon the ground that we have enacted a law which does not provide criminal penalties. The fact is, as everyone knows, that the Trade Commission could not deal with criminal penalties because it is not a court. When, therefore, we created that body and did not provide criminal penalties in the law of its creation we by no means committed ourselves to a repudiation of the doctrine of personal guilt and responsibility. I assert that the Trade Commission bill and the trust acts can run along their separate and several roads. If this be not true, then by the enactment of the Trade Commission bill we have destroyed all of our antitrust legislation. If the Sherman Act can be enforced through the courts and the commission can at the same time exist and exercise the jurisdiction conferred upon it, then we can by this act strengthen the Sherman Act and enforce this act through the courts and impose criminal penalties, just as we can enforce the Sherman Act with its criminal penalties.

I repeat, to claim otherwise is to assert that the Trade Commission bill has destroyed our power either to enforce the Sherman Act or to amend it. No man dare here assert such a doctrine.

Mr. OVERMAN. I can not tell exactly what occurred, of course, in conference; but if the Trade Commission bill had been a law at the time that report was made I have reason to believe that it would not have been incorporated into the bill, because an entirely different policy was adopted by the Senate from that adopted by the House of Representatives.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have heard that argument in various forms. It embraces this idea—that when we passed the Trade Commission bill we did not intend to pass any other legislation. If it had been asserted here that the Trade Commission bill was to be the end of trust legislation at this session of Congress, it would never have passed, and the Senator knows it. On the contrary, it was during the debate on the Trade Commission bill frequently asserted that the Trade Commission bill was to be the mere handmaid of the trust statutes; that it was not to affect or destroy them; that it was not to hold back other trust legislation. It was iteratively said in reply to those who claimed that the Trade Commission bill was not sufficiently specific or drastic: "Be patient; wait. The Clayton bill is coming on, and the Clayton bill does have penalties. Wait for it and your complaint will be met." Now, when it does come on, you turn to us and say: "Having adopted the Trade Commission bill we now propose to murder the Clayton bill."

Mr. OVERMAN. In confirmation of what I said, I will remind the Senator that in the great speech made here by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] he says:

> In fact, Mr. President, it may be said in justification of the report of the conference committee that it is in harmony, and the committee has undoubtedly sought to bring the bill into harmony, with the general trend of legislation.

Mr. REED. Oh, well, that does not answer my argument, because the Senator from Idaho takes an entirely different view of this legislation than I, and his deductions can not bind me.

Let us stop here for a moment. I was about to read this report, but I will digress. If the Trade Commission bill was intended to be the end of trust legislation, why did we not stop with it? The friends of that bill have asserted that the phrase "unfair competition" covers every practice injurious to business which is conceivable by the brain of man. If that be true, and if we are to proceed through the Trade Commission, then we should never torch that language. We should not pass the trust provisions of this bill. We should admit we have already completely covered that field by providing a commission empowered to suppress all evil practices.

But the Senate did not take that view. The Senate committee undertook to say so. The Senate disagreed with the Senate committee as to one section—that relating to tying contracts—and restored it. Then the conferees put back in the bill the sections of the Clayton bill, thus admitting that the Trade Commission bill did not cover those practices; for if it did cover them, it was utterly foolish again to inveigh against them. Having thus admitted the necessity of specifying these particular practices, they then proceeded to remove the criminal penalties.

You can not hold with the hare and run with the hounds. Driven into a corner you say, "In the first place, we did not need any law at all. We had already covered the subject by legislation." Then, when asked why you legislated, you say, "Well, it won't do any harm to legislate if you do not say anything when you legislate." That is exactly your position. You can not sustain this action on any logical ground. If it be true that these practices were covered by the Trade Commission bill, then that is the end of it. We ought to stop right there. If you say, on the other hand, that they were not covered by the Trade Commission bill, then, when we enact law here, let us have a law that does something, and not a law apologized for on the ground that is it unnecessary.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I want to ask the Senator from Missouri if it is not a fact generally understood that the President gave his approval to the bill as it passed the House, and if it was not a matter of general information also that as it came to the Senate it had the presidential indorsement?

Mr. REED. Of course I have heard numerous statements of that kind. But if that be true, how do you justify the elimination of the criminal provisions which were in the bill when it came to the Senate?

Mr. VARDAMAN. As a matter of fact, I want to interject right here that I do not think it would have ever passed the House if it had not had the approval of the President. I make that suggestion, Mr. President, in justification of the position the Senator has taken on this bill and that others take who agree with him, that the President may have changed his mind; and it is not fair, it is not legitimate argument, it does not manifest the proper spirit, for anybody to say that because a Democratic Senator happens to agree with the House and disagrees with the conference committee he is in antagonism to the President and against the head of the party. I am one of those who believe that even though a Democratic Senator happens to differ from the President on a question of policy or economics he is in no way guilty of treason to the Republic.

Mr. REED. I am obliged to the Senator.

I desire to come back now to the proposition that the House committee, in writing the substantive provisions of the Clayton bill, recognized that they were dealing with the practices of trusts and monopolies, not of the little fellow, as my friend from Montana has sought to claim.

I continue the reading of the report:

> Section 2 of the bill is intended to prevent unfair discriminations. It is expressly designed with the view of correcting and forbidding a common and widespread unfair trade practice whereby certain great corporations and also certain smaller concerns which seek to secure a monopoly in trade and commerce by aping the methods of the great corporations, have heretofore endeavored to destroy competition and render unprofitable the business of competitors by selling their goods, wares, and merchandise at a less price in the particular communities where their rivals are engaged in business than at other places throughout the country.

Then follows a description of the section, which in turn is followed by this language:

> The violation of any of the provisions of this section is made a misdemeanor, and is made punishable by fine or imprisonment, or both.

A little farther on the committee states:

> The necessity for legislation to prevent unfair discriminations in prices with a view of destroying competition needs little argument to sustain the wisdom of it. In the past it has been a most common practice of great and powerful combinations engaged in commerce—notably the Standard Oil Co. and the American Tobacco Co. and others of less notoriety, but of great influence—to lower prices of their commodities, oftentimes below the cost of production in certain communities and sections where they had competition, with the intent to destroy and make unprofitable the business of their competitors, and with the ultimate purpose in view of thereby acquiring a monopoly in the particular locality or section in which the discriminating price is made. Every concern that engages in this evil practice must of necessity recoup its losses in the particular communities or sections where their commodities are sold below cost or without a fair profit by raising the price of this same class of commodities above their fair market value in other sections or communities. Such a system or practice is so manifestly unfair and unjust, not only to competitors who are directly injured thereby but to the general public, that your committee is strongly of the opinion that the present antitrust laws ought to be supplemented by making this particular form of discrimination a specific offense under the law when practiced by those engaged in commerce.

What were you supplementing? The trust laws. For what purpose were you supplementing them? To reach certain evil practices. Who had indulged in these evil practices? The great trusts and the great monopolies. Why did you need any law? Because the present law had not effectively reached these practices. How did you propose to prevent them? By the application of the criminal penalty.

I can lay the one paragraph read down opposite the able apology for this bill delivered with a considerable manifestation of spleen by the Senator from Montana, and it utterly destroys the whole effect of his argument, which was that we ought to have a mild law with no penalties, because we are not dealing with great trusts and corporations, but simply seek to regulate the small man, the corner grocery man, or somebody like that. Such is not the fact. If the country is getting a bad opinion of this bill, it is because the bill is not drawn in accordance with the message of the President, with the pledges of our party, with the declaration of our platform, and with the protestations of the committee that drafted the bill. Were you dealing with little petty larceny concerns? Let me read further:

The necessity for such legislation is shown by the fact that 19 States have enacted laws forbidding this particular form of discrimination within their borders. These State statutes have practically all been enacted in the last few years, and most of them in the years 1911, 1912, and 1913. It is important that these State statutes be supplemented by additional legislation by Congress, for it is now possible for one of these great corporations—

Not the corner grocery, not the shoemaker, not the little fellow my friend from Montana fears, but great corporations— doing business in not only the 48 States but throughout the world to lower the prices of its commodities in a particular State—

Not at one corner in a town, not at the forks of the road in the country, not at one place, but—to lower the prices of its commodities in a particular State and sell within that State at a uniform price in compliance with State laws, and thereby destroy the business of all independent concerns and competitors operating within the State.

Does that mean little concerns, or does it mean an institution that does business over this round earth, that collects its toll under every sun in every clime, and out of the gigantic revenues thus gathered recoups itself for the loss it incurs when it puts down the price of a product in an entire State, thus complying with the laws of the State which prevent a price discrimination, yet crushing out and driving to bankruptcy business concerns in that line of trade in the entire State? Does the Senator from Montana still insist that we are dealing with the almost innocent practices of little concerns? Let me read further:

The loss incurred by such gigantic effort in destroying competition can be more than regained by general increase in the prices of their commodities in other sections. In fact, complaint has been made to your committee that efforts have been made by certain great corporations engaged in commerce in some of the States which have enacted statutes forbidding such discrimination to circumvent the State laws by the methods above described. In seeking to enact section 2 into law we are not dealing with an imaginary evil or against ancient practices long since abandoned, but are attempting to deal with a real, existing, widespread, unfair, and unjust trade practice that ought at once to be prohibited in so far as it is within the power of Congress to deal with the subject. This we think is accomplished by section 2 of this bill.

What says the committee? Powerful combinations now follow this practice; powerful combinations now put down the price of an article in an entire State in order to escape the State statutes which prohibit discrimination; powerful combinations are now destroying rivals in entire States; powerful combinations now are able to collect their tolls around the world, while they starve to death by unfair methods the business of competitors of a vast Commonwealth.

Such is the situation. It is not the trifling affair my friend from Montana sees. The trouble with the Senator is he has reversed the telescope. He thus sees world-wide combinations, giants of the commercial field, transformed into pigmies. Let him turn the instrument around, or, if he chooses, let him look through his own clear eyes, and he will once more behold the vision which inspired him when he thundered from the platform of his State against monopoly and pledged his powerful influence to its extermination. I also entertain the hope that he will conclude that the criminal penalties ought to be put back into this bill, even if he regards my speech as harsh and offensive.

Let me say to the Senator that my lifelong misfortune has been a total inability to employ that polite language of diplomacy to which the ears of the sensitive are attuned. In speaking of a spade, I have never been able to refer to it as "an instrument of agriculture, employed in the cultivation of flowers," nor can I describe a serpent as "a beautiful, glossy creature that glides in graceful sinuosities through the verdant grass." That sort of language is quite outside my talent. I was never able to call the one anything but a spade nor the other anything but a snake. Neither can I discuss a bill denuded of criminal penalties that substitutes the sympathetic administrations of a commission for the verdicts of juries and sentences of courts in the parlor vernacular to which the Senator from Montana is doubtless accustomed.

Mr. President, I have read from the committee's report; I have read from the President's message; I have read from the speech of notification delivered by the eloquent Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]; I have read the President's reply; I have read the report of the committee, all of which sustain my demand that the criminal penalties should be restored.

I might rest my case here; but it does me good at the present moment to transport myself back to those days when from the housetops the prophets of Democracy thundered against the evils of monopoly. Only a few of them can I refer to, but their words come to me like sweet music. I love them as a man adores the scenes of his childhood. I esteem them because they are a part of my faith, a part of the old Democratic creed. I turn to them because they have been our slogan. I have marched to battle with them ringing in my ears. I have seen my party go down to defeat for 5 and 10 and 20 years—aye, since my boyhood—believing that if we contended long enough, if when disaster came we did not despair, but upon the stricken field set up again the old standard, if we really remained steadfast champions of principle, if we were willing to suffer unto the end, some day, in God's kindly providence, the bright sun would shed its glory upon our victorious banners. I fondly dreamed and hoped when that day came I would have the pleasure of writing Democratic laws every sentence of which would be a sword piercing even to the dividing asunder of the soul and body and joints and marrow of the great monopolies that have so long oppressed the common people of this land. So I love to go back and read. Here is an old Democratic handbook. It contains a speech delivered on March 17, 1908, by Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas, who is one of the House conferees on this bill. Mr. FLOYD began by quoting at length from the Democratic platform of 1908, as follows:

TRUSTS AND UNLAWFUL COMBINES.

We recognize that the gigantic trusts and combinations designed to enable capital to secure more than its just share of the joint products of capital and labor, and which have been fostered and promoted under Republican rule, are a menace to beneficial competition and an obstacle to permanent business prosperity.

A private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable.

Individual equality of opportunity and free competition are essential to a healthy and permanent commercial prosperity, and any trust, combination, or monopoly tending to destroy these by controlling production, restricting competition, or fixing prices should be prohibited and punished by law. We especially denounce rebates and discrimination by transportation companies as the most potent agency in promoting and strengthening these unlawful conspiracies against trade.

Said this great Congressman, this conferee:

Now, let us turn to the consideration of practical remedies. In order that we may provide appropriate remedies for any evil, we should first analyze the same and ascertain the nature, character, and extent of such evil. Brushing aside the glow of inflammatory declamation and pyrotechnical denunciation and considering the question in the light of logic and cold facts, this analysis becomes exceedingly plain and simple. The conditions complained of in the President's message and the evils resulting therefrom may all be classed under one general head of "conporate abuses." These corporate abuses may be divided into three general classes, namely: Abuses resulting from law violations, abuses arising from absence of or lack of proper laws of restraint, and evils resulting from bad laws.

I call especial attention to the fact that at that early day this great Democrat, one of the most incisive reasoners of our party, had determined in his own mind that there were trust abuses arising from lack of proper laws. He continues:

First, I desire to call your attention to abuses resulting from violations of existing laws by the directors, agents, and officers of corporations who control their management.

The remedy for this class of evils is to punish offenders for violations of the law. If the penalties now prescribed are not severe enough to restrain the wrongdoers, amend the law and fix heavier penalties. I have no objection to imposing a fine upon the corporation also. This, however, should not be used as a reason or excuse for allowing the guilty agents to go free. Nor have I one particle of sympathy with that sentiment that excuses the subordinate for the violation of law committed in obedience to the commands of his chief or some other high officer of the corporation. I think that every man, however humble his position, ought to be made to understand and know that the mandates of the law of the land are higher than the mandates of any corporation chief, however great his wealth or however powerful his influence.

That is one of the clearest and most logical answers that has ever been made to the claim that when we seek to punish trusts we may inflict a penalty upon some subordinate.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OVERMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I ask the Senator from whom he is reading.

Mr. REED. I am reading from Judge FLOYD, one of the conferees. I continue to read:

I therefore insist that every officer and agent of a corporation, be his position high or low, who willfully violates any of the provisions of existing law, should be made to suffer the penalties prescribed for such offense. A few conspicuous examples of rich men in the penitentiary or in the common prisons would do more to break up this species of evil than a hundred $29,000,000 fines imposed upon the corporations themselves.

"Applause," says the RECORD. It was well that applause should come. It was the response that the hearts of the hearers gave to brave words.

If it was true then that the enforcement of criminal penalties would do more than the levying of a dozen $29.000.000 fines, why should not these evils, which you have denounced as being the practices of great corporations and which you have declared are employed to despoil entire States, be punished to-day in the same way? When did we conclude to lay down the "whip of scorpions" and to begin feeding these institutions with the "milk of babes"?

Mr. President, we had the same Sherman law then we have now, as has been suggested by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN].

Mr. President, I observe that there are at present five Republican and five Democratic Senators in the Chamber. Only one of the conferees has remained to listen. I am not even permitted to talk to the "deaf ears of the adder." The exodus to the cloak room I do not regard as an expression of personal dislike. I take it gentlemen who intend to support the conference report do not enjoy my line of argument. However I shall continue to read some more Democratic doctrine even though I indulge in a solitary soliloquy. Said Mr. FLOYD:

Second, I desire to call your attention——

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. BORAH. Perhaps if the Senator from Missouri began to read from the Republican textbook his associates would come in.

Mr. REED. I do not know what would bring the Republicans in, because it is not the record that any Republican ever waited and listened to me clear through. Of course there are a class of Republicans, a few of them, earnest believers in the doctrine of putting trusts out of business in order that human beings may enter business who can remain, and among that number I class the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. He has a somewhat distinguished record as an advocate of trust elimination, and I might include, I think, all the other Senators on the other side of the Chamber who are now here. I do not observe that the "standpat" portion of the organization is at all in evidence.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SWANSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll and the following Senators answered to their names:

Borah	Kern	Owen	Smith, Md.
Bryan	Lane	Page	Smith, S. C.
Burton	Lea, Tenn.	Penrose	Swanson
Camden	Lee, Md.	Perkins	Thornton
Chamberlain	Martin, Va.	Reed	Vardaman
Chilton	Martine, N. J.	Root	Walsh
Clapp	Myers	Saulsbury	Warren
Culberson	Nelson	Shafroth	White
Fletcher	O'Gorman	Sheppard
Gronna	Overman	Smith, Ariz.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Thirty-eight Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. JOHNSON, Mr. MCCUMBER, and Mr. POINDEXTER answered to their names when called.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I am requested to state that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is detained from the Senate on account of illness.

Mr. SIMMONS, Mr. STERLING, Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. JONES, Mr. GORE, Mr. SHIVELY, Mr. MCLEAN, and Mr. HUGHES entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I must give expression to the regret I feel that the somnolence of the cloakroom was so rudely interrupted by the roll call, and that Senators were unnecessarily inconvenienced by being obliged to make the round trip from the cloakroom to the Senate Chamber and back again. I trust they are again enjoying the sweets of complete repose.

I am about to read further from the remarks of Mr. FLOYD. You will notice that he has discussed the enforcement of existing statutes by criminal penalties, strongly advocating the application of the merciless lash of the law to the backs of the offenders. He proceeds:

Second. I desire to call your attention to corporate abuses arising from the absence of laws on the statute books to properly prohibit and restrain directors, officers, and agents of corporations from doing things which are unfair, unjust, and morally wrong, to the detriment of the public in the organization of and in the conduct and management of their corporate affairs.

The remedy for all such abuses is to enact new laws to prohibit and restrain the wrongdoing, to fix adequate penalties for their violation, and to rigidly enforce such laws against all offenders.

After discussing the tariff a while and the fact that the trusts operated under the tariff law and despoiled the public by monopolistic practices, he adds this:

Such is our exact condition to-day. The American people are ground down, as it were, between two millstones, and the wealth of the Nation is rapidly, rapidly aggregating into the hands of a few. Who can gainsay it? The high tariff keeps out the foreigner; he no longer competes. The trust unites all concerns engaged in any one particular line of industry under one head or management, thus and thereby eliminating domestic or home competition, and in consequence thereof the American laborer, the American farmer, and all the great consuming classes of whatever vocation or calling are compelled to pay for every article of food or raiment of necessity or comfort the arbitrary and extortionate price fixed by the trust.

Mr. President, it is refreshing once more to hear the names of the farmer and the laborer. I wonder if we were to assemble the people of the United States, the farmers and the laborers, and to take a referendum vote upon the one question, Shall the criminal penalties be restored to the Clayton bill or shall they not be restored? what the answer would be. Do any of you Senators doubt what it would be? Not one man out of a hundred would fail to vote for the criminal penalties.

I still entertain the old-fashioned notion that I am here in a representative capacity and that in part I represent the people of my State. I may do so poorly and inefficiently, but I do the best I can. I know that if we had a referendum vote on this proposition to-day there would not be enough votes cast in the State of Missouri against the restoration of the criminal penalties to make it worth while to count them. The people in my section of the country do not change in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye. They have been taught for a quarter of a century the evils of trusts and combinations; they have experienced the evil results. The Democratic Party has been promising them, if it ever obtained control, that it would enact criminal penalties and enforce them, and that it would also enforce those now upon the statute books. So far as I am concerned, the only power on earth that can instruct me to turn my back on that long record of pledges is the people of my own State; let others vote as they see fit.

But I continue to read, as follows:

The Cotton Thread Trust, or that concern which has gained control of all the spool cotton thread manufactured in the United States, last summer sent an agent to Bentonville, Ark., a town in my district of about 3,000 inhabitants, with many thriving merchants who have always competed with each other for business and for trade, to notify all these local merchants to raise the price of spool cotton thread to 6 cents per spool. Some of the merchants had been selling it at 5 cents per spool. One of the most prominent firms in town refused to comply with the demand, claiming the right to sell their goods at any price they saw proper to charge. The trust agent returned to the East, and in a few days this firm received a letter from the headquarters of the trust stating that unless they raised the price of spool cotton thread to 6 cents per spool no more spool cotton thread would be shipped to their firm. Feeling indignant at such treatment, this local firm replied that they had never purchased any goods from the firm making this unreasonable demand upon them; that they purchased all their spool cotton thread from a wholesale house doing business in their own town, and that they would continue to sell cotton thread at 5 cents per spool.

In a few days the wholesale house referred to received a communication from the agent of the trust forbidding them to sell any more spool cotton thread to this recalcitrant firm, and warning them that if they did so no more spool cotton thread would be shipped to the said wholesale house. Yet this is free America under the reign of the trusts.

Proceeding, the learned and eloquent gentleman had this to say:

I tell you that the principal source of these evils is in the system and in the condition of our laws rather than the result of wrongful acts of individual men.

Rockefeller, Rogers, and Harriman will pass like all mortals must pass in this transitory world, but when these imperious Cæsars are dead and turned to clay others will rise up in their stead and do the same things that their fathers have done until we change and modify existing laws, until we make new laws to prohibit and restrain corporations from further acts of oppression, and until we make laws to suppress evils that are inherent in and the inevitable outgrowth of our present trust-controlled industrial and commercial systems.

* * * * * * *

The corporation is a creature of the law. A trust is a great corporation or a combination of corporations, and, hence, likewise a creature of the law. Neither the corporation nor the trusts have any inalienable rights. What the law creates the law can destroy, or can regulate, control, or restrain within limits. This should be done by the State if the corporation is acting within the exclusive jurisdiction or control of the State, and by the National Government if acting within the scope of Federal authority. If the lawmaking power in the State or in the National Government neglects or refuses to do its duty, the ultimate remedy rests with the people.

Always the talk is about more laws, new statutes, new remedies against the trusts. Rightfully and wisely and bravely this great Congressman said:

If the lawmaking power in the State or in the National Government neglects or refuses to do its duty, the ultimate remedy rests with the people. In that event it is for the people to rise in revolt against their own leaders and hurl from power any party that favors or fosters legislative policies which operate to give special privileges to the rich against the poor. Yea, more!

It is for the people to rise up in their sovereign might and strike down any man, regardless of party, who stands for legislation in favor of the classes as against the masses.

Here are practices which, according to the report of the Judiciary Committee of the House, indorsed by the report of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, are now and for years have been in vogue. They are the devices by which a great concern enters a sovereign State, reduces the price upon an article in that entire State, doing it for the purpose of destroying local competition. It tramples upon the large as well as the small concern. It puts out of business alike the great corporation and the private individual. It rides all to the death. And then, having destroyed all its competitors, it levies spoil in every home of the land. For such a corporation and for such piracy, what remedy do you by this bill provide? The culprit is to be invited before a commission, and, after a long hearing and inevitable and great delay, he may finally be told, "Really, now, you must stop; but you can keep all the loot you have accumulated." The eloquent Congressman declared:

It is for the people to rise up in their sovereign right and strike down any man, regardless of party, who stands for legislation in favor of the classes as against the masses.

What think you the people will say of this legislation? Is not this kind of legislation favorable to the classes? Let us look at it by comparison. I read the other day in a newspaper of this city that a man in the State of Delaware had been tried, convicted, and imprisoned for two months for stealing a pint of milk; but here is a law that proposes merely to reprimand those who plunder entire States. The pint of milk case was brought under a law that applied to the masses, to the little fellow, to the common man, to the individual; under it the theft of a pint of milk could be punished by a long term behind prison bars; but for the great monopolies that despoil entire States you provide no penalty save this gentle decree of a board, "Go thou and sin no more." What would have been the thunderous note of this great Congressman if the Republican Party had enacted a similar law? What would be the answer of the people? I continue to read:

I have already submitted to you the Democratic position upon the trust question—

Which you will remember was a penitentiary sentence, which the distinguished gentleman said was more effective than 10 $29,000,000 fines—

I have already submitted to you the Democratic position upon the trust question. I insist it is the only correct position, and must ultimately triumph.

It did triumph in the election of 1912, two years ago. I continue to quote:

Fellow Democrats, let us rally to the fight with renewed energy. The Republican Party has utterly failed to deal successfully with the trust evil. This special message of the President is tantamount to a confession of that failure. The relief of the people from present bad conditions can only be secured through Democratic success. The war is on for industrial supremacy in this country, and the Republican Party is closely allied with the trusts. The issue is sharply drawn between plutocracy on the one hand, and Democracy, or the people, on the other. The insolence and oppressions of the greatly rich and the disasters resulting from a widespread money panic make conditions ripe for a change in the national administration.

But let no one imagine that such a contest can be easily won. Those who would combat these forces of error with their millions of hoarded and ill-gotten gold, with their tens of millions of allies and hired emissaries, should have the zeal of martyrs and the courage of true patriots.

I summon you, ye gallant spirits of 1910, now to battle with these gigantic concerns; and, as we approach them upon the field, I charge you, as did the eloquent Congressman, that the spirit of the martyr and the zealot should be with you at this hour, and that you should strike, strike, strike until the last enemy of industrial liberty has been driven from the fields. The conferees turn a deaf ear to my appeal, the cloakroom reverberates with the snorings which seem to say: "Deal with the monopolist gently, kindly, mildly, tenderly; for him no prison stripes, no horrid jail in which the reluctant light serves only to expose the gloom, nor shall there be the smell of prison damp upon his costly raiment; the law and all its terrors for the poor, the weak, the common man, the individual who makes the mistake of stealing but little; for him the felon's gyves. But for the plunderer of States the sweet injunction, 'Go and sin no more.'"

Where now is the spirit of martyrs? Look and you will find it in the starless night of the mine, where men moil and toil that they may bring forth a pittance for the sustenance of wife and child. Behold it exemplified in the spirit of the man who, swinging upon a crane high above the earth, perils life and limb each moment of the day that he may keep his children in the public school. The spirit of the martyr! Look, again you may behold it exemplified on farm and field, where men in sun and storm toil on through the long days that they may gain a livelihood for those they love. But in this Chamber I do not find much of a disposition to die that other men may be free, or to suffer that these wrongs may be wiped out. I can not even find a disposition to grant such respite as the law may give. I see no stalwart soldiers here, with poised lance and burnished shield, ready for the wild charge of death; rather those who propose negotiation and kindly ministrations which do not even offend the lordly and the great.

I read on:

This is no new fight. It is the old, old struggle of the ages. It is the struggle of the greatly rich seeking to gain and maintain privileges by law, or tolerated under the law, opposed and resisted by the masses constituting the great body of the people. The issue plainly stated is whether the combines and trusts shall control the Government or whether the Government shall control the combines and trusts.

In such a contest and on such an issue the Democratic Party can and of right ought to win. It has ever been the enemy of plutocracy and special privileges. It has ever been the friend of the poor and oppressed. It has ever been the champion of equal rights and equal opportunities.

The prospects for Democratic success were never brighter. President Roosevelt has split the Republican Party on the trust question, as President Cleveland during his second administration split the Democratic Party on the money question.

How did Roosevelt split the Republican Party on the trust question? He split the Republican Party when he went over to the leadership of George W. Perkins, of the Harvester Trust. He split the Republican Party when he directed the Attorney General not to prosecute that trust. He split the Republican Party when he took gold from the great trusts for political uses. He split the Republican Party when, at the dictation of Perkins and Gary and men of that ilk, he sent a message here to Congress proposing that we handle the trusts through commissions. Thus Roosevelt split the Republican Party. His message declaring that there were "good trusts" and advocating regulation by commissions instead of prison sentences imposed by courts became the epitaph of the Republican Party. That message struck harshly upon the ears of the people. For a time the people inclined to forget or to overlook the monstrous proposition; but when they came to couple that message with certain extraneous facts their opinion began to form. The opinion of the best element of the Republican Party also began to form. Then arose that opposition which culminated in a revolt that is still represented in this Chamber by a few gallant men who refused "to bow the knee to Baal."

I continue to read:

All that we have to do in order to win is to unite all our forces and stand firmly and unalterably by the time-honored principles of Democracy, and millions of patriotic Americans, to whom these principles are ever dear, will rally to our support in this great civic conflict and will crown our efforts with a glorious victory.

I paraphrase those words: All the Democratic Party has to do to remain in power during the lifetime of every man in this body is to go boldly forward, to turn neither to the right nor to the left, to redeem its platform pledges to their letter, to show the world that at last there is a party that can look a thousand million dollars in the face unflinchingly and treat it as it would treat the pennies of the poor.

Mr. President, I have taken thus long to read this great speech. It was a great speech. Every word of it thrilled my heart as I read it four years ago, when I was gathering material for a campaign. It was to me a bugle blast summoning to battle. Very recently, Mr. President, this able Representative and associate conferees of the House were still standing firmly for criminal penalties. They came here with a bill full of criminal penalties. The Senate struck out many of the sections of the bill. The House conferees insisted upon putting the substantive provisions back in the bill, but the criminal penalties are not there. Who is responsible? I do not know.

When this bill was under discussion in the House Mr. FLOYD said (I read from page 10409 of the RECORD for June, 1914):

The purpose we had was to make it clear that, when a corporation had been guilty, those officers, agents, and directors of the corporation that either authorized, ordered, or did the thing prohibited should be guilty. Under the existing law, and without that provision of the statute, the person who did the things would undoubtedly be guilty; but in the enforcement of the criminal provisions of the Sherman law, experience has demonstrated that both juries and courts are slow to convict men who have simply done acts authorized or ordered by some officers of the concern higher up, and the words "authorized" and "ordered" were introduced to reach the real offenders, the men who caused the things to be done; and if the language is susceptible of any ambiguity and is not clear, we desire to make it clear. I will state to the gentleman that we intended to give agents and officers a trial, and we do not mean that the guilt of the corporation shall attach to them without trial; but in order to obtain a conviction, it will be necessary for the Government to charge them specifically with authorizing, ordering, or doing of the thing prohibited, and, on proof, convict them.

Why, here was an advocacy, and a very proper advocacy, of the punishment of the officers of a corporation. Here was the explanation offered on the floor of the House with reference to this very bill, that it did not stop at the punishment of the corporation, but proposed to reach every officer of the corporation who had authorized an illegal act to be done. Singularly enough, that section remains in the bill, but the word "penal" is inserted; so that only the officers who have authorized penal acts can be held. Now, note that all the penal sections have been taken out of the bill so far as they apply to trusts and monopolies. Hence the section as to the officers of trusts is a dead letter; it means nothing.

Now, Mr. President, a quotation from the author of this bill, Mr. Clayton, who has since been elevated to a high position on the bench, who was retained as a Member of the House, it was understood, for some weeks while his appointment was pending in order that he might perfect this very bill. His views on this particular bill and upon the subject generally are of importance. He was the gentleman selected to notify Mr. Bryan in 1908 of his nomination. I shall quote only briefly. After reading the platform, which I have already put in the RECORD, Mr. Clayton said:

We know that our party, platform, and candidate stand for the best interests of all the people. We know that success is deserved. We believe that our party and candidate, animated by the wisest and most patriotic purposes, will achieve victory in November. On no political issue is the platform a straddle or evasion, and its every declaration squares with the principles of old-fashioned Democracy. It is essentially a Democratic instrument, preserving and applying the faith of the fathers to existing conditions. * * *

It is equally gratifying that there is nothing in the platform calling for apology. There is nothing that you would avoid or run away from. There is nothing omitted that you need supply by giving your individual views. In these respects you have a tremendous advantage of your Republican opponent.

Mr. Bryan replied to that address at the time, from which reply I desire to read a few words. After quoting at length from Mr. Taft's speech, in which Mr. Taft had described the deplorable conditions existing, Mr. Bryan said:

Mr. Taft says that these evils have crept in during the last 10 years. He declares that, during this time, some "prominent and influential members of the community, spurred by financial success and in their hurry for greater wealth, became unmindful of the common rules of business honesty and fidelity, and of the limitations imposed by law upon their actions"; and that "the revelations of the breaches of trusts, the disclosures as to rebates and discriminations by railroads, the accumulating evidence of the violations of the antitrust laws, by a number of corporations, and the overissue of stocks and bonds of interstate railroads for the unlawful enriching of directors and for the purpose of concentrating the control of the railroads under one management"—all these, he charges, "quickened the conscience of the people and brought on a moral awakening."

Then Mr. Bryan notes the fact that during all of this time the Republicans controlled every department of the Government, and adds:

Why were these "known abuses" permitted to develop? Why have they not been corrected? If existing laws are sufficient, why have they not been enforced? All of the executive machinery of the Federal Government is in the hands of the Republican Party. Are new laws necessary? Why have they not been enacted?

And so forth. Then he makes this statement:

So long as the Republican Party remains in power it is powerless to regenerate itself. It can not attack wrongdoing in high places without disgracing many of its prominent members, and it, therefore, uses opiates instead of the surgeon's knife.

"It, therefore, uses opiates instead of the surgeon's knife." What is this bill, with the criminal sections gone, with all punishment taken out of it, so far as trusts are concerned? Is it a method of using opiates? Surely it is not the surgeon's knife.

I read on:

Its malefactors construe each Republican victory as an indorsement of their conduct and threaten the party with defeat if they are interfered with. Not until that party passes through a period of fasting in the wilderness will the Republican leaders learn to study public questions from the standpoint of the masses. Just as with individuals "the cares of this world and the deceitfulness of riches choke the truth," so in politics, when party leaders serve far away from home and are not in constant contact with the voters, continued party success blinds their eyes to the needs of the people and makes them deaf to the cry of distress.

Mr. President, rightly construed, that platform, that speech of notification, and that reply outlined the policy of the Democratic Party at that day to be one of extermination of trusts and monopolies.

I want to read now briefly from the language of others of the conferees when they took this bill before the lower House of Congress and asked for and obtained the overwhelming vote in favor of the bill with the criminal sections in it which the Senator from Montana failed to mention.

Mr. WEBB gave a very lucid and distinct analysis of the bill. I can not reconcile it, however, with the new doctrine promulgated by the Senator from Montana, who says that we are not engaged in antitrust legislation at all; that we are simply trying to reach some little practices that do not hurt much. Mr. WEBB said this:

The Democratic Party in their convention in 1912, among other things, declared in favor of supplemental legislation to the now existing antitrust laws, such as prevention of holding companies, interlocking directorates, discrimination in price, and so forth. The Judiciary Committee, in obedience to that plank in the platform, for the last four or five months have sat patiently and diligently in an effort to present to this House some bill which would carry out the reasonable demand found in that platform. It is proper to say, gentlemen, that the committee has dealt with this question faithfully, conscientiously, and studiously. For nealy four months the entire membership of that committee, or as many as could attend, sat and listened to witnesses from all parts of the United States on proposed or tentative bills. The subcommittee spent much time and great patience in trying to present a bill which would remedy the evils that are almost universally complained of and at the same time unfetter and unshackle legitimate business in the United States.

And the remedies in every instance were fine and imprisonment.

Mr. WEBB continued:

The President has never at any time suggested or demanded that no amendment should be added to this bill. He has never at any time suggested that this bill should be put through as it is presented here to-day.

He has acted as any other great Executive should act who is anxious about the good of his country, about the unshackling and protection of honest business, and about the restraint and punishment of unscrupulous business.

Find in this bill a word providing for the punishment of unscrupulous trust business. You can not. It was all taken out.

The President has not said that no amendment shall be offered or adopted to this bill. He has simply said that the general provisions of this bill meet his approval.

If the President said that the general provisions of this bill, then drawn and laid before the House of Representatives, met his approval, and if the bill at that time contained criminal penalties for every one of these trust practices, will some one tell me what right the Senator from Montana—who now honors me by his absence—had to charge that I was attacking the Democratic Party, when, by the word of one of the leading conferees, Mr. WEBB, uttered as late as the 23d day of May, 1914, the bill at that time, surcharged as it was with penal provisions, had the approval of the President? What right has any Senator to stand upon this floor and make charges such as were made here this morning, namely, that I was attacking the Democratic administration, when I am only insisting on putting back in the bill the provisions that the House conferee, Mr. WEBB, said had been approved by the President? If the President now occupies a different ground, I do not know it; and I challenge the right of any man to stand here and say that he represents the President and is authorized to declare that he has changed his position since the 23d day of May, 1914.

Mr. WEBB described the bill. His address was one of analysis of the terms of the bill rather than comment. It was a very lucid statement—as, indeed, is every statement that comes from the lips of Mr. WEBB, a very competent lawyer and a very excellent gentleman. In discussing section 2 he states:

The violation of this provision subjects a person to a fine of not exceeding $5,000 or to imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both.

And, mark you, that provision had the approval of the President on the 23d day of May, 1914, according to the statement of Mr. WEBB.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. I wish to inquire whether it is in order for a Senator to quote the language of a Member of the other House?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am astounded that the Senator or anybody else thinks I am out of order in reading from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD upon the floor of Congress.

Mr. OLIVER. That was my impression, although——

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is nothing in the rules upon the subject. Jefferson's Manual has held that it is improper to criticize the language of a Member of the other House.

Mr. REED. But, Mr. President, I am not criticizing. I am commending. I am eulogizing. I am stamping my approval upon what these gentlemen have said. I am appealing to the Senate out of their eloquent lips. I am asserting, as better reasons than I can advance, the reasons they have given. I am as highly complimentary as it possible for me to be. I could add greater praise only if the Lord should touch my faltering tongue with the flame of genius. As matters stand, I am doing the best I can to pronounce a suitable encomium. I read on:

The necessity for legislation of this character is apparent—

That is, the necessity for a prohibition with a criminal penalty, for that is what the House had done.

Discriminating in price is a bludgeon which the trusts have often used to put competitors "out of business." For the last 20 years this practice has been one of the handmaids of monopoly, the advance guard of an army of arbitrary methods, which has injured and destroyed the business of thousands of smaller concerns.

The violation of this section subjects the person violating it to a fine of not exceeding $5,000 or a punishment not exceeding one year's imprisonment.

And that criminal provision had the O. K. of the President, according to the statement of this distinguished Congressman, whose word no one will challenge. The practice was 20 years old. It was a bludgeon used by trusts to put down a little or a weak concern. The Senator from Montana, who is not here, would probably even yet deny that this bill was designed to deal with trusts and monopolies. He doubtless would asseverate that we are engaged in the petit larceny business of hunting field mice while lions and tigers roam at large.

Mr. WEBB continues:

You will find that the evil in selecting customers is not in the mere selection of customers, but in the selection of a customer on condition that that customer will not sell a competitive article. We destroy the right to do that and make a person guilty of crime if a trust undertakes to sell an article to a merchant on condition that that merchant shall sell no competitive article.

Again the criminal penalty. Again the prison walls loom before the eyes of the gentleman who engages in the practice of tying contracts. Again before his vision is presented the striped suit and the long line practicing the lock step. According to the statement of the distinguished Congressman on May 23, 1914, the President demanded, or at least approved, that method of handling trusts.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. Assuming that the President was properly quoted—and I do assume that, because I know Mr. WEBB would not have said that if it were not true—does the Senator think the President, holding the same view still, as I understand the Senator does assume, and we have a right to assume, because he has not notified Congress of anything to the contrary, would approve this bill if we passed it in its present form?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the question is not exactly a fair one to put to me under the circumstances. I think my friend the Senator from Nebraska intends fairly. He is one of the fairest and best men I have ever met. But the President of the United States must settle that question when it comes to him. What I am inveighing against is the broad innuendo if not the charge of the Senator from Montana, that because I dare criticize this bill in its present emasculated, expurgated, enervated, disemboweled condition, I thereby attack the policies of the President.

I have established the President's position to be in favor of the doctrine of personal responsibility and criminal penalties by his speech before the American Bar Association, delivered in 1910. I have established the President's position by his speech of acceptance in the summer of 1912. I have established his position by his message to Congress on the 20th of January, 1914. I have established his position on the 23d day of May, 1914, by the quotation I have made from the remarks of the distinguished conferee, Mr. WEBB, and now I turn again and challenge anyone to rise on this floor and say, representing the President, that he has changed since May 23.

Mr. WEBB very distinctly points out the object and purpose of this legislation. I pause to remark that it is diametrically opposed to the contention of the distinguished Senator from Montana, who says that because he does not like my speech he is going to vote for the bill, although he knows it ought to be recommitted—a reason which, by the way, classes him in the matter of fairness and logic with that illustrious gentleman immortalized by Shakespeare, who being asked why he pursued his grudge against Antonio replied:

Some men there are love not a gaping pig;
Some, that are mad if they behold a cat.
As there is no firm reason to be rend'red
Why he can not abide a gaping pig;
Why he, a harmless necessary cat;
So can I give no reason, nor I will not,
More than a lodg'd hate and a certain loathing
I bear Antonio.

In like manner does the Senator follow his dislikes.

Coming back to the text: Mr. BARTLETT, of the House, said to Mr. WEBB:

In what way does this section which you are now discussing change the law as it now is, as construed by the Supreme Court in the Tobacco case? Is it not a fact that one of the practices condemned by the Supreme Court in that case was the very thing that you now propose to prohibit?

Mr. WEBB replied:

The difference between this section and the Tobacco case is this: Under this section there may be a hundred different offenses which are condemned, whereas under the Tobacco case it took all of those offenses combined to make them guilty of a restraint of interstate trade under the Sherman law. We condemn the individual acts which lead to a restraint of interstate trade, whereas at present you must show a sufficient number of such acts of restraint to make such a restraint as the Supreme Court will declare illegal under the trust laws.

There is the well-stated reason for this legislation. I have already adverted to it on another occasion. To-day, when it charges a restraint of trade, the Government is obliged to prove facts which warrant the deduction not that a practice in some one community may have had a tendency to restrain the trade of some individual, but that the restraint is of such a nature as to put restrictions upon commerce generally. Under the section as passed by the House it was not at all necessary to prove a general restraint. It was sufficient to prove that an institution had suddenly dropped the price in the field occupied by a competitor; that it had kept the price up elsewhere; that there was no natural reason for the local reduction; thereupon a case would have been made out. Such a showing could ordinarily be made by a litigant without going beyond the borders of his own country for the facts, except, perhaps, to examine the books of the company in order to show the prices charged in other localities. The House was trying to reach the particular practice, to make it easy to secure a conviction upon proof that the particular practice had been followed. The House bill sought to relieve the litigant of the difficulty of proving a general restraint of trade or the existence of a general monopoly.

I illustrated the distinction the other day and I return to that illustration. A man is engaged in running an independent oil company and is selling oil in the eastern half of the State of Missouri. The Standard Oil Co. comes into that field and cuts the price of oil 2 or 3 cents below the cost of production. It does not cut the price elsewhere. The case comes on for trial. If this statute is upon the books, what follows? The independent dealer simply shows the price at which oil was selling. He shows the sudden and radical cut by the Standard Oil Co. He shows that it did not cut the price in the adjacent territory or State. He has made his prima facie case. If we had the law as it passed in the House, somebody would go to jail. Now, what happens to the Standard Oil? If the injured party proceeds under this bill, he must go before a commission. In all human probability six or eight months elapse before a decree. Then what? Then an appeal to the court of appeals, and another delay of months or perhaps years. Then what? Then an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, with another delay of months or years; at the end of all of which a decree is entered that the Standard Oil shall no longer continue to locally cut prices. But in the meantime, in the intervening years, the poor independent dealer has been bankrupted. The Standard Oil Co. has rid itself of a competitor, established a complete monopoly, and, so far as this bill is concerned, can not be punished even to the extent of the costs.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Directly in point with the statement of the Senator from Missouri, the American Sugar Refining Co. did go into the Middle West, where a company had been organized to produce beet sugar in competition with the refining company, and they did reduce the price of sugar below the general market price in that community, the effect of their action being to discourage the investment in the domestic factory and practically put them out of business. I think there are innumerable instances where large corporations have menaced development in various lines of industry by just that course.

I can not understand why there should not be a sharp and responsive remedy for a situation like that. It is harmful, discouraging, and tends to prevent the development of our domestic industries.

Mr. REED. Suppose we take the facts as given by the Senator and vary them slightly. Suppose a sugar company of moderate capital has already been organized in that community, and the American Sugar Refining Co. enters its trade territory, wherever it has a customer, and undersells it. In the meantime the local sugar company complains to the commission. The practice goes one. The concern that is being attacked probably can not stand that kind of competition for six months without bankruptcy. At the end of three or four years the independent concern gains its contention in the commission and finally in the court. Then what happens?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. In just one moment. In the meantime the concern has been killed; it is buried, and almost forgotten, and not a single penalty can be visited upon the trust that murdered it. There is not in this conference bill even a provision for the assessment of the costs against the American Sugar Refining Co. that we are now using in this illustration. Immediately, after having succeeded in crushing that rival, without any penalty following, the Sugar Trust can go into any other trade territory, repeat the operation, and continue to kill its antagonists until the end of time and escape without the payment of any penalty. And you call that antitrust legislation! I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I was going to say to the Senator that in the instance given by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] I think the facts were as the Senator from Missouri modified them. They did this at a time when their rivals in that particular community, some beet-sugar companies, had borrowed a whole lot of money and were required to pay it at the time when they were accustomed to sell their sugar. They ran the sugar in all through the Middle West there and sold it below cost, so that their rivals were unable to sell their sugar, or, if they did, they had to sell it at a great loss. In either case it meant bankruptcy, and the result was—I think that is the case—the American Sugar Refining Co. began to buy up the beet-sugar companies. They bought some at that time. If I am not mistaken, they had them right up against a condition the effect of which was that they were unable to sell their product to meet their obligations.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The effect of the action was to discourage investors and diminish interest in the concern.

Mr. OVERMAN. Those acts, Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Senator will pardon me, it costs about $600,000 to start a beet-sugar factory.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will ask the Senator from Missouri if he does not think that is in violation of the Sherman antitrust law?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have entered that particular rat hole and performed the office of a ferret in driving the animal out into the open until my skin is almost worn off.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator does not answer the question whether that is in violation of the Sherman antitrust law.

Mr. REED. I will answer that, in my opinion, it is in violation of the antitrust act, provided you can make a sufficient showing so that a court will hold that the act is a restraint of trade.

Now, if the Sherman Act covers just such a case as this we are discussing, it is absolutely idiotic to pass another law covering the same thing unless the new law, in addition to prohibiting the act already covered by the Sherman law makes conviction easier, which is just what this bill was intended to accomplish.

I have discussed at length, time and again, the proposition that the object of this legislation was to provide a new, short, and sharp remedy which the person injured could effectively employ without being compelled to prove that the defendant was a trust or that a practice complained of operated as a general restraint of trade. It was intended to limit the scope of the inquiry so that mere proof of some act or practice denounced by the bill would be sufficient to make out a case, whereupon the penalty of the law would follow.

That is the object of this legislation; that is what we have been sitting here all these weeks for; and now every time the bill as reported is shown to be innocuous, to be without virtue, to be without life, these Senators go back and say, "Well, you can get it under the present law anyway." That is begging the question; that is equivalent to saying that no legislation is necessary. If no legislation is necessary, then why are we considering this bill? If the Sherman law is all-pervading, if it touches at every point the oppressions of the trusts, if it is simple in its administration and easy of enforcement, then we need nothing else. It is upon the presumption, as the President has said in his message and as the committee said in its report and as the members of the committee have said in their speeches, that the Sherman law fails in some respects, that we formulated this legislation. Having formulated it, so far as the House was concerned, so that it filled the full measure of these demands, the conferees proceeded to emasculate it, to make it worthless; and every time one demonstrates its worthlessness the reply is, "Well, we did not need it anyway." If "we did not need it anyway," why are we creating it?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Missouri will be quite willing to admit that whatever virtue the Sherman antitrust law has, it is universal in its application and has no pets or favorites, if it is properly enforced.

Mr. REED. That is the way every law ought to be drawn.

Mr. OVERMAN. May I ask the Senator from Michigan a question?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. Are you in favor of criminal penalties for tying contracts?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am in favor of penalizing the violator of the law.

Mr. OVERMAN. I did not ask the Senator that. I asked him if he was in favor of penal criminal statutes being added to the tying-contract proposition?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. As I said a moment ago, I am in favor of penalizing every violator of the law, and I would have no hand in the preparation of immunity baths either for the infant industry or for the giant octopus.

Mr. OVERMAN. And yet the Senator has not answered my question.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think I have come very close to answering it. Perhaps the Senator from North Carolina is a little dense this afternoon.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am asking the Senator if he is in favor of a criminal penalty being added to a tying-contract proposition?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I know what the Senator is driving at. The Senator does not wish to have me apply my rule of law to the infant in its cradle; he wants an official doctor for the infant; he does not desire that we shall penalize the infant; but he has attempted by his legislation to prescribe the clothes that that infant shall wear at every stage of its existence, although he does not know whether it will tower like the giant or be cut off like a pigmy.

Mr. OVERMAN. Still the Senator has not answered my question.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; I do not suppose anybody can answer the Senator's question. The Senator favors the immunity bath, the preliminary inquiry into the intention of the offender when it begins business. He would call him into a dark room, surround him by a few distinguished gentlemen, and ask him just what his intentions are.

Mr. OVERMAN. Would the Senator from Michigan send him to the penitentiary if he made tying contracts?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If he, by his contract, undertakes to restrain trade and foster monopoly, he violates the Sherman antitrust law and should be punished.

Mr. OVERMAN. Well, we have got plenty of remedies against the restraint of trade. Here is a clause of the Sherman antitrust law that would put such an offender in the penitentiary.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I know there is a clause in the Sherman antitrust law which, if enforced, affords all the remedy that is necessary to meet this situation; but the difference between my attitude and the attitude of the Senator from North Carolina is that he wants to bring these little offenders up in a warm room and see just how large they are to grow and just how humane their disposition and just how altruistic their purpose.

I would not cramp industry or development in that way; I would not cramp it at all. If the industry grows to its fullest fruition and respects the law under which it is permitted to grow, well and good; it will have no trouble with the Government. Corporations are useful and are quite necessary in our present-day form of conducting business and meeting the competition that is upon all sides; but they should not be permitted to make the laws nor to break the laws at any stage of their existence. This quiet little antidote for future activities which is prescribed by the Senator from North Carolina and his brethren may have a wholesome educational effect upon them; I do not know whether it will or not; but the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] propounded the very crux of that situation to the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] this morning when he asked him to define, first, how offensive the institution should be before it would come under the scrutinizing eye of the court, and when it would graduate from the patronizing attentions of this commission.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from North Carolina if he believes that the Sherman antitrust law covers the practices denounced in this bill?

Mr. OVERMAN. It covers all of them that are in restraint of trade. I can not see why any of them which are in restraint of trade——

Mr. REED. The Senator says "all of them that are in restraint of trade." Does the Senator think that it covers all of them?

Mr. OVERMAN. There may be some acts for which men ought not to be put in the penitentiary, where they are innocent men.

Mr. REED. It is not a question of who ought to be in the penitentiary; but does the law cover——

Mr. OVERMAN. I think all cases where there is any restraint of trade whatever are covered by the Sherman antitrust law, which makes such an act a penitentiary offense, and a high authority, one of the great lawyers of the Senate, says we need no such legislation as this; that the Sherman antitrust law covers it all.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator from North Carolina so think?

Mr. OVERMAN. I rather think it does.

Mr. REED. Then, if the Senator so thinks, for what are we enacting this legislation?

Mr. OVERMAN. And I think the Senator from Missouri agrees with me.

Mr. REED. Then why were we held here through the dog days and on to the autumn frosts enacting a law that is already covered by the statutes?

Mr. OVERMAN. Does not the Senator from Missouri agree that every act which is in restraint of trade is covered by the Sherman antitrust law, and that a man violating that law can be put in the penitentiary? I ask the Senator that question.

Mr. REED. I have already answered it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Well, answer it now.

Mr. REED. I will answer, if the Senator will be patient. It is my opinion that whenever you can prove a restraint of trade it is covered by that act; but it is also my opinion that the difficulty of proving a general restraint of trade is so great that this legislation is necessary. I agree with the statement made by Mr. WEBB upon the floor of the House of Representatives that this legislation was undertaken for the purpose of providing a means by which we can bring the culprit to the bar of justice and secure a conviction by merely showing a particular act. We have, however, utterly destroyed the effectiveness of the bill, because where a case has been proven under it no penalty is visited upon the guilty party.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to ask the Senator another question. He has tried to give us an instance where offenders ought to be sent to the penitentiary. I will ask the Senator if he has given us a single instance that would not have been, upon the very statement of the case, a restraint of trade? Neither the Senator from Missouri nor the Senator from Michigan has cited a single case where a restraint of trade was not involved.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if that is true, if the position of the Senator from North Carolina is correct, that the Sherman law covers everything and that every act that is covered by this bill can be punished as a crime under the Sherman Act, we are enacting a farce here and not a law. The Senator argues too much.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator has not answered my question.

Mr. REED. This bill either has virtue in it or it does not have virtue. If it has virtue, it must consist of one of two things—it must either cover acts which are not covered by the Sherman law or it must provide a more speedy and convenient remedy.

Mr. OVERMAN. I challenge the Senator from Missouri to give me a case of discrimination in trade that is not also a restraint of trade and that does not come under the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law. He has not done so, and he knows he has not done so.

Mr. REED. I frankly say I have not done so; but when the Senator has argued that, he has argued himself out of court; there is no reason for his existence; he might as well never have been on the earth, so far as this particular legislation is concerned; and all that we are doing here is a hopeless farce.

I might concede that there is no restraint of trade that is not covered by the Sherman Act; I might concede that the acts denounced in this bill are all in restraint of trade—indeed, that was largely my argument—but I do not thereby concede that this may not be made a highly remedial statute, because it might afford the means to the litigant of proving a particular act and of obtaining a decree based upon that proof, instead of compelling him, as he is now compelled, to prove a general restraint of trade.

Now, let me illustrate to the Senator. Suppose we take the case of the sugar company, put by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH]. The Senator starts the work of building an independent plant. The sugar company comes in and cuts prices, and the Senator is put out of business; he realizes that he can not compete with them, and he quits business. If the Senator proves those facts and no more, to-day, under the Sherman Act, he would not have made a case, in my opinion, that could go to a jury or to a court. It would be demurrable; he would have to go further than that in his proof. Accordingly the Government in all of these cases where it is sought to show a restraint of trade has set forth the method of organization, the amount of capital; it has shown the tremendous power of the offending corporation; and it has been able to prove a general conspiracy to destroy a competitor and that such extraneous circumstances have made his destruction inevitable. It has to prove all of those things under the present condition of the law; but if this bill were enacted in proper form, you could make a complete case when you prove that the price was cut locally; that it was not cut elsewhere; that it was put at a figure so low that no profit could result but, indeed, loss must follow. Having proven those facts, the burden undoubtedly would immediately shift to the defendant; explanation would be necessary, and unless he could give it he could be convicted. The difference is one of procedure, largely. This bill did provide a means by which you could reach this class of offenders by a short cut.

What I complain of is that having gotten your "varmint" under this bill you can not do anything with him but turn him loose. You can say to the fox that has been robbing your henroost: "You are guilty; you must not come back to this henroost any more; but we will not penalize you; we will not singe a hair on your body; we will not turn you over to the dogs; we will not cage you; we will not do anything with you, but you must not come back to this particular hencoop. If you do, then we are going to do something terrible to you; we may send you to jail for disobeying our august order. But over there in the next field, at the next farmhouse, is another chicken roost; you can venture there in perfect safety until some one catches you and files a complaint, when we will have jurisdiction, and may again order you to 'move on.'" Of course if the Trade Commission should follow the fox around until he had plundered all the chicken houses in the world, he might then have to embark in other business. All this is fine for the fox, but what of the chickens?

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator has given the most narrow construction to the Sherman antitrust law that has ever been given by any court.

Mr. REED. I have been contending for a wide construction of that law, and my utterances are here in the RECORD. I am sorry that the Senator can not see that this is a method of procedure that we are now endeavoring to enact, and that it affords an easy way to bring offenders to the bar of justice, but it is utterly inadequate when it comes to the matter of penalties. Let me illustrate. Here is a man arrested for larceny. Of course you must prove that he stole the goods. That can be done by direct or circumstantial evidence. Such proof was frequently hard to make. Finally it came to be the law that proof that the accused had in his possession goods recently stolen was sufficient; thereupon it became easy to secure convictions. But of what avail would be the presumption of guilt if the convicted thief could keep what he had stolen and the court could go no further than to issue an injunction forbidding him to sin any more at that particular place?

There are certain practices which, as the Senator has said, are all condemned by the Sherman law. There is no reason in the world, then, for enacting any additional legislation unless it be to provide a simpler means by which offenders can be convicted. We have provided that simpler means, because it is only necessary to show certain facts, whereas before a broad field of facts had to be covered. Now, however, having provided the easy means to prove the facts, we deny the penalty; we take the sword from the hand of justice; we rob the law of any potentiality.

I will make the Senator the prophecy now that it will not be a year's time until he will be here upon the floor of the Senate ready to vote to put criminal penalties back into this statute. Indeed, the argument is being surreptitiously circulated now: "We are all tired and want to go home. Let us pass the bill as it is. At the next session of Congress we will plant a few teeth in its harmless gums." My experience has been that it is not wise to pass laws and trust future Congresses to remedy the defects.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMOOT in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I received this morning, by special delivery, a letter with a little clipping fastened to it that is so entirely apropos to the suggestions and thoughts of the Senator from Missouri that I desire to read it. It happens to come from St. Louis. It is as follows:

ST. LOUIS, October 3, 1914.

Senator MARTINE, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR. Your remarks, as stated in the attached clipping, are correct—

Referring to some remarks I made in this Chamber on last Friday—

The only way to make trust officials behave and respect the laws is to send them to the penitentiary for violation of same. Fining a trust is a joke. Every time a trust is fined, prices advance and the public laughs.

The original antitrust bill was a dandy until its teeth were extracted.

Yours, for a law which will produce results,

BELL OIL CO.,
F. C. BRETSNYDER,
President.

This is an independent oil company; and it seems so fitting and so apropos to this discussion that I felt it would be a crime to allow it to go by without being noticed.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the most astounding statement I have heard on the floor of the Senate in a long while was made by the Senator from Montana when he asserted that this law was intended to reach the small man who is engaging in these evil practices; that it is not to have anything to do with the big man or big concern engaging in exactly the same practices.

There are two answers to that. The first one has already been made in the showing I have advanced—that the purpose of this law, as detailed by every man, big and little, from the President down, was to reach the great trusts and monopolies. The second answer is that Congress has not yet reached that low estate where it proposes to make exactly the same act, done with the same motive and having the same effect, a crime when it is done by one man or one institution and not a crime when it is done by another.

The Senator asked me if I would be willing to see a small man who engaged in these practices sent to jail or the penitentiary. I answer that question unhesitatingly. I believe that the man who commits petit larceny should be tried in the same court and under the same rule of law as the man who commits grand larceny; but I believe the penalty which follows ought, by the discretion of the court, to be meted out in accordance with the enormity of the offense. Just as we send to jail for one day or one week the man who steals a dollar, whereas we send or pretend to send the man who steals a hundred thousand dollars to the penitentiary for a term of years, just as the punishment is of like character in both cases but differs in degree, so would I make the punishment to be meted out to the great trust and to the small man pursuing exactly the same methods with the design and purpose similar in character but different in degree. Under the criminal clauses of the Sherman Act, as well as under the criminal clauses which were once attached to this bill, that latitude is allowed which it is necessary for the judge to exercise. It is not necessary to fine a man $5,000 and send him to the penitentiary for a year, but any fine from $1 up may be levied, and any sentence from one day up may be imposed, or, indeed, no jail sentence at all need be inflicted. That latitude is permitted under the Sherman law, and was given by provisions of this bill as it came to us from the House.

It is an astounding thing for a Senator of the United States to stand here and practically assert that the same character of act, done with the same evil motive and purpose, should in one case be tried in a court and punished by imprisonment and fine and in another case be tried before a commission with no penalty. That kind of justice has not yet been ingrafted upon our jurisprudence.

Besides, what difference does it make to the man who is crushed whether the man who crushed him is a big man or a little man? It makes little difference to one about to be executed whether a 22-caliber bullet is fired through his heart or a 14-inch shell through his body. In either event he must die. It makes very little difference to the small dealer in business whether the particular individual who crushes him by unjust and discriminating practices is worth a thousand dollars or a hundred million dollars; the individual crushed suffers the same in one case as in the other.

The Senator from Montana spoke of the powers of the Trade Commission to investigate. I have heard no word upon the floor of the Senate against reposing in the Trade Commission the powers to investigate. The Senator from Montana, however, almost in effect said that it was the investigation by the Senate which forced the prosecution of the New Haven officials. If that be true, it is a sad commentary upon our Department of Justice. I bring no such indictment; but the logical deduction from the Senator's argument was that it was desirable to have a Trade Commission in order to compel the Department of Justice to do its duty. I maintain no such view, but I have all along been willing that a Trade Commission should be created with full authority to investigate trade conditions and to ascertain whether there be violations of the law.

The Senator made some reference to my position upon the labor question, and there was a covert innuendo—whether intentional or not I do not pretend to say—that those who now seek to have this bill recommitted have it in their hearts to defeat those sections of the bill which are favorable to labor. I do not need to repudiate any such purpose. The Senator from Montana knows that in the committee I contended for days to retain in all their strength the so-called labor provisions of this bill. He knows that I have been in favor of that kind of legislation for many years. He also knows that many men who now favor this bill in its present form were utterly opposed to the labor provisions being put in the bill.

But, sir, it is not yet necessary to defeat this entire bill with its labor provisions or to accept it with its inefficient trust provisions. The bill is still in our hands. We have the right to send it back to conference and to demand that our conferees shall endeavor to perfect it. That is the position I take on the bill.

I say frankly, if it is not referred back, if we must accept this bill as it is now or defeat its labor provisions, I and every Senator will be put to the necessity of answering the question whether he will defeat the good labor provisions because there are bad antitrust provisions in the bill. The gentlemen who have brought in these antitrust provisions are hoping, as usual, that labor, on its sturdy back, shall bear the burden; that the labor provisions of the bill will carry through these provisions that are without merit, that will be a disappointment to the country, and that are in the teeth of our platform declarations.

Mr. President, I should not have made these remarks at all except for the somewhat personal, and I thought very unfair, statements of the Senator from Montana.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] made a speech here upon the question of tying contracts, and the relation of the Shoe Machinery Trust thereto. A citizen of my State who is engaged in the shoe manufacturing business has prepared a statement and sent it to me asking that it be laid before the Senate, and without stopping to read it, I ask that there may be printed in the RECORD the statement which I now send to the desk. I will say in conclusion that if anyone has been misled or is wavering on account of the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts, it is my opinion that if he will read this reply, of which I am not the author, the mind of such a Senator will be disabused and the Senator's argument will be found answered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the statement will be so printed.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Senator WEEKS in his speech in the Senate in defense of the United Shoe Machinery Co. discusses, as do the officials of that company and its publicity agents, all matters pertaining to shoe machinery except the real issue.

This issue is simplicity itself. It, however, has taken a very complex form, owing to the numerous articles appearing in the public press and the advertisements of the United Shoe Machinery Co., which have treated almost every subject in shoe machinery except the principal one, which is the restricted leases of the United Shoe Machinery Co., which prohibit competition.

He praises the policy of this company and exploits the small shoe manufacturer much as the common people are made an issue in politics, but he does not say one word about the small shoe-machinery manufacturer.

He treats alone of the subjects that the United Co. have had in the public press from one end of the country to the other for the last few years.

Senator WEEKS says:

"It is true that the United Shoe Machinery Co. is now being proceeded against by the Government, which has asked for a dissolution of the company. That in itself should be sufficient reason, I think, why legislation should not be passed which is going to affect the operations of that company.

"Under the circumstances I think Congress might well refrain from legislating in a way which is intended to affect directly that great industry until our courts have determined what course should be taken."

This argument is in entire accord with the past and present policy of the United Shoe Machinery Co.

In this instance delay means a harvest to the company of millions of dollars as between the present and the time the Government suit is decided by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Will the Senator inform us how any laws against trusts can be enacted if such laws are not to affect trusts now being "proceeded against"?

The Senator apparently forgets the protests of the people of his own State against these very restrictions of the United Shoe Machinery Co.'s leases.

PUBLIC OPINION RE LEASES.

The restrictive leases with tying clauses were put out by the United Shoe Machinery Co. in 1901. At that time and for years thereafter there was a continual demand among the shoe manufacturers the country over for the removal of these restrictive leases.

The following excerpts from the trade papers and press express the views of the trade and people regarding these leases, showing the opinions in 1901, 1907, and 1911:

Leases of the United Shoe Machinery Co. in 1901:

"The fact is the great strides made by American inventors and manufacturers of shoe machinery were made under competitive conditions. It has been so and will be so again. As sure as day succeeds the night the establishment of a virile opposition to the present machinery monopoly will bring to life new ideas and appliances in this field as the showers and sunshine bring forth the flowers of the fields." (Shoe and Leather Gazette, Feb. 23, 1901.)

"All 'handcuff clauses' ought to come out of those leases before they are signed." (Shoe and Leather Reporter, Jan. 3, 1901.)

Leases of the United Shoe Machinery Co. in 1907:

"No person, firm, corporation, or association shall insert in or make it a condition or provision of any sale or lease of any tool, implement, appliance, or machinery that the purchaser or lessee thereof shall not buy, lease, or use machinery, tools, implements, or appliances or material or merchandise of any person, firm, corporation, or association, other than such vendor or lessor." (Extract, "shoe-machinery bill," enacted by Massachusetts Legislature, 1907.)

Leases of the United Shoe Machinery Co. in 1911:

"It was voted that this association places itself on record as in favor of a continuance of the present lease system as used by the United Shoe Machinery Co., provided such portions of the lease as operate to exclude the use of competitive machines be abolished and the penalty or charges for returning used machinery be modified or wiped out." (Brockton Shoe Manufacturers' Association, recently adopted resolution.)

The shoe-machinery issue first, last, and always—

The removal of lease restrictions which "operate to exclude the use of competitive machines."

MASSACHUSETTS LEGISLATURE, 1907.

In 1907 the Massachusetts Legislature passed a law for the purpose of invalidating the restrictive clauses of the United Co.'s leases. It was a general law and did not mention the United Co., but the circumstances then existing, as well as the wording of the act, make it clear that the controlling purpose was to rid the industry of these very tying and exclusive use clauses.

Representatives of the shoe manufacturers and of the United Co. appeared before the legislative committee and respectively advocated and opposed the bill.

The legislature sought and obtained the opinion of the supreme court of the Commonwealth as to the constitutionality of the proposed act, and asked to be advised particularly as to whether or not the act could be made to apply to machinery protected by patents. The court advised that the legislature had the power to pass such act, and could make it apply to patented as well as unpatented machinery.

LAW AS PASSED.

"To regulate the lease and sale of machinery, tools, implements, and appliances." (Acts and Resolves of Massachusetts, 1907, p. 419, ch. 469.)

The act provides:

"SECTION 1. No person, firm, corporation, or association shall insert in or make it a condition or provision of any sale or lease of any tool, implement, appliance, or machinery that the purchaser or lessee thereof shall not buy, lease, or use machinery, tools, implements, or appliances of material or merchandise of any person, firm, corporation, or association other than such vendor, or lessor; but this provision shall not impair the right, if any, of the vendor or lessor of any tool, implement, appliance, or machinery protected by a lawful patent right vested in such vendor or lessor to require by virtue of such patent right the vendee or lessee to purchase or lease from such vendor ar lessor such component and constituent parts of said tool, implement, appliance, or machinery as the vendee or lessee may thereafter require during the continuance of such patent right: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit the appointment of agents or sole agents to sell or lease machinery, tools, implements, or appliances.

"SEC. 2. Any person, firm, corporation, or association, or the agent of any such person, firm, corporation, or association that violates the provisions of this act shall be punished for each offense by a fine not exceeding $5,000.

"All leases, sales, or agreements therefor hereafter made in violation of any of the provisions of this act shall be void as to any and all of the terms or conditions thereof in violation of said provisions."

UNITED'S CONTEMPT FOR LAW.

Almost immediately after this act was passed the United Shoe Machinery Co., with characteristic adroitness, forthwith circumvented the new law. It attached to all Massachusetts leases a rider providing, in substance:

First. That all stipulations "which are in violation" of the act, "if there are any such," should be stricken out and not regarded as parts of the lease; and Second. That the United Co. should have the right to cancel the leases upon 30 days' notice.

Notwithstanding the statute denounced the restriction under severe penalties, the leases with these restrictions have remained in Massachusetts just as if no law had ever been passed.

The restrictions were outlawed in Massachusetts, yet it was perfectly plain to every shoe manufacturer that an attempt to enjoy the freedom contemplated in the statute by installing competitive machines might result in having his factory stripped of all the United machines at the end of 30 days.

United's monopoly so perfect that it did make the consequences of enforcing the law so dreaded and ruinous to the shoe manufacturers that they unhesitatingly acquiesced in its violation. They did not dare to provoke the vengeance of the United Co.

No attempt ever made to enforce the statute.

No instance in which a single corporation has overthrown a penal statute by threatening the victims of its wrongdoing with still greater injury if they invoke the law. A perfect example of the United's contempt of the law and the subjection of the shoe manufacturers to its purposes.

UNITED'S ORIGINAL ORGANIZATION—COMPETITIVE MACHINES.

Again, the Senator says: "I may well say at this point, Mr. President, that when the United Shoe Machinery Co. was formed it was a combination of three fundamental machines—the Goodyear Shoe Machinery Co., the McKay Shoe Machinery Co., and the McKay Lasting Machine Co.—all different in their purposes, one supplementary to the other, but not in any degree competitive."

But he fails to mention the Eppler Welt Machine Co., which was a distinct and considerable competitor of the Goodyear Co., and put out machines at a lower royalty.

EXCERPTS FROM THE BRIEF FOR THE UNITED STATES IN THE SUIT AGAINST UNITED SHOE MACHINERY CO.

"(1) There was active and substantial competition between Consolidated & McKay Lasting Machine Co. and Goodyear Shoe Machinery Co. in interstate trade and commerce in lasting machines, which competition was wholly destroyed by such combination, and a complete monopoly of interstate and foreign trade and commerce in such machines created thereby" (p. 10).

"(2) There was active and substantial competition between the Goodyear Shoe Machinery Co. and the Eppler Welt Machine Co. in interstate trade and commerce in welt sewing machines and out-sole stitching machines and machines auxiliary thereto, which competition was wholly destroyed by the organization of the United Shoe Machinery Co., and the conveyance thereto of the properties of said companies, and practically a complete monopoly of the interstate and foreign trade and commerce in such machines was created thereby" (p. 26).

There was before the formation of the United Shoe Machinery Co. competition in essential machines as well as other kinds of machines, and competitive machines of the same kind were used in the same factory side by side, and this continued from the formation of the United Co. in 1899 until the tying clauses which prohibited competition in essential machines were put into the United's leases in 1901.

The leases prohibited competition.

Now, in 1914 the United Co. controls the essential machines for welt work in this country to the extent of 99½ per cent; that is, 99½ per cent of all welt shoes made in this country are made on the United's machines (machine made).

On other grades of shoes (machine made) about 95 per cent of all the shoes of these grades are made on United's machines.

Of all the shoes made in this country (machine made), from 95 to 98 per cent are made on United's machines.

UNITED MACHINES.

Senator WEEKS says:

"The United Shoe Machinery Co. does not furnish the machinery which is used in making the uppers of shoes. Much of that machinery is made by the Singer Sewing Machine Co., which puts out many machines a day where the United Shoe Machinery Co. puts out one for use in the shoe-manufacturing business."

The United Co. has frequently put forth similar statements, viz, that they do not make the machines for making the uppers of boots and shoes; that such concerns as Singer, Wheeler & Wilson, Wilcox & Gibbs make these machines; and there being a greater number of upper-making machines in the shoe factories than the other machines such as the United makes, they seek to impress the public with competition in shoe machinery.

The above machines were technically never known as shoe machines, though they are used in shoe factories.

The machines of the United Co. are those used in attaching the bottoms to the uppers, and machines used in finishing the bottoms of boots and shoes.

The first machines (attaching) are known as essential machines, the latter (finishing) are known as minor machines.

ESSENTIAL MACHINES (ALWAYS LEASED, NEVER SOLD).

Lasting system.

1. Puller over (pulling upper over the last; royalty).
2. Consolidated laster (lasting sides, sometimes entire shoe; royalty).
3. Bed laster (lasting heel and toe).

Metallic system.

4. Sole tacker (tacking uppers to insole; wire; sales).
5. Loose nailer (fastening upper to insole at heel; nails; sales).
6. Slugger (inserting wire in bottom of heel; wire; sales).
7. Standard screw (attaching outersole to insole work shoe; wire; sales).

Pegging system.

8. Pegger (attaching outersole to insole; work shoes; royalty).

Heeling system.

9. Heel compressor (compressing heels; royalty).
10. Heel attacher (attaching heels; royalty).

Goodyear system.

11. Welter (sewing welt to insole; royalty).
12. Stitcher (sewing outersole to welt; royalty).

Eyeleting system.

13. Eyeleting machine (inserting eyelets to uppers; eyelets; sales).

The above machines are used in connection with auxiliary machines, which auxiliary machines are tied to the principal machines.

MINOR MACHINES.

Various minor machines, such as buffers, sole rounders, edge setters, sole cutters, and the like, are either sold outright or rented.

When rented, the price or rental is so low that no single concern can afford to make and market these machines in competition with the United Co. unless it can also make and market the principal or essential machine and from the profit derived from these essential machines make up its losses on the minor machines.

The Senator admits there is one shoe manufacturer in the United States—Richard H. Long—making men's welt shoes without the use of any of the United machines.

This is true; and he also might have said that there are three other very small concerns making welt shoes without the use of said machines.

Foreign machines are an element in all of the above-mentioned concerns.

Again, Senator WEEKS said:

"The reason why manufacturers use the machinery of the United Shoe Machinery Co. is because it is the best machinery. It is a test of efficiency, pure and simple; it is not a question of a lease or of a tying clause or of a sale or of anything of that kind."

Again we think the Senator is wrong as to his facts.

The United Shoe Machinery Co. have so completely preempted the market that no one can equip a shoe factory in the United States of any size adapted to make welt shoes with American-made machines other than those of the United Shoe Machinery Co.

How futile is the argument of the Senator that it is "the best machinery" or "efficiency" that compels the shoe manufacturer to use the machines of the United Shoe Machinery Co.!

It is the restrictions in the leases of the United Shoe Machinery Co., and those restrictions alone, that have stopped competition.

In Europe, where the field is open and where the shoe manufacturer has the privilege of determining what machinery is best adapted for his needs, there are many factories making shoes without the use of machines of the United Co., and also instances where there are competitive machines and United machines side by side in the same factory.

Nowhere in the United States to-day is any shoe manufacturer using a welter or stitcher of an outside manufacturer on welt work alongside a welter or stitcher of the United Co. This never has been permitted. When it comes to the other essential machines of the United Co. the shoe manufacturer is given the privilege of using them alongside competitive machines, but only upon making an initial payment or lease premium that from a business standpoint renders the use of competing machines prohibitive. This is, in effect, to penalize the use of competing machines and shut them out as completely as if their use was absolutely forbidden.

The policy of putting out machines without initial payment and giving efficient service without charge was old long before that concern was organized. In the early nineties Gordon McKay was forced by competition to cease requiring initial payments, and he did give free service. After the United Co. had bought up all of the competing concerns, it was able to—and did, in fact—reinaugurate the initial payments or lease premiums as a penalty for using competing machines. All of the advantages of competition among shoe-machinery concerns to shoe manufacturers were wiped out by this penalty. The United Co. characterized this practice as its wholesale and retail prices; but after all is said, whether a shoe manufacturer pays the higher or lower price depends on whether or not he used competitive machines.

The Senator extolled the inventive progress of the United Co. and mentions as an example the pulling-over machine "which has cost $1,000,000."

As a matter of fact, this invention was conceived before the United Co. was formed, and the application for its fundamental patent was made either just before or immediately after the formation of the United Shoe Machinery Co.

What the United Co. did was to perfect and refine this machine exactly as it has done with other machines that it took over.

Progress in shoe machinery since the formation of the United Shoe Machinery Co. is not comparable with the progress made in shoe machinery during the 10 years preceding its formation.

THE UNITED SHOE MACHINERY CO. NEVER "BLAZED A TRAIL."

It is a law of economics that progress and efficiency are greatest where there is competition, not where there is monopoly. This applies to the United Shoe Machinery Co

Senator WEEKS says, in substance, that the United Shoe Machinery Co. (composed of some 50 or more concerns) prevents a trust of shoe manufacturers. (There are about 1,200 shoe manufacturers in the United States.)

The nearest approach to a trust of shoe manufacturers in this country is the aggregation of shoe manufacturers owned by and allied with the United Shoe Machinery Co.

The Senator makes prominent the fact that the United Shoe Machinery Co. leases its machines without cost to the shoe manufacturer.

This is true. It is also true that when the United Co. leases machines without any initial payment they put into the lease a return premium, so that when a shoe manufacturer returns the machines he must pay the United Co. a large sum of money as a return charge.

This return premium constitutes a distinct liability of the shoe manufacturer and is so considered by bankers extending credit to shoe manufacturers.

The initial payment is transferred from the beginning of a lease period to the end of a lease period.

Senator WEEKS exploits the small shoe manufacturer and says, in substance, that were it not for the protective system of the United Co. the small shoe manufacturer might have to go out of business.

As the "small manufacturers" existed in larger numbers and thrived, and many became large manufacturers long before the shoe machinery combination of 1899 was effected, there is no logical reason to suppose or believe that if again afforded the benefits of competition in shoe machinery they would not flourish and be as successful as in ante-combination days

It has been claimed that the essential machinery of the "small manufacturer" costs him "nothing"—a claim which is antagonistic to the truism that "no one gets something for nothing." Technically, perhaps—or through a play upon words—this claim may be generally regarded as within the facts. The "small manufacturer" obtains such machinery from the United Co. without initial payment. At this time, however, he executes a contract under which he assumes obligations of paying return premiums and cost of repairing the machines when they are returned to their owner—the combination—upon the termination of the lease period, or previously, if he discontinues business before that time. Thus he assumes a substantial liability when executing the contract under which he obtains his machinery for "nothing."

During the contract period the "small manufacturer" pays for everything he gets. He pays a substantial royalty on every pair of shoes manufactured by him for the use of the combination's machinery and for all parts and repairs to such machinery, all of such payments being obligations under the contract, concerning which the "small manufacturer" has no voice. The "small manufacturer" is aware of these facts, and is under no illusion of receiving benefits for which he does not pay in full.

Senator WEEKS says:

"Now, if it were necessary to buy such machines at a cost of $3,000 or $3,500, in addition to the great number of other machines which are necessary in making a shoe, it would be impossible for the smaller shoe manufacturers to purchase sufficient equipment to conduct their business."

In Europe, where there is competition in all kinds of shoe machinery, machines can be purchased on the installment plan, which monthly installments are made equal, in many cases, to the monthly royalty of the United Co. on the same type of machine purchased.

When these installments are paid, the title of the machine passes to the purchaser and becomes an asset of his business, whereas the lease of a United machine constitutes a liability of said manufacturer.

In the end the foreign manufacturer has paid for his machine by installments equal to the sum of the royalties he would have paid on the United machine for the same period, and thereafter owns his machine and has to pay no royalty.

Were it not for the lease restriction of the United Co., the same condition would exist in the United States.

If the United Co. continues its monopoly and they adopt the policy of selling their essential machines, the manufacturers might have to pay $3,000 apiece.

If there was competition, as there is abroad, they would probably sell on the same basis as their competitors, which abroad is from $500 to $1,000, according to the machine

Abroad you can buy outright welters, stitchers, heelers, lasters, sluggers, loose nailers, pullers over from $500 to $1,000 apiece, according to the machine.

Mr. Fish, in his closing argument in the Government suit, says: "The machines have been patented machines, always patented, and likely to be patented for an indefinite time in the future, because this art is not in the slightest degree exhausted or saturated or finished."

Thus by interlocking patents their monopoly will be perpetual.

Interlocking patents make possible interlocking leases.

Interlocking leases perpetuate the monopoly.

Interlocking leases deprive the public of the right to use and to make machines of expired patents.

"The grant of a patent of the United States is a contract between the American public and the patentee where, in consideration of a full disclosure of the invention, through specifications and drawings filed at the Patent Office, the patentee is granted a monopoly in the invention for 17 years, at the end of which time the invention is to be open to the public to make, use, and vend."

Perhaps Senator WEEKS can explain why the citizens of the United States should be deprived of the right to use shoe machinery of expired patents.

Senator WEEKS says:

"I want to emphasize that by saying that when an improvement on a machine is made by the United Co., it takes out the old machine and puts in the new one without any cost to the manufacturer."

The United Co. have always, when the patents of a machine were about to expire, taken out the old machine and replaced it with a new machine which had new patents.

The United Co. always scrap the old machines.

The effect of this was, first, to get the old machine out of the reach of the manufacturer, and, second, to prolong the life of their monopoly by interlocking patents and interlocking leases.

ROYALTIES.

Senator WEEKS says:

"The highest possible machinery cost in making shoes is less than 6 cents a pair. The average is 2⅞ cents a pair. There are some grades of shoes where the cost is less than 1 cent a pair. On all the McKay shoes, not Goodyear shoes, manufactured in this country the machinery cost averages 1¼ cents a pair. It is the only element entering into the manufacture of shoes which has not increased in cost since the organization of the United Shoe Machinery Co. in 1899."

Just prior to the formation of the United Co. there were many essential machines in this country that were sold outright without any royalty, and some put out at a less royalty than is now being charged.

Competition before 1899 was lessening the price or cost to the shoe manufacturer of essential machines.

After the formation of the United Shoe Machinery Co. they put out no essential machines except on a royalty and bought or traded for practically all that had been sold outright, and also eliminated by trading out all the essential machines that prior to their formation had been put out at a less royalty than they are now charging.

Without the restrictive leases it is fair to assume that the conditions in this country would be exactly as they are in Europe, and the manufacturers would then have the privilege of selecting machines best adapted for his business.

The royalty, including the indirect royalty on materials used, in many instances is greater than the manufacturing profit of the shoe manufacturer.

Senator WEEKS says:

"The International Shoe Co. comes nearer than any other concern in the word to being a shoe trust, and it is constantly reaching out for more. The only thing that stands in its way is the United Shoe Machinery Co., and that, in my judgment, accounts for its animus against that company.

"It is not necessary for me to discuss any other phase of this attack on the United Shoe Machinery Co., as applied to large companies, than simply to give the details which I have given of the organization of the International Shoe Co. It in itself, as far as it can be, is a combination intended to dominate the shoe-manufacturing business in the section of the South and Southwest which is tributary to its factories, and, as far as it has been able to do it, it has done so, so that to-day it is the largest shoe-manufacturing concern in the world. All of the attacks—and the records bear me out in this statement—that are made on the United Shoe Machinery Co. are made by concerns similar to the International Shoe Co., big people doing a large business, who want to get their machines at wholesale prices and under such conditions that the small manufacturer can not buy them. That is the animus behind this whole attack."

The United Shoe Machinery Co. controls about 97 per cent of the shoe-machinery business of this country.

The International Shoe Co. controls about 7 per cent of the shoe business of this country.

The United Shoe Machinery Co. have practically no competition.

The International Shoe Co. has at least a thousand competitors.

Why this comparison?

There is no animus among the shoe manufacturers against the United Co. as Senator WEEKS would have us believe.

Shoe manufacturers want the privilege now as they had prior to 1899 of determining what machines are best adapted for their own use, in their own factories, and in their business, exactly as the European manufacturer has.

Shoe manufacturers are not such fools as to use inferior machines and spoil their goods and ruin their business.

The Senator does not give the shoe manufacturers of the United States the credit of having ordinary common sense.

It is only from the standpoint of the United Shoe Machinery Co. that paternalism is urged.

If the United Shoe Machinery Co. can continue to hold the shoe manufacturers of the United States in leash, they can continue to collect their pound of flesh, and in no other way.

As the Senator has not informed the Senate as to the real cause of the time contract, a statement of the president of the United Shoe Machinery Co., and comments thereon, will be enlightening.

THE CRUX OF THE SHOE-MACHINERY SITUATION—MR. WINSLOW'S ADMISSION.

[Reprinted from the issue of July 29, 1911.]

CHAPTER VIII.

AT THE STATE HOUSE.

To the Editor of the Weekly Bulletin:

If the account of the shoe machinery hearing of yesterday, as reported by the daily papers, is correct, it seems that the whole matter sums itself down to this: That Mr. Winslow has finally admitted—

"Mr. Winslow said that his company doesn't offer to furnish a lasting machine to be used in conjunction with another man's machines. If it did, its machines would sit idle in the shops while the machines which do not pay a royalty were used."

Which evidently means that his company will not place its lasting machine in a factory to be used side by side with a competitive lasting machine, for the reason that, if it did, its lasting machine would "sit idle" and the competitive lasting machine would do the work.

If this is correct, does it not apply to all of Mr. Winslow's company's essential machines, and might he not as well have said, "We will not place our welter and stitcher in a factory with a competitive welter and stitcher, for the reason that the competitive welter and stitcher will do the work and our machines will 'sit idle'"; or that "We will not place our metallic system in a factory with a competitive metallic system, for the reason that our metallic system will 'sit idle' and the competitive metallic system will do the work"; or that "We will not place our heeling machine in a factory with a competitive heeling machine, for the reason that the competitive heeling machine will do the work and our machine will 'sit idle'"?

Apparently Mr. Winslow has been finally forced squarely and flatly against the issue involved, and, brushing aside technicalities and claims to general beneficence, admits that if he allows competition his machines will "sit idle" and that competitive machines will do the work. In the last analysis, does it not mean that if Mr. Winslow's essential machines—and I take it for granted that his lasting machine is included in his essential machines—are used competitively they will stop; if they stop, they pay no royalty; if they pay no royalty, the major portion of the earnings of his company cease?

In other words, has not Mr. Winslow, in substance, admitted that his company can not stand competition and does not propose to?

In all shoe-machinery discussions there has been nothing that so clearly states the whole situation as the letter of the W. H. McElwain Co. and the statement of the Shoe Manufacturers' Alliance, as follows:

THE POSITION OF SHOE MANUFACTURERS.

[W. H. McElwain Co., makers of shoes. General offices, 348 Congress Street, Boston.]

JANUARY 8, 1912.

E. S. GILE, Esq.,
Editor The Weekly Bulletin, Boston, Mass.

DEAR SIR: You have asked us as to whether we agree with the position of the Brockton Shoe Manufacturers' Association with respect to the policy of the United Shoe Machinery Co. We absolutely agree with this position, namely:

"That this association places itself on record as in favor of a continuance of the present lease system as used by the United Shoe Machinery Co., provided such provisions of the lease as operate to exclude the use of competitive machines be abolished and the penalty or charges for returning used machines be modified or wiped out."

Freedom for fair competition in shoe machinery, we are convinced, is desirable from the standpoint of the manufacturer, who wishes the right to elect what machinery he shall use; from the standpoint of those who may wish to engage in the manufacture of shoe machinery; and from the standpoint of the consumer, who is the ultimate beneficiary of any improvement in the conditions of production.

We believe that shoe manufacturers should be able to use in their business such machinery, of any machinery manufacturer, as may from time to time seem best fitted for their needs. Such a possibility, in our opinion, does not now exist and can not be brought about unless—

1. The "tying clauses" are expunged from the leases of the company; and

2. A system is adopted whereby the shoe manufacturer, using only machines of this company, is given no preferential treatment in respect to prices, rentals, royalties, or service over the manufacturer employing to some extent machinery of other machinery makers.

We believe that the United Shoe Machinery Co. is in many respects rendering efficient service to shoe manufacturers. Our relations with its officers, employees, and agents have been friendly and pleasant. We have sufficient confidence in the strength of this company to believe that it will stand in the forefront of shoe-machinery makers even with the removal of the restrictions which have been mentioned. Its position, however, would then be based upon the firm foundations of efficient service to the community and would be regulated by the possibility of a fair and healthy competition.

Yours, truly,

W. H. MCELWAIN CO.,
J. F. MCELWAIN, President.

Extract from supplemental brief for the United States:

AN EXTRACT FROM THE SUPPLEMENTAL BRIEF FOR THE UNITED STATES IN THE CASE OF THE UNITED STATES V. THE UNITED SHOE MACHINERY CO.

"Shoe Manufacturers' Alliance and the evidence furnished by it.

"This is an organization consisting of some half a dozen large manufacturers who have been active in their opposition to the United Shoe Machinery Co. It consists of Charles H. Jones, of the Commonwealth Shoe & Leather Co.; Jackson Johnson; Henry Peters; Frank C. Rand, formerly of Roberts, Johnson & Rand, now of the International Shoe Machinery Co.; Milton Florsheim; and Emanuel Selz." (Jones, record, pp. 792–793.)

The above statement is inaccurate and misleading in that the testimony of Jones did not state that the Shoe Manufacturers' Alliance consisted only of the shoe manufacturers named. What he did testify to was that these manufacturers had been members of the Shoe Manufacturers' Alliance. In this connection the following circular, printed in the Weekly Bulletin, of Boston, Mass., a trade publication, issue of January 20, 1912 (p. 7), is quoted herewith:

"INVITATION TO JOIN ALLIANCE.

"We invite you to become a member of the Shoe Manufacturers' Alliance.

"The alliance was organized to restore competitive conditions in shoe machinery. Its membership now comprises the manufacturers of about 40 per cent of all the shoes produced in the United States. The general aim of the alliance is to secure for manufacturers some voice in the direction of the shoe machinery department of their own business. The purpose of the organization is set forth more specifically in the resolutions unanimously adopted at the meeting of the alliance held at Cincinnati on June 29, 1911, as follows:

"'The purpose of this organization (the Shoe Manufacturers' Alliance) is to secure to shoe manufacturers the right to use in their business such machines as may seem to them from time to time best fitted for their needs, and to remove conditions which now discourage the invention and development of shoe machinery.

"'We believe that to accomplish this purpose it is necessary to secure a change in the methods now pursued by the United Shoe Machinery Corporation, which to-day in effect monopolizes the shoe machinery business in this country through its system of leases (with tying clauses) under which shoe manufacturers are now compelled to operate.

"'We believe it to be essential that shoe machinery, whether it be leased or sold, be put out on such terms as will leave the manufacturer free to take from the United or from any other company one or more of the same or of different machines at a fixed unit price.

"'We believe the adoption of such a method will alone remove the restraint upon the invention and development of shoe machinery from which the trade now suffers and will secure a reduction in the unnecessary cost of manufacturing shoes, due to the present demand of the United Co., and which imposes undue burdens upon the manufacturer and consumer.'

"At present practically all of the essential machinery used in bottoming shoes in this country is owned by a single corporation, which is dominated practically by one man. This is a condition permitting the exercise of complete and arbitrary control of our business. It is contrary to the very spirit of liberty and as such humiliating to us as shoe manufacturers. It also necessarily tends to retard and to restrict improvements in shoe machinery.

"That it does so restrict development will be clear to those who compare the progress of shoe machinery during the last 12 years with the advances made from year to year prior to that date. Shoe manufacturing in America is to-day efficient, and much of that efficiency is due to the extraordinary advances in shoe machinery made prior to the organization of the Shoe Machinery Trust. Nearly every one of the 30 years prior to 1900 witnessed some marked advance in shoe machinery. That was a period of open competition in the production of shoe machinery. Those who controlled the successful inventions reaped rich rewards. The activities of inventors and mechanics were stimulated, and the results were revolutionary in character. Wages increased, but the unit labor cost of producing shoes was being continually and substantially lowered.

"Since 1900 the development in essential shoe machinery has not been marked by any important invention materially reducing the cost or improving the quality of work. Such new inventions as have been made are confined to details of minor consequence, as compared with the advances made prior to the formation of the Shoe Machinery Trust. This check upon the development of essential shoe machinery is believed to be a necessary result of the formation of the combination. It has removed the stimulus of competition.

"The alliance makes no attack upon the leasing system as such. Its protest is against methods which suppress competition. That protest is voiced also by the resolution recently adopted by the Brockton Shoe Manufacturers' Association, as follows:

"'That this association places itself on record as in favor of the continuance of the present lease system as used by the United Shoe Machinery Co., provided such portions of the lease as operate to exclude the use of competitive machines be abolished and the penalty or charges for returning used machinery be modified or wiped out.'

"The Federal Government has undertaken to suppress the illegal operations of the Shoe Machinery Trust, but relief can not be had through Government prosecution alone. It is essential that those directly and vitally interested in the restoration of competition should cooperate to that end, and it is hoped that you will do your part.

"Awaiting your reply,

"Yours, very truly,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER].

Mr. GRONNA. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Fletcher	Nelson	Smith, Ariz.
Bankhead	Gore	Norris	Smith, Md.
Bristow	Gronna	O'Gorman	Smoot
Bryan	Hollis	Oliver	Swanson
Burton	Jones	Owen	Thomas
Camden	Lane	Page	Thornton
Chamberlain	McCumber	Penrose	West
Chilton	Martin, Va.	Perkins	White
Culberson	Martine, N. J.	Reed	Williams
du Pont	Myers	Sheppard

Mr. THOMAS. I was requested to announce that the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] is absent on account of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Thirty-nine Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of the absentees.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. SHAFROTH, Mr. SHIVELY, and Mr. STONE answered to their names when called.

Mr. SIMMONS, Mr. WARREN, Mr. MCLEAN, Mr. JOHNSON, Mr. SMITH of South Carolina, Mr. STERLING, and Mr. BORAH entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The question before the Senate is the motion submitted by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] that the further consideration of the conference report be postponed until the first Monday in December, 1914.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, before the motion is put I wish to say a few words, but I will not detain the Senate long.

I had hoped that when this measure came into the Senate we would have a bill which would provide a remedy for the existing condition, and would be something positive. I did not desire to secure the passage of a bill for the mere purpose of punishing some one, but I was and am in favor of the passage of a measure which would put a stop to unfair business methods. I suppose it to be necessary to provide a penalty in order to enforce a law that will be of any practical benefit to the people of this country.

If it is true, as is conceded here, that the Sherman antitrust law supplies every remedy which this bill is supposed to afford there is no use whatever in passing the measure. If, on the other hand, it affords a loophole and an indirect method by which those who are guilty of practicing these unfair methods upon the people can escape from being brought to justice under the Sherman law, then it is more than an innocuous measure, it is a dangerous one. It is in that event an evil measure and one which ought to be defeated in fairness to the people of this country.

The Democratic Party has gone before the people in the past and pledged itself that it would undertake to enact legislation in Congress which would relieve the people of this country from certain onerous and unfair business methods and conditions which impoverish the people, and which bring misery upon millions and millions of innocent people who are not in any wise to blame for the unfortunate condition in which they find themselves. This bill merely states that these methods are wrong, and they are declared to be unlawful, and that is all, and there is nothing in the way of any penalty by which they may be stopped.

I was reading in the Washington Times of Saturday an item which I think will interest the Members of the Senate. Here is a bill for which the Democratic Party, of which I am a member, stands sponsor, which pretends to eliminate discrimination in prices and to protect honest business men against unfair competitors, but fails to do so.

Last Saturday my attention was attracted to an item which I will read to you. It is dated Wilmington, Del., October 3:

TWO MONTHS' TERM FOR 2-CENT THEFT OF MILK.

WILMINGTON, DEL., October 3.

Two months' imprisonment for stealing 2 cents' worth of milk was the sentence imposed upon John Peters, 21, in the Newcastle county court here. He was indicted for the theft of a half pint of milk, worth 2 cents, and a bottle, worth 4 cents.

For the theft of 6 cents' worth of property—2 cents' worth of milk and a bottle worth 4 cents—this man went to jail for two months.

Now, that is what we can accomplish when we legislate to punish the small criminal, the least harmful one, the man who does the least damage to the community through his criminal instincts and methods and practices. But when we reach out for the large business man, who uses his wealth and his power to grind down and impoverish others—and practically does deprive them dishonestly of their world's goods—we provide no punishment. We provide no penalty which would absolutely forbid or make him afraid to continue his dishonest methods; but the little fellow, like this man over in Delaware, who steals 2 cents' worth of milk—who, perhaps, was hungry, and could not have stolen 2 cents' worth of milk for profit—he gets two months in jail. As to the larger, the enormous combinations, who are literally rotting this country, rotting its Government, rotting its citizenship, setting an example to young folks, showing that the best method for them to pursue if they are to prosper and wax fat in their line is not by honest industry and fair dealing, but by unfair advantage and grasping methods, we have no remedy; we provide no penalty for such men as that or for such combinations.

I would say—and I will close in saying it—that I went out on the platform to the people who sent me here and represented to them that if the opportunity were given to me I would do all in my power to put a stop to such methods of carrying on the business affairs of this country, without malice, without prejudice, without endeavoring to unjustly take one penny away from any corporation or business man, however rich he may be, if he had honestly obtained it, without any attempt to seek revenge upon him, but in the hope that it would be for the benefit of the country and in the realization that if we do not put a stop to it the country as a nation will go down to ruin.

The little fellow who went to jail for stealing 2 cents' worth of milk is one of the class of criminals all over this country who get punished. I have seen a man go to the penitentiary for five years for stealing a $5 pair of pantaloons, five years of hard labor—the first year pitching pig iron—for stealing $5 worth of property. Pig iron is rough; it is hard to handle. It had been molded in sand, and the skin came off the palms of his hands. They were raw, and the blood was trickling down between his fingers. He protested to the foreman and asked to be allowed some other easier work until such time as his hands got well. It was against the rules for him to talk, and the foreman took him to the superintendent. He told the warden, "I am glad to be brought before you; you are a man of education and of intelligence or you would not be warden of this institution. I am glad to be able to present my case to you."

I knew the superintendent. He was neither a man of intelligence nor honesty.

Mr. MYERS. May I ask a question? In what State prison was this—the State prison of Oregon?

Mr. LANE. It was; that is the condition which existed in the past. A decided relief was brought about when my friend Senator CHAMBERLAIN became governor. The condition before that time was different.

What happens to small malefactors? The little fellow goes to jail for 2 cents' worth of milk, and the other man goes to the penitentiary for five years for stealing a $5 pair of pantaloons; and the people who know about it know that this Senate, this body, will not place a penalty upon men of larger fortunes who are unjustly acquiring millions upon millions of dollars equally as unfairly, and they become discontented. They lose their respect for Congress and for the law. Later along they are to be seen carrying red flags down the streets; they become anarchists; and we by our methods of lawmaking are breeding them here. This kind of legislation is one of the causes for the discontent.

I hope that the Democratic Party, the party of the people, that announces its allegiance to the principle of Thomas Jefferson of "equal rights to all and special privileges to none," equal law to all, equal punishment to all, will be big enough now, when the time is ripe and the occasion is here, to rise up and meet the situation, and, as I said, without prejudice and without any attempt to do any injustice to any man, be he rich or poor, place a sufficient penalty upon these practices to put a stop to them.

I feel almost sure that, after having made this appeal to you, you will vote to recommit the conference report to the committee in order that it may be done.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I move to lay the motion of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Texas to lay the motion of the Senator from North Dakota on the table.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I trust the Senator from Texas will withdraw that motion. We are about to reach a vote. There is no occasion for doing anything except to proceed in the ordinary way.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Question!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it. The ayes have it, and the motion to lay on the table is agreed to.

Mr. REED. Mr President, I move that the bill be recommitted and that the conferees be instructed to insist upon the insertion into the bill of the criminal penalties substantially as they were contained in the House bill at the time that bill was passed by the House; and, further, to insist that the word "heretofore," which was stricken out of the section relating to the use of decrees in evidence in other cases, shall be reinserted in the bill.

Mr. CULBERSON. I raise the point of order that the motion of the Senator from Missouri is out of order in the form presented.

Mr. MARTINE of new Jersey. Mr. President, before the vote shall be taken, if we are about to vote, and as I understand the proposition——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair must rule on the point of order. The Chair, upon investigation of the entire course of procedure in the Senate of the United States, has discovered that the Senate has done about everything with reference to conference reports. It has rereferred them with instructions; it has rereferred them without instructions; it has laid them on the table; it has indefinitely postponed the consideration of such reports. Precedents could be found, the Chair thinks, for ruling upon either side of the question. The Chair, however, believes that the Senate of the United States voted for a full and free conference upon the question of this bill. To send it back to the committee with instructions would not be a full and free conference. The Chair thinks that to send it back to the committee with such instructions would be simply to serve notice upon the House of Representatives and upon the conferees that the bill must be in certain particulars as the Senate of the United States has determined it should be or that there should be no bill.

The Chair desires to thank the Senate of the United States, because, while he knew this matter was under discussion, he is proud to say that no Senator has suggested what the ruling of the Chair should be. After much consideration of the question and full knowledge upon the part of the Chair that the Senate will do as it pleases about the matter, the Chair desires to state that he does not believe that when the Senate has voted for a full and free conference it can return the bill to the conferees with instructions as to what they shall do touching an agreement between the two Houses. The Chair believes that he is justified in making this ruling, for the reasons, first, that such an instruction as that would be service of notice upon the House of Representatives that it must consent to the things which the Senate desires to put into the bill; and, secondly, that there having been now a week of full discussion on the conference report, and the objections to it being thoroughly understood by the conferees upon the part of the Senate, a speedier agreement between the two bodies is to be reached—and that is always the thing to be looked after in parliamentary procedure—by concurring in the conference report, if the Senate desires to concur in it, and, if not, by rejecting the conference report, whereupon the matter will go back to a full and free conference and the conferees will know the objections the Senate of the United States has to the conference report.

The Chair is therefore, in the light of the later decisions of the Senate, and manifestly in conformity with the principles that ought to govern a full and free conference, compelled to sustain the point of order.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, of course I understand the conclusion reached by the Chair, but there is one part of the Vice President's remarks that I am not sure I understand; that is, the Senate having voted for a full and free conference, to return the bill to conference with instructions to the Senate conferees would be in the face or teeth of the previous instructions. If that is any controlling consideration in the mind of the Chair, I desire to change the form of the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will say to the Senator from Missouri that changing the form would not change the opinion of the Chair. An appeal is a matter of right, and it will be cheerfully granted for the consideration and determination of the Senate; but the Chair can not see how there can be a full and free conference between the conferees of the House and the conferees of the Senate if instructions go to the conferees of the Senate as to what they shall do. That does not seem to the Chair to be a full and free conference.

Mr. REED. That is the point the Chair dwelt upon, and I was asking the question whether it would make any difference if the motion were changed to refer the bill back to the conferees without instructions.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. BORAH. In the orderly course of procedure the vote would come on the mere question of the adoption of the report of the conference committee. If that report were rejected, it would go back to the conference committee, with the benefit which they would have from the discussion which has taken place; which, in my opinion, would accomplish what the Senator from Missouri desires to accomplish.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield to me for a moment?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I agree with what the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has stated; but I believe, Mr. President, that, under the rules, the motion to recommit is in order. Not only that, but I believe that under the rules of the Senate the motion to recommit is a privileged question, and I should dislike to see any ruling made to the effect that the motion to recommit was not in order. I wish to say——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. Just a word further. I wish to say that the result of a vote on the adoption of the report would be just as the Senator from Idaho has indicated; but I believe that any Senator, under the rules of the Senate, has the right to move to recommit; that that is a privileged question and for a purpose; and I believe that the Senator from Missouri is well within his rights when he makes that motion, but not if he makes the motion with instructions.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah if he thinks that a motion pending to bring the two Houses together has not preference over any motion pending to keep them apart and as to whether the privileged motion to adopt a conference report has not preference over a motion to recommit?

Mr. SMOOT. The question of the adoption of a conference report, Mr. President, is not a privileged question. The question of presenting a conference report is privileged, and the question of recommitting a bill of any kind is a privileged question under Rule XXII.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I take the position that any motion pending to bring the two Houses together has preference over a motion which keeps them apart; and I think the Senator, upon examining Jefferson's Manual, will find that to be the general declaration; and, upon examining the House and Senate rules, he will find that to be the special declaration.

Mr. SMOOT. The object of the motion to recommit the bill to the conferees would be for the purpose of bringing the two Houses together. If a majority of the Senate desire the bill to be reconsidered by the conferees, then they will vote "yea"; but if there is a majority that is not in favor of it, they will vote "nay." The question itself, however, is a privileged question, and the Senator from Missouri, I believe, has a right to make that motion, but he had no right, in my opinion, to make the motion to recommit with instructions.

Mr. CULBERSON. I understood, Mr. President, that the Chair had ruled the motion out of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has sustained the point of order as to the first motion. The Chair now understands that the Senator from Missouri moves to recommit the conference report to the committee of conference.

Mr. CULBERSON. I myself did not understand that the Senator from Missouri had made any such motion. He may have made it.

Mr. REED. I indicated pretty clearly what I desired to do.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was not exactly in form, but the discussion started before the Senator from Missouri had concluded.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I make the motion to recommit the conference report, and I want to say this: What I desire, and what I think the Senate ought to be willing to give on this bill, is a square vote upon the question whether the Senate wants to strike out the criminal penalties of the bill. Against that a point of order has been injected. The Chair has ruled, under the precedents, that, in his opinion, that motion can not be made if the point of order is made. I have no desire to delay this matter a moment. I should like to have had a vote on that question; but as I can not get it without an appeal from the decision of the Chair, which would probably involve a long discussion and probably an affirmance of the Chair's decision, and as I do not want to engage in the slightest cavil about it, I make the motion now that the conference report be recommitted.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, is that motion now before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is before the Senate.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Then I desire, Mr. President, to make a brief statement. I have received to-day a number of telegrams from trades-unions and workingmen. One goes on to say:

MY DEAR MARTINE: You have ever been a true friend of labor. We therefore appeal to you to sustain the Clayton antitrust bill.

Another reads:

In behalf of the trainmen and other railroad employees of New Jersey I urge you to stand by the Clayton trust bill.

True enough, as this telegram says, I have ever been the friend of labor. I have been brought up with the laboring man from my early youth; I left school at 12 years of age, and since then I have been a worker. My sympathies have naturally been with the laboring man, and they are touched and aroused on the labor question. Wherever their case needed a sponsor or a defender I have been their defender, not for the purpose of elevation or the hope of reward, but because of the fact that the principles of honest labor were so deeply instilled within me that I could not rid myself of them if I would.

I stood in favor of the Clayton antitrust bill when it was first presented from the House, because, as I said on Friday last, I believed it was a step in the direction of aiding men in business and in the general walks of life who were under the ban of and were being crushed by the mighty influence of combinations of money; and God knows there is no State in this Union that has seen more of such evils than we have had in New Jersey. So, in all sincerity and earnestness, I stood for the Clayton antitrust bill as it originally came from the House; but as I have seen it since it left the hands of the conferees, emasculated and changed, I have felt, as I have expressed myself before and as I express myself now, that it is not in the interest of labor. Even though there are some few lines in the bill favoring labor and laboring organizations, yet there is an evil lurking beneath it all which more than counterbalances all the blessings that might come to labor from it.

Mr. President, since I can not vote to recommit this bill, I shall then have to vote to reject the conference report. I can not believe that there is a man in the Senate or in the other House who would dare, in the face of the enlightened sentiment which to-day pervades this land, to stand up against legitimate labor organizations or oppose the declaration that labor is not a commodity. It would be his death knell politically; but, better and higher and loftier than that, I trust that no man would be imbued with the sentiment of considering labor as a commodity—lofty, honest labor, earning its bread, according to the edict of our God, by the sweat of its brow.

I say to these men: "My friends, men with whom I have conferred, men with whom I have advised as to the wisest and best way to recognize legitimate and honest labor, there are none of you in any State of this Union or outside of it that will charge, whatever my vote may be, that my heart is arrayed against labor in this struggle and strife for daily bread and butter. I oppose this measure because I believe that some influence—I can not say what influence, but some influence, it seems to me uncanny, dangerous to the Republic—has changed the text and character of the bill until it does not stand for the smaller man or the middle man, but tends to advance to further supremacy the giant monopolies that you and I, in both platforms, have pledged ourselves to destroy, and for whose destruction these many years we have struggled."

Since the ruling of the Chair is as it is, I shall have to vote most regretfully against this measure, trusting, believing—yes, knowing—that the eternal principles of right and justice will again triumph in the formulation of another bill, and that it will not have to run the gantlet that this unfortunate measure seems to have had to run.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question, if he will permit me.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Yes; go ahead.

Mr. LANE. Does not the Senator from New Jersey think that the small bit of relief which is given in section 20 to the laboring man will cost him tenfold, indirectly, through the other provisions of the bill?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Why, unquestionably, sir.

Mr. LANE. And that it is in no wise to his benefit?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. None whatever. It is the cheapest sort of sop that can be offered to a laboring man. You have always, whenever you did get in power, saddled many of these men on the back of labor. You are the laborer's friend now, but in ninety-nine cases out of one hundred in which you have had the opportunity to declare and to declaim yourselves you have treated it as a jest and as an absurdity.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I move, as a substitute for the motion of the Senator from Missouri, that the Senate agree to the conference report.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the motion of the Senator from Missouri being a privileged question, I do not believe the motion made by the Senator from Texas is in order.

Mr. CULBERSON. The motion of the Senator from Missouri is not a privileged matter. A motion to agree to a conference report takes precedence of all other motions on the subject.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Chair to Rule XXII:

PRECEDENCE OF MOTIONS.

When a question is pending, no motion shall be received but—
To adjourn.
To adjourn to a day certain, or that when the Senate adjourn it shall be to a day certain.
To take a recess.
To proceed to the consideration of executive business.
To lay on the table.
To postpone indefinitely.
To postpone to a day certain.
To commit.
To amend.
Which several motions shall have precedence as they stand arranged; and the motions relating to adjournment, to take a recess, to proceed to the consideration of executive business, to lay on the table, shall be decided without debate.

This looks to me very much like a privileged motion. I call the attention of the Chair now to Gilfry's Precedents, page 889, paragraph 4, which was handed to me by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN], and which reads:

It is in order in the Senate to recommit a conference report to the committee of conference, but not with instructions.

I am very sorry the sponsors for this bill are not willing to give the Senate the opportunity to vote squarely on whether it wants criminal clauses in the bill. It would be interesting to have that question before the Senate. It ought not to be denied. In any event, I insist that it is in order to recommit a report, and that the recommittal of a report—and I call the Chair's attention to this—may be absolutely in the interest of the passage of the bill. Legislation is the object for which we meet. Recommitting a report may be a necessary step to the enactment of any bill into a law, because it might be in such shape that it would be liable to rejection. A motion to recommit, therefore, may be as much a friendly motion or a more friendly motion than one to force a bill in an imperfect form to an immediate vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question was, of course, and has been for days, on agreeing to the conference report. The Senator from Missouri now moves to recommit the bill to the conferees. The Chair, in the course of a week, has examined most of the decisions of the Senate of the United States upon the question. There have been some rulings against the recommittal of a conference report, but the great majority of the rulings are to the effect that if the Senate chooses so to do it can recommit a conference report. The Chair holds the motion to recommit without instructions to be in order.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that, representing the conferees, I have never yet made a motion to agree to the conference report. It has only been submitted and considered. For the first time, just a moment ago, I made the motion, as a substitute for the motion of the Senator from Missouri, that the Senate agree to the conference report. I have the RECORD here, showing that no formal motion has heretofore been made for the Senate to agree to the conference report.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the question has been stated to the Senate not less than twenty times in the course of this debate, "The question is upon agreeing to the conference report." whereupon somebody would take the floor and proceed to speak.

Mr. OVERMAN. The motion was to proceed with the consideration of the conference report. That was what was asked for—to proceed with its consideration.

Mr. CULBERSON. I present the RECORD to the Chair for its consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from North Carolina——

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no doubt about this matter. The Chair reads from the RECORD of September 25:

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, a motion to consider a conference report when presented to the Senate, according to the rules, must be put without debate; and if that is the position the Senator from Texas takes, all the debate that has been going on has been out of order. The only motion that can be debated upon a conference report is a motion to agree to the conference report.

Mr. CULBERSON. The question which has been before the Senate was what it should do with this report. No formal motion was made to agree to it until a moment ago, and then as a substitute for a motion to recommit.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to read Rule XXVII, Mr. President.

REPORTS OF CONFERENCE COMMITTEES.

The presentation of reports of committees of conference shall always be in order, except when the Journal is being read or a question of order or a motion to adjourn is pending or while the Senate is dividing; and when received the question of proceeding to the consideration of the report, if raised, shall be immediately put and shall be determined without debate.

That is Rule XXVII.

Mr. OVERMAN. Nobody made the point of order on that. It is too late to make it now. We have been going on by unanimous consent to consider the report all the time, and that has been the question—Shall we proceed to the consideration of the report? That is what we have been debating.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I understand, and I think it has been so stated by the Chair several times, that the question is, Shall the Senate agree to the conference report? That was the only motion that could be debated as it has been debated for the last week.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will pardon me, the first question is, Shall the Senate proceed to the consideration of the report?—regardless of the motion before the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. And that is without debate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And then the various motions named are in order according to their priority.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, a motion to proceed to the consideration of the conference report was put, and the Senate did proceed to its consideration. That was carried and has been disposed of. It is a thing of the past. That motion prevailed days ago, and we have been proceeding with it ever since. Time and time again it has been said during its consideration, when the debate would cease, that "the question is upon agreeing to the report of the conference committee." The proposition that we proceed to the consideration of the report was disposed of at the time we did proceed to its consideration.

Mr. OVERMAN. There has been no motion made since.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has been proceeding here for a week upon the theory that the pending question before the Senate was upon agreeing to the report of the conferees. The Chair has stated it some dozen times as being the pending question. Nobody has ever disputed it until just now.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, there is no question but that when a conference report is first presented to the Senate if a motion is then made for the acceptance of the agreement it is decided without debate. If it is objected to, it goes over, as this did, and may become unfinished business, or it may remain to be called up at some later time, the question still remaining to be decided whether it shall be agreed to or not and coming up in due course by a motion to agree. That motion having been decided adversely, the next step usually is for the ranking member of the conference committee who has the measure in charge to move for a further conference and that the Senate insist upon its amendments, and so forth. Now, an open motion to recommit, if made, would, of course, take it back to the conferees, the same end being reached in either case.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I do not know whether it will contribute to the information of the Senate or not, but I do not think the actual situation has yet been stated.

Some time last week the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] moved that this matter be postponed until the first day of the next session. Since that motion was made we have understood that that was the pending question. A few moments ago that question was settled in the negative by a vote of the Senate. Now the question is, What is the parliamentary situation?

I simply wanted that fact to be stated before the Chair ruled on the question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has stated for a week, every time on resuming the chair, that the pending question was on agreeing to the conference report, and nobody has disputed it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Suppose the Chair has stated it. Does that make it so?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not like to be put in that position.

Mr. OVERMAN. If the RECORD does not show that any motion at all was made, the fact that the Chair so stated can not make it so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Mr. Cleaves on Parliamentary Law lays it down that, without the motion ever being made, that is the only question that is pending, unless there be a motion to recommit.

Mr. OVERMAN. Not when a motion was made to proceed with the consideration of the conference report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That was settled a week ago.

Mr. OVERMAN. That was the motion then pending.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair rules that the motion to recommit is in order.

Mr. REED. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. Under the terms of it I have a right to vote upon this question. I vote "nay."

Mr. GORE (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] and withhold my vote.

Mr. HOLLIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. CLAPP (when Mr. KENYON'S name was called). I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON]. I am authorized to state that if he were present he would vote "yea" on the motion to recommit this bill.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and vote "nay."

Mr. O'GORMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] which I transfer to the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. OWEN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] to the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when Mr. SAULSBURY'S name was called). I was requested to state that the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] is absent on account of sickness. He is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT].

Mr. STERLING (when Mr. SHERMAN'S name was called). I was requested to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and to state that if he were present he would vote "yea" on this motion.

Mr. BRYAN (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Georgia was called). The senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] is detained from the Senate on account of illness. He is paired with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] and vote "nay."

Mr. STONE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK]. In his absence and not being able to secure a transfer of the pair I shall have to withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when Mr. TOWNSEND's name was called). My colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] is necessarily absent from the Chamber. He has a general pair with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. VARDAMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY]. I understand that if he were present he would vote as I should on this question. So I shall vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. PAGE. I desire to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. DILLINGHAM] and to state that he has a general pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I stated that my colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] is paired with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. I have no recent authority for making that statement, and I therefore desire to change it and to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague and to state that if he were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. LANE. I understand that the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is detained at home by illness.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to announce the following pairs:

The junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY];

The senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON];

The junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]; and

My colleague [Mr. SUTHERLAND] with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE].

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 35, as follows:

YEAS—25.

Borah	Lane	Page	Thomas
Bristow	McCumber	Penrose	Vardaman
Burton	McLean	Perkins	Warren
Clapp	Martine, N. J.	Reed	Williams
du Pont	Nelson	Smith, Mich.
Gronna	Norris	Smoot
Jones	Oliver	Sterling

NAYS—35.

Ashurst	Hughes	Owen	Smith, Md.
Bankhead	Johnson	Poindexter	Smith, S. C.
Bryan	Kern	Pomerene	Swanson
Camden	Lea, Tenn.	Root	Thompson
Chamberlain	Lee, Md.	Shafroth	Thornton
Chilton	Martin, Va.	Sheppard	Walsh
Culberson	Myers	Shively	West
Fletcher	O'Gorman	Simmons	White
Hollis	Overman	Smith, Ariz.

NOT VOTING—36.

Brady	Dillingham	Lewis	Shields
Brandegee	Fall	Lippitt	Smith, Ga.
Burleigh	Gallinger	Lodge	Stephenson
Catron	Goff	Newlands	Stone
Clark, Wyo.	Gore	Pittman	Sutherland
Clarke, Ark.	Hitchcock	Ransdell	Tillman
Colt	James	Robinson	Townsend
Crawford	Kenyon	Saulsbury	Weeks
Cummins	La Follette	Sherman	Works

So Mr. REED's motion to recommit the report was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question recurs on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. CULBERSON. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the former vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. GORE (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] and withhold my vote, unless it is necessary to make a quorum.

Mr. HOLLIS (when his name was called). I announce my pair and its transfer as before and vote "yea."

Mr. CLAPP (when Mr. KENYON's name was called). I desire to make the same announcement as before regarding the necessary absence of the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] and to state that if he were present he would vote "nay."

Mr. LEA of Tennessee (when his name was called). I repeat the announcement of my pair and its transfer and vote "yea."

Mr. O'GORMAN (when his name was called). I repeat the announcement regarding my pair and its transfer and vote "yea."

Mr. OWEN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and vote "yea."

Mr. STERLING (when Mr. SHERMAN's name was called). I again announce the necessary absence of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and state that if he were present he would vote "nay."

Mr. BRYAN (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Georgia was called). I repeat the announcement as to the absence of the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] made on the last roll call, and announce further that if he were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). I transfer my pair as upon the last vote and vote "yea."

Mr. STONE (when his name was called). I make the same announcement that I made on the last vote as to my pair and withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote I should vote "yea."

Mr. VARDAMAN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] and withhold my vote.

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I renew the statement made on the preceding roll call, making the same transfer of my pair, and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JAMES. I desire to inquire if the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. JAMES. I have a pair with that Senator and in his absence withhold my vote, being unable to secure a transfer. If permitted to vote I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 35, nays 24, as follows:

YEAS—35.

Ashurst	Hughes	Owen	Smith, S. C.
Bankhead	Johnson	Poindexter	Swanson
Bryan	Kern	Pomerene	Thompson
Camden	Lea, Tenn.	Shafroth	Thornton
Chamberlain	Lee, Md.	Sheppard	Walsh
Chilton	Martin, Va.	Shively	West
Culberson	Myers	Simmons	White
Fletcher	O'Gorman	Smith, Ariz.	Williams
Hollis	Overman	Smith, Md.

NAYS—24.

Borah	Jones	Norris	Root
Bristow	Lane	Oliver	Smith, Mich.
Burton	McCumber	Page	Smoot
Clapp	McLean	Penrose	Sterling
du Pont	Martine, N. J.	Perkins	Townsend
Gronna	Nelson	Reed	Warren

NOT VOTING—37.

Brady	Fall	Lodge,	Stone
Brandegee	Gallinger	Newlands	Sutherland
Burleigh	Goff	Pittman	Thomas
Catron	Gore	Ransdell,	Tillman
Clark, Wyo.	Hitchcock	Robinson	Vardaman
Clarke, Ark.	James	Saulsbury	Weeks
Colt,	Kenyon	Sherman	Works
Crawford,	La Follette	Shields
Cummins,	Lewis	Smith, Ga.
Dillingham,	Lippitt,	Stephenson

So the conference report was agreed to.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, in view of the fact that by the interjection of a point of order the Senate was deprived of the opportunity to express its opinion as to whether it desires criminal penalties in the antitrust legislation or not, I simply wish to say that I propose immediately to introduce a bill to add criminal penalties to these sections as soon as the bill becomes a law.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I wish to say that I was very desirous that this conference report should be recommitted, so that it might be amended in accordance with Democratic promise and fulfill the hopes and absolve the party's obligation to the American people. The junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has won the everlasting gratitude of the American people by his able effort to protect their interests and by the enactment of a law to punish the trust makers of the land. I desire to pay him the tribute of my admiration and gratitude for his superb effort in the cause of the people. But the Senate refuses to recommit the conference report. I prefer the measure as reported from the committee to nothing; so if I had been permitted to vote I should have voted for the adoption of the report as it came from the committee. It is the next best thing, which I make it a rule to accept if I can not get the best.

VOTES ON FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I have in my hand a statement prepared in the office of the Secretary of the Senate relative to the yea-and-nay votes of the Senate during the consideration of the Federal reserve act, approved December 23, 1913. I ask that the statement may be printed as a public document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMOOT. What was the request?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does it contemplate a payment out of the contingent fund of the Senate?

Mr. OWEN. I should think so. I do not know just what the custom has been. The Secretary of the Senate has had this record prepared.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is an absolute rule of the Senate which forbids anything from being paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate until after it has been adopted by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. If that be the case, I move the reference to that committee.

Mr. OWEN. I have no objection to the reference suggested.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is all right. I ask that it be referred to the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

ADJOURNMENT TO WEDNESDAY.

Mr. KERN. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Wednesday at 12 o'clock meridian.

The motion was agreed to.

WASHINGTON STATE MEMORIAL STONE.

Mr. POINDEXTER. On the 1st day of October, 1914, it being the twenty-fifth anniversary of the ratification of the constitution of the State of Washington, a stone presented by the State of Washington was placed in the Washington Monument in this city, and certain proceedings were had upon that occasion. I ask unanimous consent that those proceedings may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. FLETCHER. I should like to know just the extent of the proceedings referred to.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The extent of them is not great. It consists of very brief five-minute addresses that were made by the members of the delegation from the State of Washington upon the occasion of the dedication of the memorial stone placed in the Washington Monument by the State of Washington.

Mr. FLETCHER. Where were the exercises held?

Mr. POINDEXTER. The exercises were held in the Washington Monument.

Mr. FLETCHER. Of course, in view of the Senator's statement, I make no objection to it. I did not understand the request previously.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

PROCEEDINGS HELD IN THE WASHINGTON MONUMENT, WASHINGTON, D. C., OCTOBER 1, 1914, UPON THE DEDICATION OF A MEMORIAL STONE PLACED IN THAT MONUMENT BY THE STATE OF WASHINGTON.

Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, Chaplain of the United States Senate, offered the following invocation:

Almighty God, who dost from Thy throne behold all the dwellers upon earth, grant us, we beseech Thee, a due sense of Thy marvelous dealing with us as a Nation. From the beginning of our national life to this good hour Thou hast guided us in the way of continual progress and happiness, and hast bestowed upon us the riches of Thy grace and care. Thy Name has made us great. By Thy favor we have grown to our present state of prosperity. There are no other Gods beside Thee. Thou art the author of every good and perfect gift.

We thank Thee for all the God-fearing men who have been called into the public service and have left their influence upon the State. We remember to-day with thankful hearts the name that we have not been willing to let die from our national life. One who revered Thy name, and by Thy grace achieved the early victories of our national life. His fame ever increases among us. The impress of his spirit is still upon us. To-day the citizens of a great State bring their tribute to his blessed memory, and build into this national monument their token of appreciation of one who feared God alone, and gave his life to his country.

Look with Thy favor, we pray Thee, upon the men and women and children of the great State of Washington, who by their representatives perform this sacred act at this time. May their freedom be preserved, may their fair fields yield their increase, may they hold with loving zeal the faith of the fathers, and may they hold in sacred trust the name of the first President of our Nation. We pray also for all nations. Let the spirit of the Christ come upon those that are to-day engaged in awful conflict. Teach men the unspeakable folly and crime of war. Pity those who are led into the battle of nations through their love of country and the high calls of duty. O God, let peace come again in all the earth and good will animate all people.

We make our prayer in the name of the Prince of Peace. Amen.

LETTER FROM GOV. LISTER.

Senator MILES POINDEXTER, the presiding officer, read the following letter from Gov. Ernest Lister, of the State of Washington:

OCTOBER 1, 1914.

Hon. MILES POINDEXTER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

MY DEAR SENATOR POINDEXTER: I deeply regret that distance and the press of work here render it impossible for me to be with you and the other members of the Washington delegation to-day on occasion of the unveiling of the Washington State stone in the Washington Monument.

The date selected for the ceremonies is, indeed, a happy one. It enables the State of Washington to assume not only a proprietary but a fine sentimental interest in one of the world's noblest structures—the memorial with which it shares the name of the Father of His Country—on the day which marks its twenty-fifth year under the principle of government which George Washington fought for and led.

That the State of Washington has not heretofore been represented in the monument is explained by the fact that in a vast new Western State, such as is ours, men have been rather too busily engaged in the task of practical building to give much thought or attention to the sentimental things. The placing of the stone that is to-day unveiled is, first of all, an act of sentiment. The stone itself means no more than does any other stone, but the spirit that inspired the building of the great shaft of which it now forms a part, the spirit that has already led most of the States of the Union to place slabs of their native rock within the monument, has real significance.

The stone unveiled to-day, with the stones to which it now becomes companion, represents the sterling manhood and womanhood that has made the State of Washington great, and will make it still greater, and that has placed the United States in the position of leadership among nations.

I am pleased indeed, and I am sure every citizen of the great State of Washington will be gratified in knowing that our State to-day takes its proper representation in connection with an institution which typifies Americanism, as does the Washington Monument.

While I deeply regret that I can not personally be present at the unveiling ceremonies, I am honored in knowing that I am to be personally represented by a man who spent several years of his life in the State of Washington, and to whom the State proudly points as a foster son. I refer to the Hon. Franklin K. Lane, Secretary of the Interior, who has very kindly consented to spare a few moments from the great tasks that are absorbing his attention at this time and represent and speak for me. I am under a debt of gratitude to Mr. Lane for his kindness in complying with my request in this connection. He knows the West; he knows the State of Washington. What he shall say to you will be what I would say to you had I his ability.

With assurances of my high personal esteem, I have the honor to be,
Sincerely, yours,

ERNEST LISTER, Governor.

ADDRESS BY SECRETARY LANE.

Hon. Franklin K. Lane, Secretary of the Interior, delivered the presentation address. In presenting the stone he said:

Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, as has been said by the chairman, I am, in a sense, a Washingtonian, almost a pioneer in that State. Something over 20 years ago I lived in Tacoma, and while there I found a young man working in a foundry, helped nominate him for membership in the municipal council and elect him, and that young man is now Gov. Lister, of the State of Washington. And because, perhaps of that sentimental connection between us he has asked me to present this stone on behalf of the State.

Men will follow me, I see by the program, far more capable of presenting to you the glories of that State than I am; more familiar with the majesty of its scenery, the almost untouched resources of the State, and the great possibilities which that farthermost State has. Suffice it for me to say that if Gen. Washington could look down over the parapets and survey the State that has been named after him, or even if his devoted and admiring wife were to survey that State, she would say that the State was in all ways worthy of its name.

In this monument I take it that we have not merely erected a personal tribute to the man who made this great Nation possible. It is in itself a thing of extreme and rare beauty. I was surprised some months ago to read in a book by Mr. Arnold Bennett—one of those English gentlemen who spends two weeks in the United States and feels himself fitted to pass upon the spirit and resources, the peculiarities, and the possibilities of the United States—I was surprised to find that he spoke of the Washington Monument as a thing that was ugly, even to the point of hideousness. It is ununderstandable to me that a man who is in any sense artistic could make any criticism of this wonderful structure. And I have sometimes thought when reading the automobile opinions of these men from foreign countries that it might be well, perhaps, if we entered into a game of reprisal and chose some of our literary men of rare descriptive power, such a man perhaps as Mr. Robert Herrick, to take a walk through the Strand and around Trafalgar Square and see what they could find that might be subject to the artistic criticism of the cultured American.

This monument, I think we can say without any spirit of national boasting, is the most impressive and, all things considered, the most beautiful structure ever erected by a Nation as a tribute to one of its own people. [Applause.]

It is more than that, it is a national pledge. It is the upraised arm of the Nation, swearing an allegiance as lasting as stone itself to those principles, those ideals, those emotions, all those mysterious things which go to make up what we call democracy. [Applause.] And in the name of Washington, chief among our patriots, the State of Washington dedicates this stone. [Applause.]

MISS JONES UNVEILS THE STONE.

The Washington State stone was unveiled, amid applause, by Miss Hazel Jones, daughter of Hon. WESLEY L. JONES, senior Senator from the State of Washington, the orchestra playing the national anthem. Miss Jones is a native of Washington, having been born at North Yakima.

The stone is of native sandstone, hewn from the Hercules quarry at Tenino. On it are carved the words "State of Washington," and below is the great seal of the State of Washington.

Very brief five-minute addresses were made by the members of the delegation from the State of Washington.

ACCEPTANCE BY COL. HARTS.

Col. William W. Harts, United States Army, in charge of public buildings and grounds and Washington Monument, accepted the Washington State stone with the following remarks.

Ladies and gentlemen, it is with peculiar pleasure that I find myself in the position where I can represent the Government on such an enjoyable occasion.

The American people have always taken great pride in the patriotism and achievements of Gen. Washington, whom they regard universally as the Father of his Country and its most illustrious defender. So high has this regard been that the Nation, in grateful memory, has erected this monument, to stand for all time, not only to commemorate his public service, but to serve as a reminder to others who may see it, that it may stimulate their emulation to follow his principles.

This Monument has been erected by a grateful Nation in which all States have participated, but in order to feel greater interest in this memorial it has been the practice for separate States to have inserted in its walls their own special stones, inscribed with their names and seals. This practice is founded on sentiment, but a sentiment which is beautiful and praiseworthy. I take much pleasure, as a Government officer, in welcoming to this Monument the stone of the great State of Washington.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR JONES.

Hon. WESLEY L. JONES, senior Senator from the State of Washington, delivered the following address:

Mr. Chairman and citizens of the State of Washington, to do or die was the spirit of the fathers. "Give me liberty or give me death" moved their hearts, nerved their arms, and brought this Nation of ours into being. Its hopes and ideals were wrested from the womb of time amid shot and shell and blood. The perils and dangers, the battles and struggles, the sorrows and privations braved, suffered, and endured by those who gave the world a new birth of freedom are a priceless heritage for the children of men who to-day enjoy the blessings of that free government which they set up. American citizenship is a priceless boon of the ages. It was the dream of the ancients, the ideal of the Middle Ages, and is the acme of the present. Its rights, duties, and privileges are made precious by those who have nobly lived and bravely died. Everyone who dons this priceless toga should know and fully realize—

"What anvils rang, what hammers beat,
In what a forge and what a heat
Were wrought the anchors of our hope."

True to the principles that moved the fathers, we come on behalf of a million and a quarter of as brave, loyal, intelligent, high minded, and patriotic people as live beneath the flag to pay our tribute of love and admiration to him whose honored name is borne by our great Commonwealth. We will place in this lofty shaft a product from our mines as a token of our love and respect not only to the life and character of the greatest figure of his time, but also to the spirit and motives which moved him and those who like him dared the wrath of a mighty people that liberty and freedom might have an eternal abiding place from which to move the world until all people shall enjoy the blessings of freedom which every human heart desires. As we place here this stone we pledge ourselves to do our part in our great national fabric to uphold and maintain those principles and perform our task in the work of the ages.

This shapely, towering shaft typifies the lofty character of him whom we delight to honor, and the stability and surpassing grandeur of this Nation dedicated to liberty and good Government. It symbolizes the unity of distinct States and the strength of national sovereignty. As we take our place in this common tribute to the man who "was first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen," and who is growing greater and greater in the world's developing life as the years go by, we pledge our people to do their duty in maintaining the strength of this Republic and the principles which it represents, and to aid in the solution of those problems of a higher and grander civilization, so that the comfort, happiness, and joy of all the people may be more full. Our State and our people are in the forefront of progress, enlightenment, and good government. With resources of every kind and character beyond measure, expanding commerce, commodious harbors, exhaustless fisheries, illimitable forests, splendid mines, rich and varied agriculture, diversified manufactures, stupendous water powers, we are striving to build a State and develop a people who shall be and will be worthy of the great name we bear, Washington.

ADDRESS BY CONGRESSMAN HUMPHREY.

Congressman WILLIAM E. HUMPHREY, senior Member of the House of Representatives from the State of Washington, delivered the following address:

It is most fitting that the State that bears the name of one of the greatest of earth should contribute her tablet to be placed in the monument dedicated to his illustrious memory. It is most fitting that this ceremony should be performed upon the day that the State of Washington adopted its constitution. The State and the constitution are worthy of Washington and of the mighty Nation that he founded.

Our constitution, adopted by the patriotic pioneers, is in harmony with the genius of our institutions, giving liberty under law, and unmarred by the dangerous theories of socialistic dreamers.

Our State in the vastness and the variety of its natural resources stands first in this great Nation. The wealth of field and forest, of plain and valley, of mountain and sea are all found in matchless measure in Washington. In the products of our forests, and in the output of our fisheries, the Evergreen State stands first. In climate and scenery we have the most inviting and varied, the most magnificent and beautiful in all the circle of the globe.

We are, indeed, a State of infinite variety. We have sunshine and shadow. We have the wonderful Puget Sound country in the west, with the mightiest forests of all the world, ever green from the life-giving rains of the great Pacific; and we have the arid regions of the east, that under irrigation have been made to bloom and blossom as no other part of this earth. We have the majestic, rugged mountains of the west, the great rolling plains of the east. We have the most wonderful wheat fields that bloom and blossom in the east, and in the west we have the most valuable fisheries of all the waters of the seas. In the west we know not the breath of winter nor the torrid heat of summer; roses bloom every month in the year, and our hills and valleys are as green in January as in June, and in our majestic mountains mighty rivers rushing to the sea contain sufficient energy to turn all the wheels of industry. In the east the frost of winter, the sunshine of summer, the matchless soil combine to produce a harvest perfect and matchless.

The measureless wealth of land and sea, mountain and plain, of forest and field, of climate and scenery, is all found in the State of Washington. Ours is, indeed, a State of infinite resources, of marvelous wealth, and matchless opportunity.

Another century and Washington will be first in wealth, first in population, first in opportunity, first in all that goes to make up a contented and happy people of all the States of this mighty Nation.

As we stand here now and think of the days of the Revolution, as we think of the times then and now, as we think of the progress of the world since our Nation was born, what a rebuke it is to the chronic pessimist, that forever looks upon things with a jaundiced eye and croaks that the world grows worse. If the Father of his Country could stand here to-day, he would be little more surprised at the railroad and at the telegraph, at the telephone and the automobile, at the wireless telegraph and the flying machine, at the marvelous triumphs of mechanical genius, than he would at the growth of individual liberty, general enlightenment, and universal progress of the human race.

There is more comfort and luxury and less poverty and crime in this world to-day than ever before. There is more humanity and charity to-day than ever before. There is more liberty and justice than ever before. There is nearer equality than ever before The individual has a larger share in the affairs of government than ever before. There is more honesty in public and private life to-day than ever before. There is more honor among men and more virtue among women to-day than ever before.

Washington the State, Washington the man! The greatest State of the Union, the greatest man of the Nation! How fitting that our State should have been the one selected to perpetuate his memory and keep his deeds ever before the minds of men. How fitting that the State that bears his name should be one over which no other flag has ever floated but the Stars and Stripes. How fitting that no other flag should ever shadow the State that bears his immortal name but the one that he unfurled in defiance in the blue air of heaven, to float forever over a free people.

ADDRESS BY GEN. WILSON.

Brig. Gen. John M. Wilson, United States Army, retired, the oldest cadet from the State of Washington, was introduced by the presiding officer. Gen. Wilson was appointed a cadet to West Point in 1854 by Columbia Lancaster, the first Delegate in Congress from the Territory of Washington. Gen. Wilson's address follows:

Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, among the many honors conferred upon me during my long, busy, and eventful life of nearly 77 years, none has touched me more deeply than that of being invited to appear to-day before this galaxy of beautiful and charming women and of noble, brave, accomplished statesmen, professional and business men, representing particularly the grand, superb northwestern State of our glorious Union, named after the Father of his Country, which to-day unveils the beautiful stone placed in this glorious monument erected in memory of the immortal Washington.

I present myself in a trinity of positions—first, as one born in the Capital City of the Nation, now a member of the Washington National Monument Society, whose first president was that great Chief Justice of the United States, Hon. John Marshall, who was elected in October, 1833, just 81 years ago, a society which has had among its members eminent statesmen, soldiers, and other distinguished citizens.

This society, organized in 1833, was incorporated by act of Congress on February 22, 1859, which act provided that thereafter the President of the United States should be ex officio its President, and to-day the Hon. Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States, occupies the position, and our secretary is that able, esteemed and accomplished gentleman Mr. Frederick L. Harvey, who is ever vigilant, watchful, and interested in everything connected with this superb structure.

Second, I appear as a former resident of the State of Washington, one who was a page in the United States Senate from 1849 to 1853, in the days of Webster, Clay, Calhoun, Cass, Douglas, Benton, Jefferson Davis, Sumner, Seward, Hale, and other great statesmen of the Thirty-first and Thirty-second Congresses, and who at the age of 16 emigrated to the golden West, crossed the Isthmus of Panama on a mule, reaching San Francisco after a journey of a month, and thence pushed forward to Washington Territory and located in Olympia on Puget Sound, then a small town of 150 white people and about 300 Indians, the present great city of Seattle at that time consisting of a few log cabins, while the site now occupied by the beautiful city of Tacoma was a superb forest.

A boy, a stranger, far from his original home, I was welcomed and kindly treated by the people of the town, and was soon hard at work and recognized as a resident of the Territory of which at that time that magnificent soldier and ideal gentleman, Gen. Isaac I. Stevens, was governor. He was more than friendly and cordial, greeting me most kindly, and when in 1854 the Hon. Columbia Lancaster, then a Delegate in Congress from the Territory, wrote to him that the War Department had called upon him to nominate a youth for appointment to the West Point Military Academy and requested the governor to recommend some one, the governor and others nominated me, and I was the first West Point cadet and the first graduate of the Military Academy from the now superb State of Washington. I mention these personal facts simply to show why I am, and always will be as long as life lasts, interested in and devoted to the welfare and prosperity of this grand and magnificent extreme northwestern State of our glorious Republic.

Third, I appear as one who saw the corner stone of this monument laid on July 4, 1848, and heard that grand and eloquent oration of the Hon. Robert C. Winthrop, of Massachusetts, in which he paid that exquisite tribute to the memory of Washington when he said:

> Lay the corner stone of a monument which shall adequately bespeak the gratitude of the whole American people to the illustrious Father of his Country. Build it to the skies, you can not outreach the loftiness of his principles. Found it upon the massive and eternal rock, you can not make it more enduring than his fame. Construct it of peerless Parian marble, you can not make it purer than his life. Exhaust upon it the rules and principles of ancient and modern art, you can not make it more proportionate than his character.

It has been well said that the whole world, occidental and oriental, has shown its appreciation of the fame of George Washington, and memorial stones were sent from all portions of the globe to be built in this obelisk.

To-day, the twenty-fifth anniversary of the entrance into the Union of the magnificent State of Washington, it presents to the Nation its memorial stone for this stately and beautiful monument, and now, I believe, only five States of our glorious Union are without mark within this structure of their admiration and love for the hero and statesman in whose memory it has been erected; he who was honorable in every sense, firm and true in peace and war, and for whom we all join in proclaiming that generations will come and pass away ere the beautiful and beloved memory of George Washington shall be forgotten.

The State of Washington is glorious in every sense of the word; its citizens are patriotic, broad-minded, intellectual, true people of the highest type of character; its climate is delightful; its fields of grain are enormous not only in size but in the quantity and quality of their produce; its orchards are grand and prolific in delicious fruits; its beautiful Puget Sound is a harbor that can float at anchor the fleets of the world; its cities are rapidly growing in size, wealth, and importance, while the beauty of its scenery compares favorably with that of Switzerland or any other of the countries of the Eastern or Western Continents.

If I may be excused for thus speaking of my admiration of this northwestern mosaic block of our Union, I will mention one instance alone descriptive of its scenery.

In 1877 I was locating the exact site of a lighthouse to be erected on Point Wilson on the west side of Admiralty Inlet, where Puget Sound empties its waters into the Straits of Fuca; the afternoon was glorious, the sun in its gorgeous brilliancy was nearing the horizon; as I faced to the south the waters of the sound sparkled like a myriad of diamonds; off to the southeast Mount Rainier raised its snow-capped peak several thousand feet above the level of the sea, a wide band of beautiful clouds encircling it halfway between its base and summit; on the west side of the sound the top of the Olympian Range was covered with snow, rendered beautiful by an exquisite pink tinge, the like of which I have never seen elsewhere, while off to the south, on the other side of the grand Columbia River, Mount Hood, Mount St. Helens, and the Three Sisters raised their snow-capped peaks nearly to the clouds, all sparkling in the sunshine as if of brilliant crystal.

As I turned my face to the north Mount Baker appeared in all its grandeur to the northeast, while the hills of Vancouver Island were spread out in all their beauty and the magnificent Straits of Fuca flowed gently and smoothly toward the Pacific Ocean. Although this occurred 37 years ago, it is so photographed on my memory that I can close my eyes at any time and again look upon this scene of grandeur, the most beautiful of its kind, I believe, in this or any other country.

The construction of this great monument to our first President was continued by subscription under the direction of the Washington National Monument Society with more or less trouble from certain sources, when, in 1854, after the monument had reached a height of 153 feet above the foundation and the society had expended about $230,000 upon the structure, work was suspended.

The great War between the States of 1861–1865 withdrew public interest to some extent from this grand and glorious monument and work was not really resumed until Congress in the name of the people of the United States, by the act approved August 2, 1876, assumed charge of the structure and made the necessary appropriations from time to time for the work.

That able, accomplished, and distinguished officer, Gen. Thomas L. Casey, of the Corps of Engineers of the United States Army, a man of the highest type of ability and integrity, was placed in charge, and with the aid of his two able, accomplished, and admirable assistants, Capt. George W. Davis, now Maj. Gen. George W. Davis, a most distinguished officer of the United States Army, and Mr. Bernard R. Green, an able and highly accomplished civil engineer, the great structure was completed in 1884 and dedicated in the most solemn and impressive manner on February 21, 1885.

It was my good fortune to have been present at the dedication ceremonies and, after the promotion of Gen. Casey to the position of Chief of Engineers of the United States Army, to have been assigned to the duty of contructing the mound around the monument, filling up the ponds near it, laying out the roads and grounds, erecting the office building, and placing within the inner walls of the structure sections of the beautiful stones which, although of material not sufficiently strong and durable for the great work, could well appear in the inner walls in sections of 6 inches in thickness, coming as they had done, with the love, devotion, and admiration of the people of the nation.

This monument is the highest obelisk in the world; it is 555 feet 5 inches in height from floor of shaft to apex, weighs 81,120 tons, and cost $1,300,000.

Gen. Wilson then read a telegram of greetings from Mr. Scott C. Bone, editor of the Post-Intelligencer, Seattle, Wash.

ADDRESS BY CONGRESSMAN LA FOLLETTE.

Congressman WILLIAM L. LA FOLLETTE delivered the following address:

Mr. Chairman, members of the Washington delegation in Congress, citizens of the State of Washington, and friends, it is indeed fitting that in this great obelisk of stone erected in honor of the Father of his Country there should be placed an inscribed tablet of enduring sandstone quarried in and transplanted from that far western State on the Pacific slope named for him to whose undying fame this shaft was dedicated—the State of Washington.

This huge shaft, pointing upward into the heavens to a height of 555 feet, is known all over the world as one of its greatest monuments, as he whom it commemorates is known as one of its greatest men. We of the State of Washington are proud of this monument to the memory of Washington in the city of Washington, the capital of the greatest and politically the freest nation on the face of the earth. We are glad that it has been erected here on the eastern slope of the Appalachian Range of mountains, whose shore is washed by the great Atlantic Ocean, near to the State that gave him birth, the Old Dominion State, Virginia; in sight of the noble Potomac River, even to where that river laves the banks of his beloved Mount Vernon. Yes; we are glad that the people of our country have builded this monument.

But, O my countrymen, we of the Pacific coast have what will prove to be a more enduring monument than this one, of which we are all so proud—the young but great State of Washington, already, in proportion to population, the first in education, the first in forest, and one of the first in field, with its mammoth rivers, its mountain ranges, and dazzling snow-clad peaks, monuments of grandeur and purity—St. Helens, Mount Adams, and that great mountain, called by the Indians "Tacoma," geographically known as Mount Rainier; Mount Baker, and the magnificent Olympics, the wonderful Puget Sound.

O Washington, my Washington; its streams, its lakes and dells, its plains and woodland swells; Washington, my Washington! Its soil, marvelous in productiveness; its fruits of vine and tree; its thriving villages and towns; its great cities that only the other day were villages; its million and a half of happy, hustling people, composed of strong adults, confident youth, and happy children—O what a monument is that one we are erecting there to the Father of his Country! Washington, my Washington! We are proud of this monument and glad to have a part in it; but way out yonder we are erecting to him a greater one.

ADDRESS BY CONGRESSMAN BRYAN.

Congressman JAMES W. BRYAN delivered the following address:

Mr. Chairman, Senators, colleagues, fellow citizens of the State of Washington, ladies, and gentlemen, after a long and lonesome voyage, at the first sight of land the heart of the wearied mariner leaps with joy and his lips exclaim with thanksgiving, "Home, sweet home," although there may yet remain days and days of tiresome labor with wind and wave ere his bark puts in to that haven of rest and benediction called home. And so this morning, after this long and tiresome session of Congress here at the Nation's Capital, 3,000 miles from home, my heart beats with rapture and my soul exults in praise as I participate in these exercises, which turn our minds to the achievements of our own fellow citizens within the confines of our own Commonwealth and cause us to mingle with such a large company of men and women who are inhabitants of our own proud State.

We have caused to be engraved upon the polished surface of this splendid specimen of the product of a Washington quarry the name and seal of our beloved State, Washington, and to-day we firmly place it here among similar tokens from the other States which compose the glorious Republic in which we live.

And well may it rest here, proud and dignified, a worthy peer of its colleagues in statehood, for while the colonies were perplexing their minds with the problem of ratifying the Constitution and becoming States in the infant Republic, just ready for its swaddling clothes, Robert Gray and John Kendrick, under authority and inspiration of the flag intrusted to them by John Hancock, governor of Massachusetts, were cruising about the coast of Washington from Puget Sound to the Columbia River, and thereby asserting title by discovery and insuring to the Republic yet to be a world destiny and a supremacy in the greatest of all the oceans, the Pacific, the extent and the responsibility of which we have as yet not even dreamed.

The settlement and development of this territory was the very substance of the "high aim" that has made of Columbia a great predominant American Republic, a world power, rather than an inconsequential unit in the family of nations. The history of the Northwest and the development of our State is replete with glory, but this tablet will occupy its place in this great monument with pride, because the State of Washington has within its border such unlimited resources of forest, of mine, and domain yet owned and held by the public, always to be retained in fee by all the people, but to be used, necessarily, for the immediate benefit of all the people of our State, share and share alike.

Still we must be measured not by glory of history or wealth of public store, but rather by achievements for the betterment of humanity in the use of these opportunities and resources. Here again our State, as the roll is called and the name "Washington" is heard, can hold its head erect and answer that these resources are being developed with due regard for the human element, because in our law books are found the most progressive of laws, enactments which insure fair and honest elections, equality for all in the rights and privileges of government, limitation of hours and regulation of wages for those who toil, powerful corporations subjected to control, municipalities encouraged to own and operate their public utilities, water power held out of monopoly, and rates for its use held within reach of all.

There is not to be found a citizen of the State of Washington who is not proud of his State or who hesitates to proclaim its history, its resources, its high standards of equality and fairness, and its wonderful future.

This tablet is its own testimonial. "Washington," the name thereon inscribed, like the State it designates, stands for all that is best in American history, American life, and American destiny.

ADDRESS BY CONGRESSMAN FALCONER.

Congressman J. A. FALCONER delivered the following address:

Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, the spirit of this occasion enlivens our patriotism. These decorations of evergreen and flowers carry to us the scent of our mountains and forests; the familiar seal engraven on this stone takes us back to the great State which we all love so well.

This monument, the finished product of labor and enterprise, is a fact, because of the patriotic integrity of men; its purpose is to serve as a memorial to a soldier-statesman. In a way it stands as the character-temple of this Republic. Its foundation, substantial and strong, represents the bulwark of American liberty; its great height, in the freshness of this autumn morning, suggests life, and the desire for the high standard to which we, a favored Nation, would attain. Builded here in the Capital City directly west of the great white dome yonder and as directly east of another monument (Lincoln) now building there on the banks of the Potomac, this stately shaft carries testimonials from the several States, expressing a principle of united effort and a common purpose.

We are assembled here to-day, the twenty-fifth anniversary of the adoption of our State constitution, to present this token from the citizens of the State of Washington, Washington, the northwest corner State of the Union, 3,000 miles away, where the great Pacific lavishes her waters at the feet of the snow-crest Olympic Mountains.

We are a favored State in name; we are a favored State in citizenship; we are a favored State in our 69,180 square miles of territory, greater than all New England; we are a favored State in natural resources; we are a favored State in firs and fishes; we are a favored State in splendid harbors; and, sir, we are a favored State in a large and rich variety of building and ornamental stones. The sandstone of Tenino, here represented; the Wilkeson, Cumberland, Sucia Island, and Chuckanut, of excellent quality; the granite of Okanogan, Kittitas, Whitman, Chelan, and the mountains of granite of superior quality and easy accessability at Index, Snohomish, all furnish substantial constructive material.

For building and ornamental marble of surpassing beauty we could have presented to you here had we chosen any one of a variety of colors, purple, green, white, pink, black, mottled, gray, cream, or blue from our numerous quarries.

Since a day early in the sixteenth century, when Juan De Fuca called his Spanish sailors onto the deck of his ship to look out upon the ever green shores of the straits which now bear his name, our climate, tempered by the warm currents of the Orient, has been the boast of America. Since James Cook, in 1778, named and sailed from Cape Flattery on return trip to England with the first shipment of our forest product in the nature of long fir spars, the quality of our timber has been the wonder of the world. Since George Vancouver, on errand from King George III, explored and named Puget Sound, that inland sea has been an ever-increasing joy and delight. From these placid waters are seen mighty sentinels of the Cascades standing guard.

To the north, Mount Baker, with 10,827 feet altitude, marks the north point of the Cascade Range. To the south is the majestic Rainier, standing like a great crystal monument in eternal snow, its altitude, 14,526 feet, carried above the clouds. It is known as Mount Tacoma and as Mount Rainier, but it is loved as "The mountain that was God." To the east is Glacier Peak, and in the depths of beautiful Lake Chelan its lights and shadows fall. Again to the south, midway between the Sound and the Columbia River, is Mount St. Helens, altitude 10,000 feet, and Mount Adams, altitude 12,470 feet. The ice and snows of these great mountains are perpetual, and in glaciers and cataracts creep and tumble on down to the sea, and in their fall there is wrapped up power sufficient to move the industries of the world.

At this time and on this occasion I would not dwell on the natural and commercial advantages peculiar to Washington State. Briefly, I would, in passing, refer to advanced conditions bespeaking enterprising men and intelligent women. In Washington State our school system ranks first in the Union. Our advanced legislation embracing the welfare of men, women, and children has been enacted by the united wisdom of men and women in legislative assembly.

The science of our lumbermen leads the world.

Our paper mills, our iron foundries, our shipbuilding add to our industry and enrich our commerce.

Our coal, iron, and copper mines engage labor.

In horticulture, the rich lands of the Yakima vie with the productive lands of the Wenatchee and Chelan; the valleys of the Okanogan and the Pend D'Oreille class with those of the Columbia, and all surpass in a product of general excellence.

In agriculture, the grain lands in eastern Washington have an average acreage value nearly double that of any other grain-producing State in the Union. The La Connor Flats and adjacent territory are the richest producing oat lands in the world. Sheep and cattle thrive on the buttes and highlands of the Blue Mountains and away across the Columbia Plateau to the foothills of the Cascades; and dairying and general farming are important lines of activity in all Washington.

CITIES.

Our cities stand as monuments of progress. In the heart of the great inland empire, Spokane is the seat of commercial activity, rich in wealth, and specially favored by the falls of the Spokane River, which furnish light and power. To the south, Colfax, Pomeroy, and Dayton, in rich agricultural belts, and Walla Walla, occupying the site of the old fort and called the Garden City of the State. In central Washington, Yakima, Ellensburg, and Wenatchee, the cities of fat bank accounts. On the west coast, Vancouver, of early historical interest; Raymond, Aberdeen, and Hoquiam, thriving lumber cities; Olympia, the beautiful capital city; Tacoma, the electric city of the Pacific coast, with its manufacturing and foreign shipping; Seattle, the city that washes mountains into the sea, with its beautiful parks and lakes, and its 16 to 42 story buildings; Everett, the largest shingle and lumber output city in the world; Mount Vernon, the metropolis of the Skagit; and Bellingham, with her excellent harbor, her canneries, shipbuilding, and educational institutions—these cities all are the pride of our people.

HISTORY.

We are proud of our history, the pages of which recite the virtues of Lewis and Clark and their Indian-maiden guide; of Dr. Marcus Whitman and his faithful followers, missionaries to the Indians, who helped to save all that great territory to the United States; of all the line of Territorial governors, from Isaac I. Stevens to Miles C. Moore; and the governors of the State, from Elisha P. Ferry to Ernest Lister. The records of these men, pioneering and building, is a rich heritage to the citizens of our State.

Mr. Chairman, the word Washington is synonymous with patriotism. From Washington State to the Washington Monument in Washington City, we bring this stone. If it truly represents our people, it is a worthy gem in this great temple.

THAT'S WHERE THE WEST BEGINS.

Out where the hand clasps a little stronger,
Out where a smile dwells a little longer—
  That's where the West begins;
Out where the sun is a little brighter,
Where snows that fall are a trifle whiter,
Where the bonds of home are a wee bit tighter—
  That's where the West begins.

Out where the skies are a trifle bluer,
Out where friendship's a little truer—
  That's where the West begins;
Out where a fresher breeze is blowing,
Where there's laughter in every streamlet flowing,
Where there's more of reaping and less of sowing—
  That's where the West begins.

Out where the world is in the making,
Where fewer hearts with despair are aching—
  That's where the West begins;
Where there's more of singing and less of sighing,
Where there's more of giving and less of buying,
And a man makes friends without half trying—
  That's where the West begins.

—CHAPMAN.

ADDRESS BY CONGRESSMAN JOHNSON.

Congressman ALBERT JOHNSON delivered the following address:

Senator POINDEXTER, Senator JONES, Mr. Secretary Lane, ladies, and gentlemen, others have spoken of the beauties, the grandeur, and the natural wealth of the State of Washington. It seems fitting at the setting of this fine Tenino stone from our State in the Washington Monument, on the twenty-fifth anniversary of the adoption of our State constitution, that I, a resident of Grays Harbor, should pay a slight tribute to Capt. Robert Gray, who, on May 7, 1792—122 years ago, or 300 years after Christopher Columbus—discovered the harbor where I live, which is named for him, and the discovery of which gave the United States title to the State of Washington.

Five days later Capt. Gray sailed into Entrada de Heceta, so named by the Spaniard, Heceta, in 1775, or Deception Bay of 1788, so named by Lieut. John Mears, a retired lieutenant of the British Navy. It remained for Capt. Gray to discover that Deception Bay was not a bay, but a river, which he named the Columbia. From his discoveries of Grays Harbor and the Columbia actual American history in the Northwest begins. Gray was not only the first to unfurl the Stars and Stripes there, but the first to carry one flag around the world.

Written history of what is now our State, of course, runs further back than 1792, and again my county of Chehalis furnishes the incident. Few persons know that six white men were murdered by Indians at Point Grenville, a few miles north of Moclips, a summer resort in Chehalis County, 139 years ago, or, to be exact, July 14, 1775—a little more than one year before the signing of the Declaration of Independence.

In fact, this battle of white men against Indians occurred on almost the exact date of the Battle of Bunker Hill, but a month or two after the minutemen of Boston, aroused by Paul Revere, had defeated the British at Lexington and Concord and had fired the "shot that was heard 'round the world." It was not heard out there in that far-off, unexplored country, now the State of Washington, for several years, in spite of the fact that every American out there was known as a Boston man. Capt. Robert Gray came from Boston, and a ship named the Boston followed him in 1803 to our country. Its captain offended Chief Maquinna, of the Nootkans, who burned the ship, killed all of the crew except Jewitt, an armorer, and Thompson, a sailmaker, whom they enslaved. The subsequent search for these men from Boston, which lasted three years and was successful, led to the designation of white Americans as "Boston men," which has lasted to this day in some localities. As opposed to the Boston men, or Americans, the Britishers, who arrived soon after Gray with Sir George Vancouver, were known as King George men. Their arrival led to a treaty which eliminated the rights of Spain to the northwest country and left Great Britain and the United States to struggle for 50 years in a bloodless battle, with Russia interfering occasionally, for possession of the country north of the forty-second parallel—Oregon, Washington, Idaho, and parts of Montana and Wyoming.

Robert Gray's discoveries, the careful records he kept, and our subsequent exploration and settlement, gave the United States title to all that great country.

But to revert to the murder of Bodega y Quadra's six Spanish sailors, at Point Grenville: Quadra's schooner, the Sonora, was attached to Heceta's expedition. The Sonora anchored at Grenville, then unnamed, and, according to Spanish records, erected a cross at the point July 14, 1775. The ceremony was witnessed by the Indians, who were very demonstrative in their assurance of friendship. Quadra sent six men to the mainland in a small boat. As soon as the 6 Spaniards had left this boat, 300 Indians, who were hiding in the woods, attacked them. Two sailors sprang into the sea and were drowned, two others were killed, and the small boat was broken up for the nails it contained. Next the savages rushed out to the schooner in their canoes, as if to prevent its departure. With a swivel gun the Spaniards killed six Indians—and there was a shot which was not heard round the world, but which caused a great deal of trouble between white men and red men for many, many years.

I have given you the Spanish account of this affair, as translated by Bancroft and repeated by most of our Western historians. But I have a different version, received directly from the lips of the oldest of the Quiniault Indians, whose great reservation lies just north of Point Grenville, which by the way the Spaniards had named Point of Sorrows. Our oldest Indians claim that the story handed down to them was that nine sailors came ashore and visited a camp on the river where the Indians were smoking fish—the now far-famed Quiniault salmon, the king of the finny tribe. The sailors were invited to eat. After eating, they filled their arms with smoked salmon and ran, violating the tribal laws, which were that all were welcome to eat at any camp, but that nothing should be taken away, unless a "potlatch" had been proclaimed. The Indians pursued the sailors to the ocean's edge, and killed seven, two escaping into the water.

I think the Indians' tradition is the more likely story, for since white civilization began out there, the Quiniaults have been peaceful. They took no part in the Indian wars, and for their good conduct Gov. Isaac I. Stevens, in a treaty approved by U. S. Grant, gave them their lands and their fishing and hunting rights forever. And strangely enough, my friends, the first persons arrested for violation of the recently enacted migratory bird act were some of the Quiniault Indians.

Running far back of these events it is a matter of record that Philippine treasure ships in 1700–1750, after the Jesuit settlements in California, used to cross the Pacific by the northern route, and on numerous occasions they were forced by the trade winds to put in at harbors on what is now the coast of Washington and Oregon

So, my friends, we can trace the history of our beloved State back a great many years; we can read of Russian, Spanish, and British maritime explorers, freebooters, and pirates, running up and down our northwest coast three and four centuries ago vainly searching for, and even reporting the finding of that mystery of mysteries—the Strait of Arian—the northwest passage. But for true American history, American occupation, American pluck, determination, and perseverance, which laid the foundation for the great State of Washington, we must start with the day—May 7, 1792—that Capt. Robert Gray discovered and claimed for the United States Grays Harbor, Chehalis County, in the State of Washington. In my opinion our State, now having placed a stone in this great monument to George Washington, can not do less than place a magnificent marble likeness of the intrepid Boston captain, Robert Gray, the commander of the ships Columbia and Washington, in Statuary Hall in the National Capitol.

ADDRESS BY MR. HARVEY.

Mr. Frederick L. Harvey, secretary of the Washington National Monument Society, delivered the following address:

Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, speaking in behalf of the Washington National Monument Society, and as a member of that body, the gift to the memory of Washington which has just been unveiled is regarded by the society with feelings of profound pleasure and satisfaction.

This occasion marks, I believe, the twenty-fifth anniversary of the adoption of the State's constitution by the people of Washington; and in this connection is suggested the thought that the convention which brought forth the Constitution of these United States, which has made it a great Nation, was presided over in its deliberations by George Washington.

With the placing of this stone in the monument by the State of Washington there now remain but five States of the Union to be so represented—namely, Texas, Oklahoma, Arizona, New Mexico, and Idaho. The legislature of the last-named State, however, has appropriated for a memorial stone, which is now in course of preparation, and will probably be the next to be placed within these walls. It is hoped and expected that the other States named will take suitable action at the approaching sessions of their respective legislatures, looking to their representation here. When the memorials from these five States mentioned are finally in place in the shaft the Union will be complete, exemplifying our national motto, "E pluribus unum—many in one."

While the Monument is the loftiest structure ever erected to the memory and virtues of any man, and was built to perpetuate the name and fame of Washington, I think that name and fame equally perpetuated in the fact that a great Commonwealth of this country has chosen that illustrious name to stand for the sovereignty, the citizenship, and virtues of its people. With respect to the stone which has just been unveiled, I should hope that it would remain, as now, the topmost of the memorials in place and that remain to be placed in this Monument.

After what has been so eloquently said by other speakers, Mr. Chairman, it may be of interest in these proceedings, and to the citizens of the State of Washington, to know some of the salient facts as to the origin of the Monument and the reasons for the selection of the site on which it stands. I can not pretend on this occasion to go deeply into the history of this Monument, nor that of the Washington National Monument Society, through the efforts of which society the work of erecting the Monument was begun and carried on for many years. From conception to dedication that history covered more than a century of time.

The origin of the society is to be found in the failure of the National Congress through a long series of years to redeem a solemn pledge made by the Continental Congress in 1783. On the 7th day of August of that year it was resolved by the Congress, "unanimously, ten States being present, that an equestrian statue of Gen. Washington be erected at the place where the residence of Congress shall be established." Later, a committee appointed to consider the resolution made a favorable report, accompanied by certain recommendations, but the resolution was not carried into effect.

December 23, 1799, on motion of John Marshall, in the House of Representatives, it was resolved by Congress, among other things—

> That a marble monument be erected by the United States in the Capitol at the city of Washington, and that the family of Gen. Washington be requested to permit his body to be deposited under it; and that the monument be so designed as to commemorate the great events of his military and political life.

A copy of the resolution was sent to his widow by the President of the United States.

In her reply, acceding to the request, she said:

> Taught by the great example which I have so long had before me never to oppose my private wishes to the public will, I need not, I can not, say what a sacrifice of individual feeling I make to a sense of public duty.

The select committee which was appointed to carry into effect the resolution reported favorably on the 8th of May, 1800, through its chairman, Mr. Henry Lee, and further proposed that the resolution of the Continental Congress of 1783 be carried into immediate execution, and for the present $100,000 was proposed to carry out the resolutions. Upon considering the report, Congress amended the resolution to provide for a "mausoleum of American granite and marble, in pyramidal form, 100 feet square at the base and of proportionate height, to be erected in the city of Washington"—this in place of the memorial suggested by the Continental Congress. Later, the House of Representatives passed a bill appropriating $200,000 for the mausoleum, but the Senate did not concur in the act.

Not until 1816 was the subject of a monument to Washington again before Congress. In February of that year the General Assembly of Virginia instructed the governor of that State to correspond with Judge Bushrod Washington, then proprietor of Mount Vernon, to secure his consent to the removal of Washington's remains to Richmond, to be there marked by a suitable monument to his memory. Upon learning of this action by the General Assembly of Virginia, Hon. Benjamin Huger, a Member from South Carolina in the House of Representatives, who had been in the Congress of 1799, moved that a select committee be appointed to carry out the resolution of the Continental Congress. In this the Senate concurred. The committee proposed was appointed and later introduced a bill and submitted a report recommending that a tomb should be prepared in the foundations of the Capitol for the remains of Washington. But Judge Bushrod Washington refused his assent to the removal of the remains, and the bill was "indefinitely postponed" in the House. No report was made to the Senate. A vault, however, appears to have been prepared for the remains beneath the center of the Dome and Rotunda of the Capitol and beneath its Crypt.

In 1819 a resolution passed the Senate July 19 to erect an equestrian statue to Gen. Washington. The resolution came before the Committee of the Whole in the House of Representatives, was read twice, and then was "indefinitely postponed."

In January, 1824, Mr. James Buchanan, later President of the United States, introduced a resolution in the House of Representatives to carry into effect the resolution of 1783, but his resolution was "laid on the table." In his annual message to Congress in 1825 President Adams invited the attention of Congress to the unfulfilled pledge of the Continental Congress, but nothing came of it.

In 1832, the centennial of Washington's birth approaching, reports were made by committees of Congress in each House with a view to the removal of the remains of Washington to be deposited in the Capitol. In the Senate the report was submitted by Henry Clay, and in the House of Representatives by Mr. Philemon Thomas. Mr. John A. Washington, of Mount Vernon, declined his assent to the plan, and there the matter ended.

The resolutions and proceedings of Congress which have been referred to remaining unexecuted as late as 1833, certain citizens of the city of Washington whose names were a passport to public confidence took steps to organize a voluntary association to erect "a great national monument to the memory of Washington at the seat of the Federal Government."

The organization of the society was effected on the 26th day of September, 1833. John Marshall, the great Chief Justice, was the society's first president, and on his death he was succeeded by ex-President James Madison, who, in turn, was succeeded by Andrew Jackson. The board of managers was composed of many distinguished men. Of the number may be mentioned John P. Van Ness, formerly a Representative in Congress from Pennsylvania; Samuel Harrison Smith; George Waterson, the first Librarian of Congress; Gen. Thomas S. Jessup; Col. James Kearney; Col. Archibald Henderson; Thomas Munroe, the first postmaster of Washington; Peter Force; and Thomas Carberry. A plan of the Monument drawn by Robert Mills, a distinguished architect, was adopted, the chief feature of which was an obelisk to be 600 feet in height. Funds were secured by voluntary contributions from the people everywhere.

One of the first acts of the society was to arrange for memorial stones from the several States and foreign countries to be placed in the shaft, and an address was issued to the country. Later other addresses and appeals by the society for funds were indorsed with the signatures of Andrew Jackson, Henry Clay, Daniel Webster, Winfield Scott, James K. Polk, George M. Dallas, Gen. Zachary Taylor, Franklin Pierce, Millard Fillmore, and others eminent in political life, commending the purpose of the society to the favorable consideration of their countrymen.

Sufficient money having accumulated, the corner stone of the Monument was laid with impressive ceremonies on the 4th of July, 1848, under a bright sky, in the presence of the President and Vice President of the United States, Senators and Representatives in Congress, heads of executive departments and other officers of the Government, the judiciary, representatives of foreign Governments, the corporate authorities of the city of Washington, cities of Georgetown and Alexandria, Va., military commands, associations of many descriptions, delegations from States and Territories and from several Indian tribes, and a great multitude of citizens. After the consecration prayer an oration, lofty and eloquent, was delivered by the Hon. Robert C. Winthrop, then Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The grand master of the Masonic fraternity of the District of Columbia then delivered an address and performed the Masonic ceremonies of laying the corner stone. The gavel used was that employed by George Washington in the laying of the corner stone of the National Capitol. Among the distinguished guests occupying the platform were Mrs. Alexander Hamilton, then 91 years of age, Mrs. Dolly Paine Madison, George Washton Parke Custis, and others of eminence.

The site for the Monument, selected under authority of a resolution of Congress, was reservation No. 3, containing upward of 30 acres, and which reservation was later deeded to the society. This site was marked on the first plan of the city of Washington made by Maj. L'Enfant, a chief of staff of Washington, as the site for the Monument proposed by the Continental Congress in 1783. This map Washington, as President, approved, and it became the first official map of the city of Washington. The Monument stands but a short distance away from the meridian line, run at the instance of President Jefferson, October 15, 1804. This line, under the President's direction, was carried through the center of the White House, and where it intersected a line due east and west through the center of the Capitol a small pyramid was built. The point is now marked by a stone but a short way to the west of the Monument. The center of the District of Columbia, when it was 10 miles square, was 1,305 feet north and 1,579 feet west of the site selected, but this exact center was not a commanding spot on which to erect the obelisk.

In 1855 work on the Monument was suspended through an ousting of the officers and managers of the society by members of the American or "Know-Nothing" Party through an illegal election, and the matter of the election went to the courts. Disregarding that election and the seizure of its books and archives, the society continued its existence and its appeals to the country as a voluntary organization. In 1859 Congress incorporated the society, providing that the President of the United States for the time being should be ex officio president and the governors of the several States ex officio vice presidents. Under this provision of the charter, Gov. Lister, of the State of Washington, is one of the present vice presidents of the Washington National Monument Society.

The American Party disintegrating and there being no public confidence in the organization it had created as a board of managers for the Monument, the "Know-Nothing" board dissolved and turned over to the society the books and archives it had illegally held. During the period of the "Know-Nothing" management there were placed on the Monument two courses of stone, which were removed as unfit by Gen. Thomas Lincoln Casey, the engineer, when work was resumed on the shaft.

During the Civil War the work of building the Monument was halted for lack of contributions, and this suspension lasted, and for the same reason, for some years afterwards, although the society continued urgent appeals to the country for aid.

On the 5th of July, 1876, in the centennial year of our country's independence, the Hon. John Sherman, of Ohio, introduced in the Senate of the United States a joint resolution providing for the completion of the Monument. The resolution was adopted, and later Congress passed a bill to carry into effect the resolution, which became law August 2, 1876, through the signature of President Grant. The bill carried an appropriation of $200,000, which was supplemented in subsequent years by other appropriations until the Monument was finished. The bill provided a joint commission to superintend the construction and continued the Washington National Monument Society in an advisory and cooperative capacity with the commission. In consideration of the action by Congress the society redeeded to the Government the 30 acres of land granted to it in 1848.

You have heard from Gen. Wilson as to the distinguished engineer and his assistants who constructed the Monument and of its cost.

The first great work of the engineer in charge consisted in strengthening the old foundation by placing beneath it a concrete slab 124 feet square and 13 feet thick, removing some of the old rockwork and substituting concrete underpinning. The operation was a delicate one, the weight of the then uncompleted shaft being 40,000 tons.

The first stone on the shaft in the resumption of building was laid on the 7th of August, 1880.

The Monument approaching completion, Congress in May, 1884, created a commission to make arrangements for the dedication of the Monument, consisting of five Senators, eight Representatives, and three members of the Washington National Monument Society. Pursuant to the orders of the commission, the Monument was dedicated on the 21st of February, 1885. There were appropriate exercises at the base of the Monument.

Addresses were made by the Hon. John Sherman, Senator from Ohio; Hon. W. W. Corcoran, first vice president of the society, and Brig. Gen. Thomas Lincoln Casey, Corps of Engineers. There were Masonic ceremonies by the Grand Lodge of the District of Columbia, after which the Monument was dedicated by the President of the United States, Chester A. Arthur, in a brief and eloquent address.

Ceremonies were also held in the Hall of the House of Representatives, where Congress met in joint session. An oration by Robert C. Winthrop, of Massachusetts, was read by Representative John D. Long of that State, and an oration followed by Representative John W. Daniel, of Virginia.

In its 81 years of existence the society, with its limited membership of 18, has had many notable names on its roll—John Marshall, James Madison, Commodore John Rogers, Commodore M. F. Maury, Gen. Thomas S. Jessup, Col. George Bomford, Joseph Gales, W. W. Seaton, Gen. Alexander McComb, Walter Jones, W. W. Corcoran, Ulysses S. Grant, George W. Riggs, Gen. William T. Sherman, Asaph Hall, Samuel W. Langley, Joseph Henry, George Bancroft, John Sherman, Hugh McCulloch, Admiral George Dewey, and Associate Justice William Strong and Henry B. Browne of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, as to the form of this majestic Monument, it was not by chance. It reaches back far into the past—indeed, to the Pharaohs. Credit for its proportions is due to the Hon. George P. Marsh, formerly minister of the United States to Italy. In a letter to Hon. George F. Edmunds, then a Senator from Vermont, Minister Marsh told of having measured the Egyptian obelisks at Alexandria, Egypt, the one at the Vatican, that on the banks of the Thames, and that in Central Park, New York City, from which he discovered that the ancient Egyptians carved their obelisks in height 10 times the base, with the pyramidion or top equal to the base.

This information sent to the joint commission for completing the Monument resulted in conforming to the rule so discovered; hence the beauty, dignity, simplicity, and perfect proportions of the Monument.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, it appears a singular coincidence that the act of August 2, 1876, for the completion of the Monument as a memorial to him who, foremost as soldier and President in laying the foundations of this Republic, should have become law by the signature of that soldier and President who was foremost in maintaining by arms the foundations so laid.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR POINDEXTER.

Senator MILES POINDEXTER delivered the following address:

Twenty-five years ago to-day the people of the Territory of Washington by popular vote ratified the constitution of the State. In its first sentence it declares "All political power is inherent in the people and governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed." Under that benign principle we have enjoyed a quarter of a century of liberty. Free to govern ourselves in local affairs, we have been protected from outside interference by our National Union. No happier fate was ever bestowed upon the sons of men. With an ancestry which had founded a nation and acquired the best part of a continent as the scene of their development, we received as our inheritance an area of 69,000 square miles—fertile plains, mighty rivers, vast forests, mountains, valleys, and the shining shores of the western sea. Safe harbors gave access to the commerce of the world. To this imperial domain has been given the name of Washington, and when other memorials crumble into dust it will be preserved there. But greater by far than the riches of material possessions is the common heritage of American character. We have written into our constitution the great bill of personal rights, which makes every American citizen a peer of the realm. The knowledge that he has no superior in the privileges of government and law has produced a type of citizenship representing the highest development of the race. We received also from our fathers religion and a system of education, and have preserved them both.

Unsurpassed public schools offer free instruction to all and a great State university puts learning within our reach. Churches of the living God testify to freedom of soul.

With these opportunities and advantages, our population is now near a million and a half—a prosperous and happy people, grateful to God and to our country for the blessings we enjoy. The 25 years of statehood have been years of labor, but the difficulties and problems of our work and growth have been met manfully and intelligently.

As representatives of such a people and of the State of Washington we bring here now this stone hewn from the living bosom of the State, dedicate it with our love and gratitude, and place it in this mighty monument erected to him by all the States. As it is bound in this shaft with the memorial stones of other States, uniting us in the memory of Washington, may it be a witness forever of the brotherhood and constitutional union of our people.

There is not in the whole world a nobler work of man than this Monument in which the State of Washington now has a part. Its simple lines of beauty, its enduring strength, its proportions of grace, and its mighty bulk fitly represent the character and fame of Washington. We are rich in material things and comparatively poor in things of the spirit. It is a stupendous realization that the spirit of that mighty man is here. His labors in large part earned our present peace; his exertions gave us our happiness to-day. The white bulk of this work of his people's loving hands looms large over the river of his days and the city of his dreams and calls his spirit here. Over the trees and temples, over the lawns and flowers, its pure shape shows forth continually throughout the years our living memory and love of George Washington—Washington, the dutiful son, the industrious youth, the eager soldier; Washington, the kindly neighbor, the orderly man of business; Washington, the patriot and the hero; Washington, in the summit of fame gladly surrendering the power and circumstance of office that by these peaceful waters his great soul might commune in peace with the soul of nature and of God. His spirit is here, and by the ceremony and testimonial of this plain carved stone the State which he made possible and which will bear his name to the distant shores of time enters into communion with him.

RESOLUTION BY CONGRESSMAN FALCONER.

The following resolution, offered by Congressman J. A. FALCONER, was unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That we hereby express our appreciation to the Hon. Franklin K. Lane, Secretary of the Interior, for the splendid address he has given here to-day and for the time he has devoted to help make this celebration the success it has been; that we express our thanks to Hon. Ernest Lister, governor of the State of Washington, for the generous cooperation he has given, and express our sincere regrets that he could not be present in person; that we highly appreciate the services so liberally given by the Engineer Band, and heartily thank all those who by their presence here to-day have helped to make this an auspicious occasion; and

Resolved further, That we hereby request that these proceedings be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The ceremony was closed with benediction offered by the Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, Chaplain of the United States Senate.

Music for the occasion was furnished by a stringed orchestra of the Engineer Band, United States Army.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PERKINS presented petitions of Galanthe Temple, Pythian Sisters, of Oakland; of Piedmont Parlor, Native Daughters of the Golden West, of Piedmont; and of Brooklyn Parlor 145, Native Daughters of the Golden West, of Los Angeles, all in the State of California, praying for the enactment of legislation granting pensions to civil-service employees, which were referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

He also presented a memorial of the Bank of Italy, of San Francisco, Cal., remonstrating against the proposed tax on capital and surplus of banks, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented memorials of H. Hathaway, manager of the Mutual Life Insurance Co. of New York at San Francisco; of F. A. Stearns and Klitgaard & Nymeyer, of San Francisco; and of Julius Sonnteg, vice president of West Coast Life Insurance Co., of San Francisco, all in the State of California, remonstrating against the proposed tax on insurance companies, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. POINDEXTER presented petitions of sundry citizens of Washington, D. C.; of New York City and Brooklyn, N. Y.; of Pittsburgh, Pa.; of Chicago, Ill.; and of Minnesota and Ohio, praying for the enactment of legislation to grant recognition to Dr. Cook as the discoverer of the North Pole, which were referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also presented a petition of the Millville Socialist Local, of Colville, Wash., favoring neutrality by the United States during the present European war and also for the prohibition of the shipment of foodstuffs from the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. KERN presented memorials of sundry merchandise brokers of Indianapolis and Terre Haute, in the State of Indiana, remonstrating against the proposed war tax, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition signed by a large number of citizens of the United States, praying for the passage of the so-called Army veterinary bill, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented sundry memorials and telegrams in the nature of memorials from citizens and corporations of Indiana, remonstrating against certain provisions in the war-revenue tax, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan presented memorials of the Stock Exchange of Detroit, Mich., remonstrating against the proposed tax on stock and bond brokers, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented memorials from sundry banks in the State of Michigan, remonstrating against the proposed tax on capital, surplus, and undivided profits of banks, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. THOMPSON, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 6392) for the relief of registers and receivers of the United States land offices in the State of Kansas, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 801) thereon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 5474) for the relief of Patrick McGee, alias Patrick Gallagher, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 802) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 188) ceding to the State of California temporary jurisdiction over certain lands in the Presidio of San Francisco and Fort Mason (Cal.) Military Reservations, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 803) thereon.

Mr. SWANSON, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 6497) for the relief of Lloyd C. Stark, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 804) thereon.

Mr. THOMAS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2287) to correct the military record of Charles S. Wells, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 805) thereon.

BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED.

A bill and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. POMERENE:

A bill (S. 6568) to amend section 20 of an act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, as amended; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. THORNTON. Although we have no routine morning business, and I am opposed to the introduction of resolutions and bills outside of the time for morning business, I ask unanimous consent to be allowed to introduce a joint resolution, because the Secretary of the Navy has made a request that the matter be called to the attention of the Senate and acted upon as expeditiously as possible. I ask that it be referred to the appropriate committee, which will be the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 193) to authorize the President to grant leave of absence to two commissioned officers of the line of the Navy, for the purpose of accepting an appointment under the Government of Brazil as instructors in naval strategy and tactics in the naval war college of Brazil, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. O'GORMAN:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 194) authorizing the Secretary of War to use any allotment made under the provisions of an act approved October 2, 1914, entitled "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," for the improvement of East River and Hell Gate, N. Y.; to the Committee on Commerce.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock and 23 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Wednesday, October 7, 1914, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate October 5 (legislative day of September 28), 1914.

COLLECTOR OF INTERNAL REVENUE.

Burt Williams, of Ashland, Wis., to be collector of internal revenue for the second district of Wisconsin, in place of Herbert H. Manson, deceased.

PROMOTIONS AND APPOINTMENTS IN THE NAVY.

Lieut. Commander Rufus Z. Johnston to be a commander in the Navy from the 1st day of July, 1914.

The following-named assistant surgeons in the Medical Reserve Corps to be assistant surgeons in the Navy from the 2d day of October, 1914:

Charles E. Treibly,
William W. Hargrave,
Charles S. Stephenson, and Roscoe M. Waterhouse.

Summerfield M. Taylor, a citizen of Texas, to be an assistant surgeon in the Medical Reserve Corps of the Navy from the 28th day of September, 1914.

Paymaster Walter B. Izard to be a pay inspector in the Navy from the 19th day of July, 1914.

CONFIRMATIONS.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, October 5, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, our Father in heaven, for the disclosures Thou has made of Thyself in the beauty, grandeur, and sublimity of the material universe, in the overruling of Thy providence in the affairs of men, in the manifestation of Thy love revealed in the heart of the Christ, in the indwelling of the spirit which brings us in touch with Thee. Make us, we beseech Thee, more susceptible to these manifestations, that our lives may be brought day by day to a larger, nobler manhood. In Christ Jesus our Lord. Amen.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the Journal.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] makes the point of order that there is no quorum present, and evidently there is not.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia moves a call of the House.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this call 283 Members have answered to their names—a quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors and the Clerk will read the Journal.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a request for unanimous consent. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a short editorial from this morning's Washington Post upon the cotton situation in the South.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to print an editorial from the Washington Post on the subject of cotton in the South. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass Senate bill 2876, with the amendments recommended by the committee.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. One moment. The gentleman from Georgia moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill which the Clerk will report.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, is not the regular order to-day for the House to resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to take up the Philippine bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks, after a great deal of investigation and study and consultation with various gentlemen whom he could get hold of conveniently, that the motion to suspend the rules suspends every rule, taking this one along with it.

Mr. HENRY. Well, Mr. Speaker, will it not take a formal motion to suspend all rules in order to get at the Unanimous Consent Calendar to-day?

The SPEAKER. We are not trying to get to the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

Mr. HENRY. If you abandon the special order, is it not necessary to call the Unanimous Consent Calendar first, before you give recognition for suspension?

The SPEAKER. That has all been thrashed out, to use a common expression, several times during the summer, and the conclusion of the Chair is——

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Speaker, may I make a suggestion on this rule?

The SPEAKER. Yes; the Chair will be glad to hear from anybody.

Mr. SAUNDERS. It is perfectly true that a motion to suspend the rules suspends all the rules in the event that it prevails. But we are not concerned with the effect of this motion. We are all agreed on that point. Two suspensions can not operate simultaneously, nor can a suspension be suspended. But that is not the point in issue. The question is whether the Speaker can entertain a motion to suspend the rules at this particular time. Under the rules of the House the right on the part of the Speaker to entertain a motion of this character is limited to two days in the month and the last six days of a session.

The SPEAKER. That is true.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Rule XXVII operates directly upon the Speaker and forbids him to entertain a motion to suspend save on the days indicated by the rule itself. This rule is as follows:

No rule shall be suspended except by a vote of two-thirds of the Members voting, a quorum being present; nor shall the Speaker entertain a motion to suspend the rules except on the first and third Mondays of the month, preference being given on the first Monday to individuals and on the third Monday to committees, and during the last six days of a session.

From the most casual reading of this rule, it is apparent that the Speaker may not entertain in order, save on the days named, the motion to suspend the rules. In this respect the House rules differ from those prevailing in the States, certainly in my State, where there is no restriction upon the members to make this particular motion, nor upon the presiding officer to entertain it.

Once recognition is extended, the Member recognized is free to make this motion, and it must be entertained by the Speaker and submitted to the House. The presiding officer has no option in this respect. But no such universal right either to make or to entertain the motion to suspend the rules obtains in this body. Our Manual carefully restricts this right, and unless the Member makes his motion on the days prescribed and set apart by the terms of the rule it may not be entertained by the Speaker. The inhibition of Rule XXVII, operating directly upon the presiding officer, is positive and emphatic. The difficulty which confronts the gentleman from Georgia and forbids the entertainment of his motion to suspend the rules for the purpose indicated arises from the rule adopted over a week ago, and which for the purposes of convenience I shall refer to as "the Philippine rule." This rule operates to destroy Monday; that is to say, it eliminates the consideration of the business for which Monday is consecrated and set apart by the rules. Nay, it goes further and forbids the consideration of business which as a general proposition is in order at any time in the House. The Speaker has made two rulings as to the effect of this rule, both of which are sound, and both of which are in harmony with the contention that the motion of the gentleman from Georgia may not be entertained at this time. On Monday of last week (RECORD, p. 15832), in response to a query by the gentleman from Kentucky as to the effect of the Philippine rule on District day, the Speaker replied as follows:

The Chair has examined that rule very carefully and thinks it cuts out District day.

On the same day Mr. FERRIS, of Oklahoma, propounded the following query:

Mr. Speaker, does the adoption of the rule under which we are operating take away the privilege of considering conference reports?

The SPEAKER. It seems to the Chair that it sweeps the platter clean.

In other words, the Speaker gave the rule—and very properly so—the same effect as if it had contained the words "and shall be the continuing order until concluded." For the purposes of interpretation he read these words into the rule. The modus operandi of the rule by which this rule excludes from contemplation the business usually appropriate to Monday under the rules of the House is very simple. As soon as the rule was adopted the House was automatically resolved into the Committee of the Whole. Being no longer in the House, but in Committee of the Whole, the motions appropriate to the House could not be made. They were no longer in order. This status established by the adoption of the rule has continued from day to day, the rule automatically excluding motions that would otherwise be appropriate and in order. On Tuesday the rivers and harbors bill was taken up by unanimous consent and concluded. Wednesday was consumed by calendar business. On Thursday, as soon as a quorum was secured and the regular order was demanded, the Speaker announced that under the rule the House would resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the Philippine bill. Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole, with Mr. FLOOD of Virginia in the chair.

I submit that the same situation is presented to-day and that at this very moment the House is automatically resolved into the Committee of the Whole, and that nothing remains for the Speaker to do save to announce this fact and proclaim this status. If the rule "cuts out" District Monday, why not suspension Monday or the Unanimous Consent Calendar? There is no reservation in the rule to save suspension Monday, nor any reason why District Monday should be eliminated and suspension Monday preserved by a rule which is equally patent to exclude both and carries no intimation of an intent to discriminate between them. If this rule is a continuing order—and that is its plain meaning and the effect of the rulings cited—then we are now in Committee of the Whole, and the motion of the gentleman from Georgia is plainly not in order. This contention merely gives effect to the rule. Inasmuch as the rule as construed divested District Monday of its accustomed character, so that it was no longer District Monday quoad the Philippine bill, and no opportunity was afforded to make any motion relating to District affairs, it follows of necessity that the same rule operates to sequestrate this Monday for the consideration of the same bill. In other words, the rule deprives this Monday of the character with which it is impressed by Rule XXVII, and by automatically shunting the House into Committee of the Whole it leaves no opportunity either for a Member of the House to make or the Speaker to entertain a motion appropriate to the House. There is no twilight zone even, in which the motion of the gentleman from Georgia would be in order and proper to be entertained by the Speaker.

Now, it may be suggested that if this rule operates for the time being to exclude the motions and the business appropriate to District Monday and suspension Monday, it would therefore vacate Calendar Wednesday. But this does not follow, though Calendar Wednesday may be vacated by appropriate procedure.

The SPEAKER. You would have to have a two-thirds majority, though.

Mr. SAUNDERS. That is true, and there is no question as to Calendar Wednesday. I am seeking to point out that the Philippine rule, operating as it does to prevent the Speaker from entertaining on Monday either a motion relating to District business or to order the call of the Unanimous Consent Calendar, it must, by parity of reasoning, apply on suspension Monday to the motion to suspend the rules. We are not concerned to discuss the effect of that motion, if it is admitted and carried, and the decisions cited are therefore irrelevant. We are concerned to inquire whether at this time we are not in Committee of the Whole, waiting on the Speaker to announce that fact. If we are in Committee of the Whole, plainly the motion of the gentleman from Georgia is not in order. If it is suggested that we are not in Committee of the Whole, then what is our status and what has become of the automatic operation of the rule? If we are not in Committee of the Whole and the rule is not in automatic operation so that the motion of the gentleman is in order to-day, I submit that the Calendar for Unanimous Consent should be called. Are we in Committee of the Whole to the exclusion of the Calendar for Unanimous Consent, but in the House quoad motions to suspend the rules? This would, indeed, be an anomalous situation.

The same body of rules which provides that the Speaker shall not entertain a motion to suspend the rules save on the first and third Mondays and during the last six days of a session, thereby by necessary implication giving him the right to entertain these motions on those days only, provides that on days when it shall be in order to move to suspend the rules the Speaker shall, immediately after the approval of the Journal, direct the Clerk to call the bills which have been for three days upon the Calendar for Unanimous Consent. The Journal has been approved. If motions to suspend are in order to-day, and if a gentleman is recognized to move a suspension, then that is a ruling that such motions are in order, then it plainly follows that the calling of the Calendar for Unanimous Consent should precede any recognitions to move a suspension of the rules.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I want to be heard. I did not yield to the gentleman from Virginia. I want to be heard for just a little while, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that on account of this Philippine rule it is not in order for the Speaker to entertain a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I want to address myself to that, if the Speaker will hear me. First I want to understand the ruling of the Chair. I could not hear it distinctly. Do I understand that when a day for calling the Unanimous Consent Calendar arrives under the regular rule the Speaker is authorized to skip every bill on the Unanimous Consent Calendar and go to the suspension of the rules?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Texas desires to be heard on that——

Mr. HENRY. Yes. I just want to understand the ruling of the Chair on that.

The SPEAKER. If the Chair rules first, what good would that do?

Mr. HENRY. I have another proposition after that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the whole matter——

Mr. HENRY. If the Chair will wait, I would rather be heard first. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. All right.

Mr. HENRY. Now, Mr. Speaker—not that I think the Chair will not rule with me on this question—but I assume that we are now undertaking to operate under the Unanimous Consent Calendar rule, as we have proceeded thus far. That rule reads this way:

After a bill which has been favorably reported shall be upon either the House or the Union Calendar any Member may file with the Clerk a notice that he desires such a bill placed upon a special calendar to be known as the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

Here is the part I wish to direct the Speaker's attention to:

On days when it shall be in order to move to suspend the rules the Speaker shall, immediately after the approval of the Journal, direct the Clerk to call the bills which have been for three days upon the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

I am addressing myself to the Speaker, because I have a point of order pending.

The SPEAKER. All right. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. HENRY. I read further:

Should objection be made to the consideration of any bill so called, it shall immediately be stricken from such calendar; but such bill may be restored to the calendar at the instance of the Member, and if again objected to, it shall be immediately stricken from such calendar and shall not thereafter be placed thereon.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have assumed that we are operating on House resolution 326, which provides that this House shall resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union upon the adoption of that resolution, which has been adopted, and I maintain that it excludes everything else from the consideration of this House except proceedings under the Calendar Wednesday rule; that it has superseded entirely the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if this special rule adopted in House resolution 606, to which I have referred, is to be abrogated, it can not be done by construction or by implication. As the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] says, it must be done by a motion to suspend the operation of that rule. In other words, the Chair can not by mere construction suspend the operation of that rule, but the House must do it by a vote. I have the precedent in point, Mr. Speaker.

A motion to suspend the rules is not in order during consideration of a bill under a special order.

We are now acting under a special order, and it will take a direct and positive motion to suspend this rule.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will read the text of that decision, he will find that it does not carry out the syllabus which he has just read.

Mr. HENRY. I will read the text, of course, Mr. Speaker. Shall I read it to the Chair?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. HENRY. I read from Hinds' Precedents, section 6838:

On January 20, 1847, on motion of Mr. Charles J. Ingersoll, of Pennsylvania, the House bill (No. 622) making further provision for the expenses attending the intercourse between the United States and foreign nations (called the "three million bill" and relating to the Mexican War) was made a special order for the 1st of next February, then to take precedence of all other business until disposed of.

By postponement the consideration of the bill was once deferred, and was before the House on February 12, 1847, as unfinished business in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

On that day Mr. Ingersoll, of Pennsylvania, moved to suspend the rules so as to move that it should not be in order for any Member to move that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union rise that evening until 8 o'clock.

The Speaker said the motion was not in order, because the House was already acting under a suspension of the rules on a special order, and two suspensions could not take place at the same time.

The SPEAKER. Surely the gentleman does not contend that we are operating under a suspension of the rules?

Mr. HENRY. I maintain that we are operating under House resolution 606, and that that resolution must be suspended by a vote of this House. And I submit to the Chair in all candor and honesty of purpose, can the Chair by construction set aside further operation under that rule, when it was adopted by a majority vote of this House?

The SPEAKER. But the question the Chair puts to the gentleman is this: This decision that the gentleman has read stands all right until the end of it is reached, where the Speaker gave the reason for his ruling, and that was that they were already operating under a suspension of the rules in the thing that they were doing.

Mr. HENRY. Yes; but, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Now, the gentleman from Texas will not claim that this rule for the consideration of the Philippine bill suspends the rules of the House, because it would take a two-thirds vote to do that, and it only took a majority to adopt this rule.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I maintain that this House, by a majority vote, can repeal the rule which provides for the suspension of the rules.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY. In just a moment. Whenever a resolution is submitted from the Committee on Rules to amend or supersede any rule of this House a majority of the House can amend any rule, can change the code of rules, can rewrite them entirely.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. HENRY. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. TOWNER. Is it the gentleman's belief that it would require a special motion in order to relieve the House itself of a special rule?

Mr. HENRY. It is.

Mr. TOWNER. I ask the gentleman's idea about it, because I would like to know what he thinks. Is not a motion made to suspend the rules or to suspend all rules an inclusive motion? Does not that include special rules as well as other rules?

Mr. HENRY. My contention is that the Speaker has no right to recognize any Member to make that sort of a motion until a special resolution is brought in here suspending this other resolution that we have already adopted.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HENRY. I will.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think it would be in order to move to suspend the rules and set aside a special order?

Mr. HENRY. No; I do not. I do not think the Speaker has any right to recognize anyone to move to set this special order aside until a special rule is brought in to abrogate it.

Mr. MANN. Under the order of business for suspension of the rules you could make any motion you wanted to, or to suspend or revoke any other rule that is in the rules.

Mr. HENRY. Not until you get away from this.

Mr. MANN. I say ordinarily it would be in order to amend the rules in any particular by a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. HENRY. Ordinarily, yes.

Mr. MANN. Then, as I understand the claim of the gentleman, this special rule is something above and beyond and greater than all the other rules of the House?

Mr. HENRY. Precisely; because we have from time to time superseded the special rules that we brought in here.

Mr. MANN. But is it not a fact, however, that this special rule and all other special rules are in the nature of an amendment to the general rules, acting temporarily?

Mr. HENRY. Yes; but——

Mr. MANN. We proceed under the other general rules of the House. No other general rule of the House is abrogated, except what constitutes the regular order of business.

Mr. HENRY. Until this rule has been exhausted the Speaker has no right, unless a special resolution is brought in here, to recognize any Member to move to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, section 5752 of Hinds' Precedents says that a motion to suspend the rules and pass a bill was held to suspend a provision of the rules of the House that provided that on Friday the House should take a recess at 5 o'clock, because the motion was to suspend that rule as well as the special rule.

The SPEAKER. What is the number of that?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Section 5752, in volume 5 of Hinds' Precedents. Carrying out the Speaker's statement to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY], the Congressional Globe for the second session of the Twenty-ninth Congress, in which the ruling quoted by the gentleman from Texas was made, shows that the Speaker in that case ruled that—

> The motion was not in order because the House was already acting under a suspension of the rules on a special order, and two suspensions could not take place at one time.

That is, the motion having been made to suspend the rules, and the House operating under that motion, another motion to suspend the rules could not be made. The motion that had been adopted by a two-thirds vote, it was held, could not be suspended by another motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Speaker, may I call attention to the fact that the authority cited by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] relates to the operation and effect of the motion to suspend, once carried, and does not at all touch the proposition that the motion itself can not be entertained at this time by the Speaker. We need not concern ourselves with the effect of a motion to suspend, but should direct our inquiry to ascertain whether there is any authority in the Speaker to entertain the motion; that is to say, to determine whether under the necessary and automatic operation of the Philippine rule the Speaker's authority for the time being is not limited to the mere formal declaration that "the House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill 18459, with the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] in the chair." No one disputes the precedent cited by the gentleman from New York in its application to the appropriate state of facts.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule. The more the Chair studies this subject of a motion to suspend the rules the more certain he is that the men that made the rule gave the Speaker authority to recognize Members on the first and third Mondays and the six last days of the session to move to suspend the rules in order that the Speaker by entertaining the motion might help the House out of a hole when it gets into one.

I do not know whether the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] was here or not, but three or four times this last summer the Chair, recognizing the exigencies of the situation, has begun about 4 o'clock, or half past 4, on the first and third Mondays to recognize Members to suspend the rules; and that has been his practice now for something like six weeks or two months.

The Chair is just as anxious to maintain the integrity of the Unanimous Consent Calendar as is any gentleman on the floor. The decisions on this point as to suspending the rules during the pendency of a special order are not in harmony. The one read by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] does not apply, because it was rendered under a different set of circumstances. There is one in point on the other side, which I will read directly.

Members will recollect that toward the end of the last Congress the question was raised as to whether the Chair was obliged to wait until we got through with the Unanimous Consent Calendar during the last six days of the session before he could entertain motions to suspend the rules, and at first, offhand, the Chair thought he was; but there were so many gentlemen of experience and familiarity with the rules in the House who thought the other way that the Chair submitted the question to the House itself, and the House voted by practically a unanimous vote that in his discretion the Speaker could recognize gentlemen to suspend the rules notwithstanding the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

The Chair thinks that the solemn decision of the House on a parliamentary point is the highest authority. The gentleman from Texas did not quote the right section in regard to suspension of the rules, but quoted one about the Unanimous Consent Calendar. The rule as to suspensions runs in this wise:

> No rule shall be suspended except by a vote of two-thirds of the Members voting, a quorum being present; nor shall the Speaker entertain a motion to suspend the rules except on the first and third Mondays of each month—

And so forth.

There are three things on which the Chair is prohibited by the rules from entertaining a motion to suspend the rules. One of them is to admit any person that is not named in the rules to the privileges of the floor; another, to letting the Hall to anybody for any purpose except the business and the subsidiary business of the House itself; another is, under certain circumstances not to let anybody vote.

The House decided this matter for itself, and the Chair, operating under that decision for the last two months, has uniformly recognized some one along about 4 o'clock or half past 4 o'clock.

In the decision read by the gentleman from Texas—

> The Speaker said the motion was not in order because the House was already acting under suspension of the rules on a special order, and two suspensions could not take place at the same time.

Immediately following that decision is another one which decided that while the House was acting under a special order a motion to suspend the rules to enable a Member to exceed the hour rule of debate was admitted.

So, on the whole, the Chair thinks that he has the unquestioned right of recognizing gentlemen to suspend the rules on the first and third Mondays and on the last six days of the session. Of course this power lodged in the Speaker ought to be exercised with discretion and in order to expedite important business.

Mr. HENRY. Will the Chair hear me a moment?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. HENRY. I simply want to suggest, in order that the Chair may understand my position, that the reason I read the unanimous-consent rule was that I wanted to get the Chair's judgment as to whether or not instead of waiting until 4 o'clock to recognize Members for a motion to suspend the rules he could recognize them immediately after the reading of the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The Chair entered on the 4 o'clock plan for the reason that he did not want to break up the Unanimous Consent Calendar, and did not want everybody to rush in with motions to suspend the rules every first and third Monday.

But there are some bills that are so important that they ought to be got out of the way somehow, and there are others that can as well wait. In case of very important bills the Speaker would be justified in interrupting the Unanimous Consent Calendar to entertain motions to suspend the rules. The Clerk will report the bill.

INCREASING LIMIT OF COST FOR LIGHTHOUSE TENDER.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 2876. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize aids to navigation and for other works in the Lighthouse Service, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1913.

Be it enacted, etc., That the authorization in the act approved March 4, 1913, entitled "An act to authorize aids to navigation and other works in the Lighthouse Service, and for other purposes," which authorized the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to construct a lighthouse tender for general service at a cost not exceeding $250,000, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to increase the limit of cost provided in said authorization from $250,000 to $325,000; and the Secretary of Commerce is hereby authorized to have constructed a lighthouse tender for general service as provided in said item in said bill to cost not exceeding $325,000.

SEC. 2. That all acts and parts of acts in conflict herewith are hereby repealed.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. MANN. I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands a second.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. HENRY. I object.

The SPEAKER appointed as tellers the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The House divided; and the tellers reported that there were 79 ayes and 2 noes.

So a second was ordered.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and forty-seven Members present—not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question is on seconding the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 199, nays 71, answered "present" 7, not voting 151, as follows:

YEAS—199.

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. TAYLOR]. I voted "yea," and I desire to change that vote and vote "present."

The name of Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia was called, and he answered "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A quorum being present, the doors were opened.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia is entitled to 20 minutes and the gentleman from Illinois is entitled to 20 minutes.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Georgia yield a moment until I submit a request for unanimous consent?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to interfere with the gentleman from Oklahoma, but I think it is doubtful whether, with the rule pending, a matter of that kind can be considered at this time.

Mr. MURRAY. It could not, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will ask the gentleman to withhold it for the present.

Mr. MURRAY. Very well.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia is entitled to 20 minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Clerk read, in my time, the report of the committee upon the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2876) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize aids to navigation and for other works in the Lighthouse Service, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1913, having considered the same, report thereon with amendments, and as so amended recommend that it pass.

Amend the bill as follows:

Page 1, line 4, after the word "thirteen," insert the words "entitled 'An act.'"

Page 1, line 5, strike out the second word in the line, the word "for."

Page 1, line 6, after the word "purposes," insert quotation marks.

Page 1, line 6, strike out the word "authorizes" and insert in lieu thereof the word "authorized."

Page 1, line 6, after the words "Secretary of Commerce," insert the words "and Labor."

Amend the title so as to read: "To amend an act entitled 'An act to authorize aids to navigation and other works in the Lighthouse Service, and for other purposes,' approved March 4, 1913."

The following is the report of the Senate Committee on Commerce on this bill:

"The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2876) to amend an act entitled 'An act to authorize aids to navigation and for other works in the Lighthouse Service, and for other purposes,' approved March 4, 1913, having considered the same, report it with an amendment, and as amended recommend its passage.

"The bill thus amended has the approval of the Department of Commerce, as will appear by the annexed letter, the amendment referred to therein having been incorporated in the bill as reported.

"At the end of line 6, page 1, strike out the word 'and,' and at the beginning of line 7, on the same page, strike out the word 'Labor.'"

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
Washington, January 21, 1914.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Receipt is acknowledged of letter, dated January 15, 1914, from the Committee on Commerce, inclosing, with request for suggestions thereon by this department, a copy of Senate bill 2876, Sixty-third Congress, first session, "To amend an act entitled 'An act to authorize aids to navigation and for other works in the Lighthouse Service, and for other purposes,' approved March 4, 1913."

The act of March 4, 1913 (37 Stat. L., 1017), authorized the construction of a lighthouse tender for general service at a cost not exceeding $250,000, but no appropriation for this purpose has yet been made. The object of this bill is to increase the limit of cost of such tender to $325,000. The proposed tender is intended to take the place of the lighthouse tender Armeria, which, on May 20, 1912, struck a rock off Cape Hinchinbrook, Alaska, and was totally lost. It is also proposed to use this vessel in connection with the Alaska sealing industry in the Pribilof Islands in Bering Sea, etc.

The need for this tender is fully set forth in the estimate submitted therefor in the Book of Estimates, 1915, page 465. This is placed as the first item under group No. 1 of public works in the Lighthouse Service in the estimates of appropriations for the fiscal year 1915, and is considered the most urgent project which the Lighthouse Service has before it. Since the loss of the tender Armeria there has been no tender to adequately take its place, and the tender now doing service in Alaskan waters had to be taken from another district where its service could not well be spared.

It is suggested that the following changes be made in the bill: Line 6, page 1, strike out the word "and"; line 7, page 1, strike out the word "Labor." It is recommended that the bill be passed subject to the amendments suggested herein.

Very truly, yours,

E. F. SWEET, Acting Secretary.

THE CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, almost two years ago—that is, at the close of the last Congress—we incorporated in an omnibus bill for aids to navigation an item of $250,000 for the construction of a lightship for general service in Alaskan waters. The Department of Commerce discovered that the needs of commerce in that part of the world, the absence of ships, and the dangerous character of the waters and the business to be transacted required a heavier and stronger ship than could be constructed with $250,000. The department, therefore, immediately recommended to Congress an increase in the authorization, and bills were introduced for that purpose and have been on the calendar ever since.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. As I understand, the original estimate was $250,000, and the House passed a bill for that amount?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes. That was put in the bill. I do not remember whether that was the estimate or not. I do not remember the estimate.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; and this is to increase the amount, so that they can construct a larger ship than was at first contemplated.

Mr. ADAMSON. They want to get a larger ship because they find that the one contemplated would not be large enough to answer the purpose, and they think, further——

Mr. BARTLETT. And also to answer the taste of the department.

Mr. ADAMSON. Well, I do not know anything about the taste of the department. I concede to the Secretary of Commerce, charged under his oath and bond, who has studied it more than I have, and perhaps knows more about it than I do, his opinion and I think he is right about it. He further says if this authorization is increased that it can do other work than that contemplated by the ship originally planned and authorized and would prevent the necessity for the construction of an additional ship, in which case at the same price the two would cost $500,000, and by increasing the limit to $325,000—that is not as much as $500,000 would be—this ship would serve all the purposes and all necessities of the Government. I understand that in these waters there are dangerous rocks, one of them I have heard described as being 4 or 5 miles off Cape St. Elias, on which they have been trying for a long time to put a buoy, and the department plans the putting of a buoy so heavy that not a ship in those waters can carry it. They say the ship contemplated would not carry it, and unless this is constructed soon it will delay indefinitely the placing of that buoy, and the only chance now of getting it there would be to send a ship from somewhere else up to those waters.

The Secretary has repeatedly urged the enlargement of this authorization. He has sent letters to Congress, he has sent letters to me, and he has sent letters to other Members of Congress and to the Committee on Appropriations. Gentlemen may differ with him about the matter of taste, as suggested by my colleague from Georgia, and gentlemen may differ with him as to the propriety of having one large ship instead of two small ones, or the absolute necessity of this one; but the department charged with the responsibility of this thinks that this is what ought to be done, and I defer to their opinion in the matter myself, and really am inclined to agree with him fully. I realize that at this time conditions in the House are very unfavorable to the bringing up of any bill which proposes an increase of expenditure, and I fully sympathize with the demand for economy—in fact, I yield to no man in my insistence and devotion to strict and honest sensible economy. I have no sympathy for the pseudopretense of economy. I do not run from my shadow because some people who think political economy means to economize only when they think it would be good politics. This bill was not brought in during the critical period inaugurated by the war in Europe, nor at any time just preceding an election; it has been pending in the House and Senate for more than a year.

Economy, the mention of which frightens some of my super-economic and superconscientious colleagues, does not mean to stop the wheels of government, nor deprive the departments of the necessaries to their existence and operation. Correct economy means not to make unnecessary provision for new and outside purposes nor squander any money on doubtful and irrelevant propositions. Hundreds of things have been provided for at large expense during this Congress, and since this bill has been pending, not one one-hundredth part as essential to the welfare of the Government as this bill. If we are going to keep up the Life-Saving Service, we ought not to be frightened out of our boots by the hysteria of pseudoeconomists into refusing to make moderate expenditure to secure the safety of navigation and the efficiency of the Lighthouse Service. There is practically no Government vessel on the Alaskan coast; and since the destruction of the Armeria we have been trying to secure an adequate vessel for those waters.

The revenue cutters have rendered some assistance, but two or three weeks ago the revenue cutter in those waters was destroyed, so now there is no ship there. The department can go ahead and build the little vessel for $250,000, but it will not answer the purpose of the Government in those waters, and we will still have to have a larger ship or continue to hire a ship at great cost. To supply this vessel is an absolute necessity. Gentlemen will talk to you about reckless expenditures and levying war taxes—I beg to remind them in advance that the purpose of levying taxes is primarily to provide for operating the departments of the Government. If we spend millions of dollars, as we are doing, for other purposes not absolutely necessary and refuse to furnish an adequate ship to protect life and property on the Alaskan coast, we act very foolishly. You might just as well say a man because he is in debt will not buy a decent suit of clothes or satisfy his hunger with sound food, and then go off and buy an automobile, as to say you will make the expenditures that this Congress has made, and then be frightened by the pseudoeconomists into refusing the $75,000 increase asked for in this bill in order to save probably thousands of lives and millions of property in the northern waters adjacent to Alaska. The hysteria of my colleagues has no terror for me. I know what honest economy is, and I know what profligate expenditure is, and if we are not going to provide that the wheels of the Government may run by making such necessary authorizations as this there is no sense in collecting taxes at all. I am opposed to taxation and wish we could abolish it entirely, but it is a necessary evil we can not get along without; and as we have to tax the people, the way to spend it is to commence with necessary things like this ship, and let luxuries and wild extravagance alone, or at least postpone them until there is a surplus. This is an urgent administration measure, introduced in the House by me at the request of the administration, because it is necessary to a successful administration, and those who run to cover in the hope of fooling their constituents by the ill-timed cry of economy may just as well understand they are voting against the administration, for they are. This is one of the bills that the administration desired a rule for, but I had no fears but that we could pass it under the suspension of the rules, and availed myself of the first opportunity. You can not fool the people by that sort of cheap politics, for the people know that many of the same Members who cry economy, and follow the Republican leader in this case instead of the administration, have voted for many far less meritorious propositions than this, and propositions involving a thousand times as much money.

Gentlemen, let us be candid and sensible and do the right thing—our constituents have more sense than some of you seem to think they have.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this bill. I am opposed to increasing the reckless expenditures of this administration. [Applause on the Republican side.] In the Treasury report of September 30 we have for the first time a record of the expenditures for the first three months of the present fiscal year—July, August, and September. From that report it appears that for those three months in the present year the expenditures were $199,353,546.74. For the previous year they were $188,479,149.88, an increase for the three months of $10,874,000. That is for the first three months of this fiscal year. At that rate the increase for the year would be $43,500,000. Added to the $700,000,000 of last year it would be $743,500,000. At that rate we would have made a large deficit if we had no war whatever, but depended upon the ordinary revenues under the Underwood bill. Now, I am opposed to any increase of expenditure unless absolutely necessary. I want to stop it right where it is. I would like to have the heads of departments take notice that it is time to cut down and economize and not increase these expenditures. I know there is a proposition to raise $110,000,000 by burdensome taxation——

A MEMBER. One hundred and five million.

Mr. PAYNE. No; it is $110,000,000, according to the Senate committee—by burdensome taxation on the people of this country, direct additional taxation, and I am opposed to raising any such enormous sum. It is claimed that it is necessary because of the lack of revenues on account of the war. Well, we have here the revenues from customs for the two months since the war commenced, and the revenues for those two months, August and September, in round numbers, are $36,650,000. The Underwood bill was in full operation only eight months prior to the 1st day of August and prior to the war in Europe, and the average monthly revenue from customs was $21,800,000, which at that rate, were there no war, would be for the two months $43,600,000; but for August and September, since the beginning of the war, the customs receipts were $36,657,000, a loss of only $6,942,000 for the two months that the war has been in operation, or at a rate of three and a half million dollars per month, or $41,650,000 per annum. That is all the loss of revenue from customs for the two months on account of the war. But taking the whole year into consideration—I know there have been given out statements from the Treasury Department, and when it gets into the newspapers they say that the loss of revenue for the month of September is some $11,000,000; but they are subtracting the actual receipts in September of this year from the actual receipts in September of a year ago, when the customs receipts were coming in under the previous Republican customs law. So they get at that $11,000,000 in that way; but the actual shortage on what was produced on the average, taking the eight months under the Underwood law in full operation up to the 1st day of August, was only, as I say, three and a half million per month instead of $11,000,000.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. I hope that the House will stop in its mad career of extravagance and look into these figures and see if they had not better economize. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, supplementing the statement made by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] as to the condition existing on this anniversary of the approval of the Underwood tariff bill, I wish to call attention to a letter that I have just received from a gentleman in Chicago. In making a speech on June 23 last I used the expression "that every hour that Woodrow Wilson had been in the White House the business of this Nation has decreased more than a million dollars." I received from Mr. Charles G. Blake, of Chicago, a letter on September 15, in which he used this expression:

> During our recent primary campaign in a speech I used the statement on the face of the pamphlet of your speech of June 23, quoting, among other things, that part stating that "every hour * * * business of this Nation has decreased more than $1,000,000."
> I was "called" very hard on this statement the next day by a man who is a statist of financial and business conditions, Mr. Franklyn Hobbs.

It appears that Mr. Hobbs said that the bank clearances of the country showed that I was mistaken. It seems that Mr. Hobbs took the clearances for a number of years as the basis of his calculation and not those since the new tariff law.

I wrote back to Mr. Blake and told him that he had better have Mr. Hobbs make his comparisons immediately before and after the passage of the Underwood bill. He sent me a letter from Mr. Hobbs, from which I read the following—the letter is dated Chicago, September 22, 1914:

> I will therefore compare the clearings for the six months immediately following the passage of the tariff bill with the clearings for the same months of the preceding year, which would show the activity for the same period of the year. The only proper method is to compare the clearings of October, 1913, with the clearings of October, 1912, etc.
> Clearings for the fourth quarter of 1912 were $47,874,000,000.
> Clearings for the fourth quarter of 1913 were $44,239,000,000.
> Clearings for the first quarter of 1913 were $43,915,000,000.
> Clearings for the first quarter of 1914 were $43,395,000,000.
> Clearings for six months, beginning October, 1912, were $91,788,000,000.
> Clearings for six months, beginning October, 1913, were $87,634,000,000.

We see from these figures that clearings for the six months fell off $4,154,000,000, or $692,000,000 a month, or slightly under $27,000,000 a day.

So that when I made the statement that the business of the Nation had decreased every hour that Woodrow Wilson had been in the White House, according to the figures given by this expert, who had criticized me, I understated the facts, if it is made to apply only since the present tariff law. It is well, upon this 5th day of October, when the Underwood tariff law has been upon our statute books 12 months and a day, to recall the fact that every hour that law has been upon our statute books the business of the country has decreased more than a million dollars, and that every day that it has been on the statute books our foreign trade has decreased more than a million dollars; and that was the law that was to bring us unexampled prosperity and under which we were to go forth and capture the markets of the world and conquer the other nations of the earth by taking their trade away from them. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will be glad to answer the gentleman, but my time has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. I have enjoyed as much as anybody the remarks of the gentleman on the record of the Democratic Party, but just before the gentleman sits down I want to ask him whether the condition he speaks of admits the passage of this bill or not? The bill is to authorize the purchase of a lightship for the Alaskan coast.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I am in favor of the bill, and I think that out of the gigantic total of $1,109,000,000 that this Democratic House, pledged to economy, has already appropriated at this session they ought at least to appropriate $325,000 to build this vessel, and they should have appropriated a sufficient sum to have made a survey to locate the hidden rocks along the Alaskan coast. The other day the Tahoma, a Government life-saving ship, worth more than this bill would appropriate, was lost on that coast. I do not believe in economy when human life is involved. It would be economy to the Government, if only their own vessels were considered, to make more safe Alaskan waters.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, I am just as much in favor of economy as is the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], who has just addressed the House, but I am one who believes in making a large first cost if thereby there will result an ultimate economy.

My contention is that by granting this increase of $75,000 for this lighthouse tender there will be ultimate economy. Since the Armeria was shipwrecked in 1912 the Government has had to charter a vessel to do the work that that ship formerly did. This vessel has now been chartered for three years. It is the steamer Homer. I beg leave to call your attention to the cost to the Government of this substitute vessel, which is doing some of the work which a lighthouse tender ought to do. In 1910 the Homer was chartered at a daily rate to the Government of $142.50, and she was engaged in that year 104½ days, at a cost of $14,877.55. In the year 1911 the same vessel was chartered at the rate of $142.50 per day.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question right there?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. How much does it cost to operate a Government-owned vessel per day?

Mr. ESCH. The statistics do not furnish that in detail. In 1911 the Homer was chartered for 117 days at a cost of $16,567.75. In 1912 she cost $150 a day and ran for 133 days, at a cost to the Government of $20,025.

This new vessel which we contemplate building by this increased appropriation will not only do the work of a lighthouse tender, but also do work in furnishing the seal fisheries on the Pribilof Islands with their supplies, and will take from those islands the seal catch each year. To do that work requires a sea-going vessel. An ordinary small vessel in those dangerous waters will not meet the necessity, and on this account the committee, as well as the Department of Commerce, agrees that there should be this additional expenditure of $75,000.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt the gentleman right there to ask him a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. I understood that the Department of Commerce never undertook to have this vessel built for $250,000, but just sat down and stated that $325,000 was required before they could begin.

Mr. ESCH. The department did not begin building that vessel, because——

Mr. BARTLETT. I understand the reason was that the officials of the department appeared before the Committee on Appropriations and said they did not want to begin with $250,000, but would wait for the $325,000.

Mr. ESCH. Would the gentleman accept the word of the Department of Commerce in a case of this kind?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; ordinarily I would; but these are times when the Department of Commerce, as well as any other department, ought to retrench instead of enlarging expenses. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. ESCH. This will retrench expenses ultimately, and that is why I am urging it. This is to be a vessel of 2,000 tons. The Armeria, the vessel which this one is intended to supplant, was one of only 1,800 tons. The wireless plant, it is estimated, will cost $5,000. The machine-shop outfit will cost $5,000. It is necessary to have such an equipment on a vessel that has to make many repairs and is so far from its base. The derrick will cost $9,000. A very heavy derrick will be required in order to plant the large acetylene buoys which must be placed along the dangerous Alaskan coast. And then the windlass, operated by machinery, will cost $6,000 more, making a total of $325,000 called for by this bill.

Under all the circumstances and conditions the committee believe that this would be a wise expenditure. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] use some of his time?

Mr. MANN. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I regret very much not to be able to support any bill that my colleague [Mr. ADAMSON] may report from his committee, and I withhold my support from this bill reluctantly. But this is an effort to increase by one-third the amount originally estimated for by the Department of Commerce for this vessel and authorized by Congress. Now, a vessel may be needed, but the mail of every Congressman, I apprehend, is filled with protests, and the telegraph wires are constantly bringing protests against increased taxation upon the citizens of the country. [Applause on the Republican side.] I for one believe that instead of laying the heavy hand of taxation upon our people there should be an effort made to reduce—yea, more, to withhold—the expenditure of government money for those projects that are not absolutely necessary. [Applause.] Let us in this time of stress realize and emphasize that part of the Democratic platform formulated at Baltimore which pledged the people that we would return to the ancient economy of the Democratic Party and not needlessly expend the money of the people. Certainly we ought not needlessly to expend the money of the people when we have within a few days passed through this House a bill, which will soon be a law upon the statute books, imposing upon the country taxes that must necessarily be onerous and unusual.

The Department of Commerce asks for this tender, and it originally asked for $250,000. But the department never undertook to prepare any plans or to build a ship for $250,000. For some reason they wanted one to cost $325,000. Doubtless that would answer better, doubtless it would suit the taste of the officers of the Government and the department better; but let us set the example here to-day that we will not increase the expenditures of the Government except in cases of absolute necessity.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 266 Members—a quorum—have answered to their names.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, how does the time stand on the motion to suspend the rules?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia has 5 minutes and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has 10 minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FALCONER].

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] a few minutes ago gave us a line of talk on economy. It seems to me that his idea of economy as applied to this bill is not economy at all. It is the economy of the man who hides his talent in a napkin and buries it in the ground. In the last four years we have spent $84,000 in chartering ships to be used for the purposes for which this lighthouse tender could be used. We spend about $150 a day, anywhere from 100 to 225 days in the year, as has been stated by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH]. It would be an economy to add $75,000 to the appropriation already ordered and build a ship for $325,000. In 30 years ships and cargoes to the amount of $7,000,000 have been destroyed and many lives lost on the Alaskan coast. In 1913 three ships, valued at $500,000, were destroyed in the waters of Alaska. This lighthouse tender ship would not save all the lives or the ships, but it would have a tendency at least to make navigation more secure and would render aid to the ships that were in danger.

The Department of Commerce has been criticized in debate here to-day because it did not go ahead on the $250,000 appropriation; but the fact is that the department had its attention called to the extra hazardous waters in which this ship would operate by the wreck of such ships as the State of California, the Yukon, and the Caracao; and in the light of these disasters it was wisely decided that a ship of extra heavy and substantial construction should be built; hence the increase in appropriation was asked.

There is no question, Mr. Speaker, but that the Department of Commerce is in a position to know what is wanted in Alaskan waters. The revenue cutter Tahoma, recently wrecked, emphasizes the wisdom of safety in construction. The distances between landings and from base of supplies makes it necessary that this ship should be large and strong. Supplies and fuel for long trips away to the Pribilof Islands and to the northwestern Alaskan coast, looking into the conditions of the natives, wards of this Government, in all kinds of weather calls for this expenditure. A good ship well constructed and equipped in this case is economy. An ordinary or inferior ship in this service is extravagance and does not commend itself to the man who knows.

I have called attention to the toll of wrecks in order to emphasize the necessity of a modern-built ship that would be of better service value than the chartered ships now in use. Especially did the Department of Commerce emphasize the necessity for this added appropriation in its list of estimates for 1915, page 465, by making this appropriation item No. 1. Secretary Redfield has written the chairman of the committee, also Speaker CLARK and others, urging necessity for favorable action. The Senate after thorough consideration passed the bill, and this House should do so.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FALCONER], who just preceded me, evidently is not entirely familiar with the duties of a lighthouse tender. A lighthouse tender has nothing whatever to do with saving shipwrecked mariners or taking care of shipwrecked vessels. A lighthouse tender merely carries supplies and things of that sort to the lighthouses.

Mr. FALCONER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I will for a question, if the gentleman will make it short.

Mr. FALCONER. The gentleman knows that a Government ship in the waters where a ship is in distress would go to the aid of the ship in distress?

Mr. MANN. Oh, well, any ship, whether it is a lighthouse tender or a merchant vessel or a war vessel, would probably go to the aid of a distressed vessel, but that is not what lighthouse tenders are constructed for and that is not their duty.

What are the facts. A few years ago we were building lighthouse tenders at a maximum cost of $150,000. But the lighthouse people wanted larger tenders, more commodious quarters for the officers, and we increased the cost to $175,000 and $200,000, and a year ago—that is, in 1913—we increased the cost in providing for a lighthouse tender for Alaskan waters to $250,000.

Instead of asking for an appropriation for that amount the Commissioner of Lighthouses, and naturally his superior officer, the Secretary of Commerce, asked to increase the cost from $250,000 to $325,000. That will be the highest amount that we ever have appropriated for any small vessel. We do not appropriate so much as that, ordinarily, even for the revenue cutters, although we did appropriate $350,000 for a revenue cutter to wreck vessels at sea. But to increase the cost in itself is an extravagance. There is no need of appropriating $325,000 to build a lighthouse tender.

A year ago, in the wintertime, when they were asking for this vessel they only asked for $250,000. Congress gave all they asked for, but some genius somewhere connected with the service concluded that they ought to have a more expensive vessel. If we could stop at the expense of the vessel, we might do that, but every dollar we add to the cost of the vessel we add another dollar to the cost of the maintenance of the vessel. The larger the vessel the more of a crew it takes and the more supplies for the maintenance of the crew and the more coal and oil is necessary to operate the vessel.

Two gentlemen this afternoon have called attention to the fact that without this lighthouse tender we have been renting vessels, and the report on the House bill reported at this session of Congress to the same effect, which is not carried in the report of the Senate bill, states that in 1910 we chartered a vessel and paid nearly $15,000 for it. In 1911 we paid over $16,000. In 1912 we paid $20,000, and the inference was that if we built this vessel we would save a large amount of money, because we would not have to charter these outside vessels.

The fact is that the maintenance of the lighthouse tender itself will amount to considerably more than the entire cost we have paid for the charter of these vessels; that is in addition to the original cost of the vessels.

One of the excuses given for the proposed increase of the cost of this vessel is that they want it for other service besides the use of a lighthouse tender. We have the Pribilof Islands, the fur-seal islands, and we furnish some supplies there to the native Indians. We carry some coal and other supplies there, and it is said that if we have a very large lighthouse tender we can use that tender to carry these supplies to the Pribilof Islands.

I can not agree to that proposition. A lighthouse tender, if it performs its duty, will be quite fairly busy visiting the lighthouses and other aids to navigation. It will not have the time or the opportunity to run out to the Pribilof Islands, away yonder and far distant from lighthouses.

The suggestion was made at one time that this lighthouse tender might be used to carry coal down a river that runs up into Alaska. It is utterly impossible to use it for that purpose, and if it could be used at all in times of high water the cost to the Government would be several times what it would be to get coal down otherwise.

Now, gentlemen of the House, we passed a bill to increase the taxes the other day. I believe the country is always willing to pay all the taxes which it thinks can properly be expended. I do not believe that our country is niggardly about the payment of taxes where they think the money is needed and is economically expended. I do not believe that you can make the country believe that it is necessary, particularly at this time, to build a lighthouse tender at all on the Alaskan coast [applause], much less to build one which will cost more than any other lighthouse tender ever built. It is a time for us to be economical, and if when every one of these bills that comes up to appropriate $10,000, or $100,000, or $1,000,000, or $10,000,000, we say, "Oh, well; this does not add very much," in the end we add large sums of money. This is a motion to suspend the rules and pass this bill. If the motion is defeated, the bill remains on the calendar. No work could be done or is likely to be done if this bill passes now. It does not carry an appropriation. There will be no appropriation made until next winter. Of course, they might go ahead and prepare the plans and let the contract. It is time enough next winter to pass this bill in the light of conditions as they will exist at that time, without pledging Congress in advance that it is going to build great lighthouse tenders with fine quarters for the officers and the visitors who go on them. It would be very convenient to have a lighthouse tender costing $325,000 in which to sail up to the Pribilof Islands or for some of us, perchance, to get permission to ride in up to the coast of Alaska. It would be very convenient, but just at this time I think that we can afford to be economical and lay aside propositions of this kind, which we are not required to meet at this time, and thus save the money to the country. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remaining four minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I presume that I should have taken the view that is taken by the leader on this side of the House, if I had not known the facts regarding this case; but, knowing the facts, I could not conscientiously vote against this bill. [Applause.] I am in entire sympathy with the economy and retrenchment program that seems to be now asserted on both sides of this House, but I want to say to the gentlemen on the Democratic side of the House that you can not acquire a reputation for economy by your action on this bill. Your record has been made, and you can not retrieve it, if it is a bad one, by retrenchment upon this bill when it is not warranted; and I want to say to those on the Republican side of the House that your charges against the other side of passing bills that are not warranted, that are grossly extravagant, will not be strengthened if you oppose this meritorious measure.

Mr. Speaker, the facts regarding this proposition, in my judgment, show that the additional appropriation is an absolute necessity. Why was this enlargement made? Gentlemen seem to carry the idea that it was merely to please the department. The facts are that they are required to have a certain kind and class of vessels for this particular service on the Pacific coast. They can not secure it for the estimate of $250.000, and it was absolutely necessary to increase it to $325,000. This service is a serious service.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. I can not yield. It is to serve on the most boisterous and dangerous waters on the American coast. It is to serve not only in tending but in building lighthouses to protect and guard that coast. It is in this particular case to furnish supplies and to assist in protecting the herd of seals on the Pribilof Islands, which is the property of the Government. and there is no other vessel in the service of the Government that can give that service on the Pacific coast unless this ship shall be built. Defer it until next winter and it is too late. We must now prepare for that necessary and dangerous service; and so I say, Mr. Speaker, it is a question of economy to vote for this bill, and not to vote against it. It is only to carry out our obligations to protect our shipping against the dangers that lie in those dangerous Alaskan waters, but in building these lighthouses and in tending them we are protecting the ships that carry our people to and from Alaska and furnish the supplies to them and for the Government service. From every possible standpoint this appropriation, in my judgment, is justified, and I hope gentlemen on this side of the House will vote for this bill, because it is absolutely needed, and I think we have enough patriotism to supply whatever is needed for the service of our country. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

The House proceeded to divide.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and fifty-four Members present; not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 96, nays 158, answered "present" 2, not voting 172, as follows:

Mr. HOBSON with Mr. WOODS.

For the session:

Mr. CLANCY with Mr. HAMILTON of New York.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present, the Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Texas rise?

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to move to discharge the Committee on Banking and Currency from the further consideration of the bill H. R. 18916, to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas was not recognized for that purpose. We have not reached that order of business. In addition to that, the Chair agreed to recognize certain gentlemen to call up certain bills. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] is recognized.

COTTON WAREHOUSES.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill S. 6266, with amendments, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill as amended. The Clerk read as follows:

S. 6266 An act to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to license cotton warehouses, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That this act shall be known by the short title of "United States warehouse act."

SEC. 2. That the term "warehouse" as used in this act shall be deemed to mean every building, structure, or other protected inclosure in which any agricultural product is or may be stored or held. The term "agricultural product" wherever used in this act shall be held to include cotton, grain, and other agricultural products designated by the Secretary of Agriculture to be staple and nonperishable.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to investigate the storage, warehousing, classifying, grading, weighing, and certification of agricultural products; upon application to him, to inspect warehouses or cause them to be inspected; at any time, with or without application to him, to inspect or cause to be inspected all warehouses licensed under this act; to determine whether warehouses for which licenses are applied for or have been issued under this act are suitable for the proper storage or holding of agricultural products; to classify warehouses in accordance with their location, surroundings, capacity, condition, and other qualities, and as to the kinds of licenses issued or that may be issued to them pursuant to this act; and to prescribe the duties of the owners and operators of warehouses licensed under this act with respect to the care of and responsibility for agricultural products stored or held therein.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized, upon application to him by the owner or operator of a warehouse, to issue a license for the conduct of the same, subject to this act and such rules and regulations as may be made hereunder. Each license shall specify the date upon which it is to terminate, and, upon showing satisfactory to the Secretary of Agriculture, may, from time to time, be renewed or extended by a written instrument, which shall specify the date of its termination.

The owner or operator of every warehouse licensed under this act shall execute and file with the Secretary of Agriculture a good and sufficient bond to the United States, and such warehouses shall be designated as bonded. Said bond shall be in such form and amount, shall have such surety or sureties, and shall contain such terms and conditions as the Secretary of Agriculture may require to carry out the purposes of this act. No warehouse shall be designated as bonded under this act, and no name or description conveying the impression that it is so bonded, shall be used until a bond such as provided for in this section has been filed with and approved by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Any person injured by the misconduct or negligence of the principal named in the bond shall be entitled in an action upon the bond, brought in his own right and name in any court having jurisdiction of the same, to recover all losses he may have sustained.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of Agriculture shall charge, assess, and cause to be collected a reasonable fee for every examination or inspection of a warehouse under this act when such examination or inspection is made upon application of the owner or operator of such warehouse, and a fee not exceeding $2 per annum for each license or renewal thereof issued to the owner or operator of a warehouse under this act. All such fees shall be deposited and covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

SEC. 6. That the Secretary of Agriculture may, upon presentation of satisfactory proof of competency, issue to any person a license to classify or grade agricultural products or specified kinds of agricultural products and to certificate the class or grade thereof, or to weigh said agricultural products and certificate the weight thereof; or to classify, grade, and weigh agricultural products or specified kinds of agricultural products and to certificate the class, grade, and weight thereof, under such rules and regulations as may be made pursuant to this act. Any such license issued under this act may be suspended or revoked whenever the Secretary of Agriculture is satisfied that the holder thereof has failed to classify, grade, or weigh agricultural products correctly or has violated any provision of this act or of the rules and regulations made thereunder, or that the license has been used for any improper purpose whatsoever: Provided, That no such licensed person shall inspect or grade grain or shall certify, or otherwise indicate in writing, the grade of any grain which has been inspected or graded by him unless and until he has been duly authorized or employed by State, county, city, town, board of trade, chamber of commerce, corporation, society, or association to inspect and grade grain: Provided further, That in States which have State grain inspection established by law the Secretary of Agriculture may, in his discretion, issue licenses to persons duly authorized and employed to inspect grain under the laws of such State at the time this act goes into effect.

SEC. 7. That the owner or operator of every licensed warehouse shall receive for storage, without any discrimination between persons, any agricultural products tendered to him in a suitable condition for warehousing in the usual manner in the ordinary and usual course of business: Provided, That grain or flaxseed so received shall be graded and inspected by an inspector duly licensed under this act and shall be stored with grain or flaxseed of a similar grade; and in no case, in a warehouse licensed under this act, shall grain or flaxseed of different grades be mixed together while in store. No owner or operator of a warehouse duly licensed under this act shall sell or otherwise dispose of, or deliver out of store, any such agricultural product without the express authority of its owner and the return of the storage receipt. For all agricultural products stored or held by a warehouse licensed under this act original receipts, serially numbered, shall be issued by the owner or operator thereof, signed by himself or by his duly authorized agent. No such receipt shall be issued except for agricultural products actually stored or held in the warehouse at the time of the issuance thereof. No duplicate of an original receipt shall be issued unless the same be plainly and conspicuously marked "duplicate" upon the face thereof. While an original receipt or any duplicate thereof issued under this act is outstanding and uncanceled by the owner or operator of the warehouse issuing the same no other or further receipt shall be issued for the agricultural product, except that in the case of lost or destroyed receipts new receipts may be issued upon the giving of satisfactory security in compliance with the rules and regulations made pursuant to this act. Any receipt issued in lieu of an original shall be upon the same terms and subject to such conditions as are prescribed by this act for such original receipt. Each original receipt shall contain such terms and conditions, not inconsistent with the laws of the respective States in which issued, as the Secretary of Agriculture may require for carrying out the purposes of this act, including a true statement of the date and place of its issuance, its serial number, and the location of the warehouse in which the agricultural product is stored or held, and shall state that the agricultural product is deliverable upon the return of the receipt properly indorsed and upon payment of proper legal charges, if any be due to the owner or operator of the warehouse. Upon return of the receipt to the owner or operator of the warehouse issuing the same and upon the payment or tender of all advances and legal charges, agricultural products of the same class or grade and quantity named therein shall be delivered to the holder of such receipt within 24 hours after facilities for receiving the same have been provided: Provided, That in the case of cotton or other agricultural products customarily put up in bales or packages, each original receipt shall include a description of such bales or packages by marks, numbers, or other means of identification, and the weight thereof; the owner of such original receipt shall be entitled upon presentation thereof, and the payment of accrued charges, to receive the identical bale or package described therein within 24 hours after facilities for receiving the same have been provided.

SEC. 8. That the owner or operator of any warehouse licensed under this act shall keep complete and correct records of all agricultural products stored or held therein and withdrawn therefrom, of all original warehouse receipts, and duplicates of the same, issued by the owner or operator of the warehouse, and of the receipts returned to and canceled by the owner or operator thereof, shall make reports to the Secretary of Agriculture, in such form and at such times as he may require, and shall be conducted and operated in all other respects in compliance with this act and the rules and regulations made hereunder.

SEC. 9. That any warehouse receipt or certificate of the class or grade of any agricultural product issued under this act shall specify the class or grade of the agricultural product covered thereby in accordance with the official standard of the United States applicable thereto, as the same may be fixed and promulgated under authority of law: Provided, That until such official standards for any agricultural product shall have been fixed and promulgated under authority of law, such warehouse receipts or certificates of the class or grade of agricultural products may be issued in accordance with any other recognized standard, or in accordance with such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture. Such receipts or certificates shall show the description or the standard in accordance with which the agricultural product has been classified or graded.

SEC. 10. That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to cause examinations to be made of any agricultural product stored or held in any warehouse licensed under this act. Whenever, after opportunity for hearing is given to the owner or operator of such warehouse, it is determined that such owner or operator of such warehouse is not performing fully the duties imposed on him by this act and the rules and regulations made hereunder, the Secretary may publish his findings.

SEC. 11. That the Secretary of Agriculture may suspend or revoke any license issued to any owner or operator of such warehouse under this act for any violation of or failure to comply with any provision of this act or of the rules and regulations made hereunder, and any such license may be suspended or revoked, after opportunity for hearing has been afforded to the licensee concerned, upon the ground that unreasonable or exorbitant charges have been made for services rendered.

SEC. 12. That the Secretary of Agriculture from time to time may publish the results of any investigations made under section 3 of this act; and he shall publish the names and locations of warehouses licensed and bonded and the names and addresses of persons licensed under this act and lists of all licenses terminated under this act and the causes therefor.

SEC. 13. That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized, through officials, employees, or agents of the Department of Agriculture designated by him, to examine all books, records, papers, and accounts of warehouses licensed under this act and of the owners or operators of such warehouses relating thereto.

SEC. 14. That the Secretary of Agriculture shall from time to time make such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary for the efficient execution of the provisions of this act.

SEC. 15. That every person who shall forge, alter, counterfeit, simulate, or falsely represent, or shall without proper authority use, any license issued by the Secretary of Agriculture to any owner or operator of a warehouse, or to any grader, classer, or weigher, under this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not more than $500 or imprisoned not more than six months, or both, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 16. That the words "owner" or "operator" wherever used in this act shall be construed to import the plural or singular, as the case demands, and shall include individuals, associations, partnerships, and corporations.

SEC. 17. That there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $100,000, available until expended, for the expenses of carrying into effect the provisions of this act, including the payment of such rent and the employment of such persons and means as the Secretary of Agriculture may deem necessary in the city of Washington and elsewhere, and he is authorized, in his discretion, to call upon qualified persons not regularly in the service of the United States for temporary assistance in carrying out the purposes of this act, and, out of the moneys appropriated by this act, to pay the salaries and expenses thereof.

Amend the title so as to read: "An act to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to license warehouses, and for other purposes."

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] demands a second.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] asks unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas objects. The Chair appoints the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] as tellers. Those in favor of seconding the motion to suspend the rules will pass between the tellers and be counted.

The House divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 78, nays 0.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and fifty-three gentlemen are present—not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 224, nays 42, answered "present" 2, not voting 160, as follows:

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Moss].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Moss] is recognized.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, the hour has struck for the enactment of certain legislation in the interest of the American farmer. We are sick and tired of this endless stream of talk, professing friendship for the farmer in the face of continued failure to enact any of the bills which farmers themselves desire. There has been nation-wide discussion of rural credits but no legislation. We are nearing the close of this long session of Congress with this most-important subject held in abeyance.

The American farmer pays a higher rate of interest and borrows under harder terms than does the European farmer. We are under like disadvantage if the comparison be with the American business man. This discrimination against the farmer in our commercial world grows out of the fact that our bankers and business men are one and the same class of men. Mr. Henry B. Joy, president of the Packard Motor Car Co., in a letter to the publisher of System, in discussing the relation between business and banking said:

> As a matter of fact, the bankers of the United States are the business men of the United States, and the banks of the United States are the bulwarks of the business of the United States. Their interests are the same and mutual. Both are run by the same people.

This situation is admitted to be unfair to farmers, yet this Congress is preparing to adjourn without any action to relieve this intolerable situation.

The Moss bill for uniform grading of grain is another great measure which has been unanimously reported by the Agricultural Committee, and which is awaiting action from this body. This bill has been indorsed by the leading farm organizations, by the National Grain Dealers' Association, by the National Millers' Association, by the Department of Agriculture, and by the agricultural press of the Nation. It would establish uniform standards of quality for grain, and provides the necessary machinery to insure the fair and equitable application of these standards under the supervision of the National Government to all grain moving in interstate or foreign commerce. The provisions of the bill guarantee to the seller of grain that he will receive the full market value of his product, while they insure the buyer that he will be given exactly the grade of grain that his contract calls for. Neither of these guaranties can obtain under the present market conditions. It would stabilize prices and reduce harmful speculation in food products to the lowest limits.

So important is this question of standardization of grain grades that a great campaign of education is now under way in Indiana under the auspices of the State Grain Dealers' Association. Dr. Duvel, of the Department of Agriculture, and Prof. Christie, of our State Agricultural Extension Department, are addressing public meetings in all parts of the State on this subject. To show the importance which Indiana farmers and grain dealers attach to this subject I will insert as a part of my remarks one of the announcements of these meetings. Yet it seems impossible to secure action on the part of Congress on this most important legislation. The Moss bill for uniform grain grades seems to be sleeping alongside the Moss-Fletcher bill for rural credits.

The third great bill to aid in better organization and improvement of agriculture is the uniform warehouse bill, now before the House for passsage. I wish to acknowledge the debt we owe to Speaker CLARK for his recognition of Mr. LEVER to move the passage of this bill at this time. It places the responsibility squarely before the membership of this House. The Agricultural Committee has reported it by a practically unanimous vote; the Speaker gives you an opportunity to pass it, and if it fails those who vote in the negative must assume the full responsibility for its failure.

This bill is a combination of the Smith-Lever bill for warehousing cotton and the Moss bill for warehousing grain. It comes to the House from the Senate, where it passed by practically a unanimous vote. If the bill was constitutional when it passed the Senate it can not be unconstitutional now that it is pending before the House.

The bill, as rewritten by the Agricultural Committee of the House, applies to cotton, grain, and all other staple and nonperishable farm crops, and the owner of any of these products may apply for its benefits. The owner of any warehouse may apply for a license to operate under its provisions. Any competent citizen may apply for a license to grade such products under recognized standards; but such licensed person must secure employment from some State authority before he can issue certificates of weight or quality of agricultural products under the provisions of the bill. It does not in any instance commit the Federal Government to Federal inspection of agricultural products or in any manner nullify any State law on this subject.

The bill in every provision is permissive; in no sense is it compulsory. It does not commit the Government to the ownership or the operation of warehouses in any degree; neither does it commit the Government to the making of advances in money upon agricultural products.

The bill makes provisions whereby owners of agricultural products can purchase storage in bonded warehouses, licensed and supervised by the United States Government; to have these products graded and weighed by licensed graders, according to uniform standards of quality to be fixed by the United States Government; and the owners of such products will receive a warehouse receipt, uniform in its terms with every other warehouse receipt for agricultural products of like quality stored in any govermentally licensed warehouse in the United States. Such a receipt will present collateral security of the highest integrity, and the holder can borrow money at any bank as readily and at as low rate of interest as if he were pledging a Government bond. In every operation, from the storing of the product to its final sale and delivery to the consumer, the provisions of this bill place the farmer on a plane of absolute equality with the merchant or broker.

Every owner of agricultural products who does not desire to negotiate an immediate sale of such products can store them under ideal conditions of safety. His receipt declares their actual grade; and by consulting any reliable market quotations the owner can know what is their actual value. Any day he can secure money at the lowest interest rate by pledging his receipt at the counter of any bank.

The bank can rediscount this receipt at the regional bank. This bill thus connects the farm with the Federal Treasury through the medium of chartered banks and gives to the farmers of the United States the full advantages of our new banking and currency law. If the farmer has money borrowed on warehouse receipts, he can liquidate his obligations at maturity by the sale of his commodities in the open markets. He thus secures every advantage which the ownership of these prime necessities can give and is enabled to sell them to the best advantage when he desires to divest himself of that ownership. The bill is therefore a long step in the direction of better business methods on the farm and to make possible better living among farmers.

It is a well-known fact that in the United States we harvest a year's supply of any standard farm crop within a few weeks. The result under present conditions is to force these products on the market in advance of their actual consumption. They are thus compelled to be offered for sale to speculators to be stored for later consumption. Prices are thus forced down at harvest, when the farmer sells, to be sharply advanced after harvest, when these products are sold to the actual consumers. The result is that speculators ordinarily realize a higher net profit from farm crops than the men who actually perform the hard labor of producing them. We have thus a wide margin between the price paid to the producer and the price charged to the consumer.

This warehouse bill will remedy these adverse conditions. It will stabilize average prices, increasing them to the producer, without advancing them to the consumer. In my investigation of the system of selling farm crops in Europe, where the speculator has been starved out and products go from the farm direct to the consumer, the profit which the speculator makes in this country is in fact divided between the producer and the consumer. It is thus literally true in Europe that improved methods of storing and selling farm crops has resulted in higher prices to the producer and lower prices for the same product to the consumer. The next great advance in agricultural business methods in the United States will be along lines of cooperation. This bill presents the most splendid opportunities for cooperative action among farmers. It will enable farmers to realize in money a fair margin of the actual cash value of their products at the moment of harvest and still hold the ownership of their products until the consumer is ready to take the product directly from the hands of the producer. The result will be to eliminate the speculator, to minimize the dealings in futures, and to divide the large margin, now taken by this horde of middlemen, and to divide it between the two classes who are compelled to assume ownership of these products in order to carry on the business of the Nation—the producer and the consumer. And all of this operation shall be under the supervision of the National Government. [Applause.]

I shall close my remarks by inserting an open letter to Members of Congress, written by Herbert Myrick, publisher of the Orange Judd Farmer and several other farm papers, urging the passage of this bill:

"AN OPEN LETTER DEMANDING INSTANT ACTION IN BEHALF OF THE FARMERS OF AMERICA—CONGRESS IS URGED NOT TO ADJOURN UNTIL IT HAS ENACTED THE BILL FOR FEDERAL LICENSES OF WAREHOUSES AND FOR UNIFORM WAREHOUSE CERTIFICATES.

"To each Member of the Senate and of the House of Representatives in United States Congress assembled at Washington.

"SIR: Is it possible that you mean to let Congress adjourn without enacting Senate bill No. 6236, Union Calendar 326, which passed the Senate in August, was reported to the House with amendments September 3, and on October 5 failed to secure the necessary two-thirds vote to insure its passage?

"This bill as amended authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to issue a Federal license to any warehouse for agricultural products that his investigation shows to be worthy of such license. Thereupon said warehouse may issue a certificate representative of the quantity and quality of any nonperishable farm product stored therein. The bill provides that the warehouse certificate issued by these licensed storage places shall be reasonably uniform in phraseology and in their other characteristics throughout the United States.

"The Government is not asked to buy, or build, or establish, or operate any warehouse. Such storage places may be owned by individuals, corporations, or public authority, as at present. Produce stored therein shall be in accordance with existing law, or, where not legally provided for, grades may be established by the Secretary of Agriculture, with due regard to customs of the trade.

"The inspectors to investigate such warehouses may or shall be those already employed under the supervision of local or State authority, or by chambers of commerce, or other responsible supervisory organizations.

"In brief, this bill aims to standardize the business of warehousing nonperishable produce. It does not in any way interfere with or limit existing trade customs or storage supervision. It simply cooperates with them, but where there is no adequate supervision of warehouses this bill supplies the need.

"The national warehouse certificate for farm products issued by a warehouse which has a Federal license, therefore, will be accepted at home and abroad for just what it represents. If it certifies that it represents so many bales or pounds of cotton of such a grade, everyone who deals in the certificate, or accepts it in trade or barter, whether in the United States or abroad, will know that he can get the precise quantity of cotton that it calls for, or that in case of fire he can get its value in cash from the insurance. The same will be true of a uniform warehouse receipt for any quantity or quality of tobacco, grain of any kind, beans, hops, wool, or other comparatively nonperishable product.

"This uniform receipt will have uniform recognition as the standard of reliability. It will be free from all the weaknesses or abuses of even the best forms of warehouse receipts heretofore issued.

"The bill does not commit the Government to any financial responsibility, direct or indirect, either for the certificates issued or for the produce they represent or for the warehouses in which the stuff is stored. The measure simply provides for uniform inspection, standards, and forms of certificate. It is equally fair to every section, to every crop. It is of universal applicability. It does not constitute special privilege in any form or for any one crop.

"It is imperative that this measure be enacted instantly. Then the system of Federal inspection, standards, and certificates can be applied forthwith to existing warehouses through the Federal licensing system that the bill provides. This will be of enormous advantage to cotton growers in the present crisis, also to growers of tobacco, hops, rice, wool, wheat, corn, oats, and other relatively nonperishable produce.

"There is everything in favor of the measure, mighty little against it. This bill should pass the House by unanimous vote; then its amendments should be adopted unanimously by the Senate, so that it may become a law this month.

"If you fail to enact this measure before the present session of Congress adjourns, the farmers of the United States will bluntly ask, 'Why?' They bitterly resent the failure of Congress to enact the national system of farm finance, which all parties two years ago pledged themselves to do in the rural-credits plank of their platforms.

"To meet existing utterly unprecedented conditions, this Federal system of licensing warehouses can serve a most useful purpose to farmers and others in any neighborhood who have sufficient enterprise to avail themselves of its advantages. It confers no special benefits. It simply enables farmers generally to help themselves better to finance their own business, just as grain dealers and manufacturers already do. It is a necessary step toward enabling farmers to derive the fullest possible benefits from the Federal reserve system.

"Very respectfully,

"HERBERT MYRICK,
"President Orange Judd Co.,
"Publishers as per heading above."

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask permission to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN] is recognized.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, this bill has some good features. It applies to cotton and other agricultural products which may be designated by the Secretary of Agriculture as stable and nonperishable. But in its true inwardness the bill is simply a forerunner of and a companion piece to bills which have been introduced and which are being pressed before the House for the issuing of immense sums of currency for the purchase of cotton or to be loaned on cotton in an effort to relieve depressed business conditions in the South.

The unfortunate condition existing in the cotton-growing States on account of the war in Europe is a strong argument in favor of the Republican policy of protective tariff; it emphasizes the folly of failing properly to encourage and protect cotton-goods manufacturers of the United States by adequate tariff duties against imports from foreign countries; it emphasizes the folly of the policy pursued and persisted in by the South of growing cotton to the exclusion of almost every other agricultural crop.

The war in Europe has demoralized the business of the South and thrown its people into a panic, all because there is practically no European market for the cotton they produce. That the South is facing a crisis is evidenced by the presence in Washington of cotton growers, warehousemen, factors, spinners, bankers—men from every part of the South, interested in every branch of the cotton industry and in every line of business depending upon or connected with cotton. They have been and still are holding meetings, appearing before committees of the House and Senate, interviewing the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury, demanding legislation or appealing for relief—anything that promises to avert or postpone the calamity which threatens them.

All kinds of measures, plans, and schemes, too numerous to mention, have been presented or suggested, some of them possibly feasible as emergency measures, some of them positively dangerous and absolutely impossible.

What are some of these measures? The Committee on Agriculture has reported to the House a bill (H. R. 18492) for Federal inspection, grading, and certification of cotton; also a bill (S. 6266) for licensing of warehouses in which cotton may be stored and held until normal prices and market conditions again prevail.

The warehouse bill, soon to be urged for passage, provides for the storing of "cotton, grain, and other argricultural products, which shall be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture to be nonperishable," but it is in the interest of cotton alone, and, with the bill for grading and inspecting of cotton, will, if enacted into law, foist upon the country a plan by which cotton in warehouses and receipts therefor will be made the basis and security for loans from the Federal Treasury, or for the issue of money by or under the direction of the Federal Reserve Board, or by banks operating under the new banking and currency law. The Secretary of the Treasury is reported to have promised that warehouse receipts will be accepted as security for the issue of currency under that law at the rate or on the basis of at least 8 cents per pound, the estimated cost of producing cotton.

The cotton grading and inspection bill calls for an appropriation of $250,000 and the warehouse bill calls for an appropriation of $100,000.

One of the pending bills is H. R. 18916, which would direct the Secretary of the Treasury to deposit $500,000,000 in National and State banks in the cotton-growing States, "to be apportioned among those States in accordance with the number of bales of cotton produced therein in 1913," and would make it "the duty of said banks" to make loans on cotton "at the rate of 10 cents per pound," and require the cotton to be stored and held until "cotton sells in the open market at Savannah, Ga., at 12 cents per pound."

Another bill is H. R. 18944, introduced by Mr. HOWARD, of Georgia, which provides for an issue of $500,000,000 currency, to be issued under the new act, to be placed in the banks of the South to be used by postmasters and rural mail carriers for the purchase of cotton at not less than 10 cents per pound.

Another bill is H. R. 18655, which would provide for an issue of $300,000,000 in notes, to be issued under the new banking and currency law, for the deposit of said notes in Federal reserve banks for the purpose of making loans on "bills of sale of cotton in bales of the crop of 1913," and that "it shall be the duty of said Federal reserve banks to advance on said cotton in such Federal reserve notes at the rate of 12 cents per pound," the cotton to be held until the board "shall deem it advisable" to sell it.

Another, H. R. 18605, is "a bill for the temporary relief of cotton growers and producers of agricultural products," and provides that the secretary and treasurer of the Federal Reserve Board shall ascertain the value of all exports in 1913 of cotton, grain, tobacco, and food products, and the value of such exports produced in each of the 12 regional-bank districts in 1913; that the Secretary of the Treasury shall deposit with the 12 regional banks and branches thereof, in proportion to the value of the exports of said districts, a sum of money equal to 50 per cent of the capital stock of all the national banks in the country June 30, 1914; that the money so deposited shall be loaned to owners of cotton, owners of land on which cotton was grown, or to holders of bills of sale of cotton, at the rate of 12 cents per pound; and that said cotton "shall be held until sold, at the pleasure of the Federal Reserve Board, when and after spot middling cotton sells in the open market at Savannah, Ga., at 15 cents per pound, or at the request of the person," and so forth, to whom the loan was made. The capital stock of all the national banks in the United States June 30, 1914, was $1,058,192,335, so the amount of money to be deposited for the relief of cotton growers and for support of the cotton business is the immense sum of $529,096,167.50.

It will be noticed that, although the bill is for the "relief of cotton growers and producers of agricultural products," it provides for loans on cotton only, so it is safe to say the bill is altogether in the interest of cotton. That these bills are in the interest of cotton, and, if enacted into law, will put the Federal Government or its banks into the cotton business on a vast and ruinous basis, is evident when it is known that the average cost of producing cotton in the States of the South is from 6 to 8 cents per pound, while one of these bills makes it compulsory for banks to make loans on cotton on a basis of 10 cents per pound, and that cotton taken as security shall be held until "it sells in the open market at 12 cents per pound"; and another bill would compel loans at the rate of 12 cents per pound and the holding of the cotton by the banks until it will sell for 15 cents per pound.

Many wild and dangerous measures are presented to Congress, some of them in good faith, but most of them in the course of the political game as it is sometimes played by cunning, desperate men. The best that can be said of these particular bills (H. R. 18916, H. R. 18655, H. R. 18605, and H. R. 18944) is that none of them will be seriously considered by the committees to which they have been referred and will never reach the House. The country may rest secure in the knowledge that they are presented as such bills usually are—solely for "home consumption"—by Members who play politics in a manner which reflects seriously upon themselves and upon the intelligence and credulity of the people they assume to represent.

Another pending bill is H. R. 18666, by which it is proposed to permit or require the Federal Government alone or in cooperation with private corporations to "purchase, construct, equip, maintain, and operate merchant vessels in the foreign trade of the United States," and for these purposes $40,000,000 is to be used—$30,000,000 to be raised by sale of bonds of the United States and $10,000,000 in the form of an appropriation from the Federal Treasury.

But some measures have been passed by Congress and have been approved by the President. A law has been enacted to permit the purchase of foreign-built and foreign-owned vessels by Americans and to have such vessels, while retaining their foreign officers and foreign crews, admitted to American registry and to sail under the American flag.

A law has been enacted (S. 6357, Public Acts, No. 193) to establish a "Bureau of War Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department." Five million one hundred thousand dollars have been appropriated to enable the Government to carry on the business of "insuring vessels and their freight and passage moneys and cargoes * * * against loss or damage by the risks of war."

These laws have been passed in the face of the official protest of almost every country now engaged in war. England and France, whose navies control the seas, have notified our Government that if vessels owned by citizens of a country with which they are engaged in war are sold or transferred to citizens of the United States they will be seized or be subject to seizure and with their cargoes will be subject to their laws and the rules and practice of their prize courts.

There is no general need, and certainly no justification, for passage of these laws. The only excuse for them is the persistent demand that ships must be provided for transporting cotton to foreign markets. While the war in Europe is going on the purchase of foreign ships and their transfer to American registry is contrary to international usage, may reasonably be regarded as trickery and subterfuge, and may possibly involve us in war; but it is demanded that the American people shall place themselves in that equivocal attitude and even incur the danger of war because southern cotton must be taken care of regardless of consequences.

The total appropriations made by the laws and bills which I have referred to, or the total amount of money which may be devoted to carrying out the schemes involved in these measures, is the stupendous sum of $1,874,546,167.50.

Another scheme is that Congress be asked to enact laws to limit, curtail, and otherwise regulate production of cotton next year and in years to come, so that the supply of raw cotton shall be limited to the amount which can be used by the mills of this country and meet demands of foreign manufacturers under normal conditions, and so that the price and value of cotton shall be high enough to yield reasonable profit to the cotton grower and to all who handle or deal in it, and so that the cotton industry, fostered, supported, and controlled by and at the risk of the Federal Treasury, shall be placed and maintained upon a profitable basis for the protection and advantage of all who shall in any manner be connected with it.

Another "remedy" for the prevention of a panic in the cotton States is suggested. It is proposed that Congress shall repeal the law of March 3, 1865, by which a tax of 10 per cent is imposed upon issues of money by State banks. This repeal will permit these banks, presumably in the South, if they wish to do so, to return to "wildcat" banking as it was carried on before the Civil War. Wildcat banking was, as everyone now knows, one of the worst plagues that ever infested this country, but the cotton situation is so desperate that the friends of the cotton industry, absolutely unmindful of the general interest, are evidently willing to have that plague again visited upon the people of the United States.

The above are not all the measures, plans, and schemes which have been offered as necessary to stem the tide of threatened bankruptcy in the cotton-growing section of the country, but they were enough to show a deplorable condition of business and the reason for the panicky feeling prevailing in that section.

A few days ago the President of the United States delivered a message to Congress and demanded the passage of a law to provide additional revenue. He said the revenue of the Government is so greatly reduced and so seriously threatened that at least $100,000,000 must be promptly raised; that this vast sum of money must be supplied without delay in order to protect the Federal Treasury, maintain the credit of the Government, and protect and sustain the business interests of the country, which are seriously threatened. The House promptly complied with the President's demand and passed a bill which will furnish $105,000,000 by collection of special taxes upon banks and brokers; by additional taxes on beer and wines and tobacco; by stamp taxes on deeds, mortgages, and other transfers of real estate; by taxes upon circuses, theaters, and moving-picture shows; and by collection of a lot of other special taxes upon the people and their business.

It is admitted by the President and his party in Congress that the taxes to be collected directly from the people of the country will be burdensome, but that they must be collected, regardless of the hardship thereby imposed upon the people, because laws now on the books fail to produce sufficient revenue and because an "emergency" exists. In view of this extra-tax levy and in view of the so-called emergency, which ought to require the administration and the Congress to observe the strictest possible care in making appropriations and rigid economy in expenditure of public funds, what justification is there for spending $40,000,000 for ships and $5,100,000 for insurance? What possible excuse can there be for the use of more than a billion and three hundred million dollars of the money of the country or for the diversion from other business of the country of more than a billion and three hundred millions of dollars of money for the protection and advantage of cotton?

The cause of this disturbance of business and the reason or excuse for the flood of legislation and of measures pending and threatened is the dependence of the South upon Europe for a market for its raw cotton. Our legislation, favorable most of the time, has been so insecure and we have so conducted our cotton business that the foreign market for cotton has been developed at the expense of our own market; foreign manufacturers of cotton goods have been encouraged, while our own have been embarrassed.

Nearly two-thirds of the cotton grown in the United States is each year sent abroad to be manufactured into cotton goods of various kinds; large quantities of this cotton in the form of cotton goods manufactured in foreign mills by foreign labor are returned to this country and sold in our markets to the exclusion of or in competition with similar goods made or which ought to be made in our own mills; large quantities are also shipped from the countries in which they are manufactured to other countries, and the trade in these goods contributes largely to the business and profits of foreign capital and gives employment to foreign labor.

The 1914 production of cotton in the Southern States will be about 14,000,000 bales of 500 pounds each, and it is estimated that at least 2,000,000 bales of the crop of 1913 have been carried over and are now in warehouses located, nearly all of them, in the South. The cotton mills of this country, operating at normal capacity, will use not more than 6,000,000 bales, and the remainder, or approximately 10,000,000 bales, will be "available for export." While the war continues this surplus of 10,000,000 bales, or a very large part of it, must inevitably remain in this country, to demoralize the cotton market and ruin or seriously imperil the entire business of the South.

The South has persistently refused to develop the American market for cotton. It is the greatest market in the world. American people consume on an average 92 per cent of all the products of American farms and factories, but as a result of the policy of the South and the way in which the cotton business has been carried on only 36 per cent of the cotton grown in this country is used by the mills of this country; 64 per cent of our cotton is shipped to foreign countries, to give employment to foreign capital and foreign labor.

Under this condition our cotton growers are dependent upon the foreign market, and any disturbance of foreign business conditions, by war or otherwise, causes panic and bankruptcy of our cotton trade, provokes violent and dangerous legislation, and threatens the welfare of the entire country. This unfortunate and dangerous condition of dependence can be improved and ultimately overcome only by developing the American market by encouraging American mills and protecting them in paying American wages.

The need of protection to manufacturers in the United States very clearly appears when it is known that wages paid in the cotton mills in foreign countries are from one-fourth to one-half as much as are paid in the mills of this country. In the cotton mills of Massachusetts the average daily wages are $1.42; in some of the cotton mills of Pennsylvania as high as $1.70 per day is paid. In the mills of the Southern States the average wage is less than $1 per day, the average in the mills of North Carolina and South Carolina being 88 cents per day. In the cotton mills in England the daily wages are from 32 to 36 cents per day for female labor and from 82 to 90 cents per day for men. In Germany and France wages are about the same as in England; in Japan, from which we import quantities of cotton goods, the wages are from 10 to 30 cents per day.

In 1908, by direction of Mr. Roosevelt, then President, some of the American consuls in Belgium investigated conditions of labor and wages paid in the cotton mills of that country. The report was printed as a Senate document, and it shows that wages paid in the mills of Belgium run from 20 to 30 cents per day. One consul reported that he had interviewed more than 12,000 employees in Belgian mills and found only 15 men whose wages were as high as 38 cents per day, and that the average daily wage was 18 cents.

As we note the difference between wages paid in the cotton mills of the United States and in foreign mills, from which we receive large quantities of cotton goods, it is certainly not necessary to make an argument for the purpose of showing that tariff duties on the product of foreign mills imported into this country are necessary; nor is argument necessary to show why when tariff duties are reduced, as they were by the Underwood law, importations of foreign goods increase and why American mills are closed or seriously embarrassed.

A few days ago the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] made a speech in the House in which he very ably showed, as I am trying to show, the embarrassing and dangerous condition of business in this country, particularly in the cotton States, and urged the protective tariff and development of the cotton-manufacturing industry as the only means by which the country can be relieved of its dependence upon foreign manufacturers. He was interrupted by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], who asked if 40 years of Republican tariff duties had not failed to develop cotton manufacture or relieve cotton growers from dependence upon foreign markets. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania was so limited that he was unable fully to answer the question. I wish to submit some facts and figures which show wonderful growth of cotton manufacture under Republican tariffs, and that, although the growth of the industry was seriously interrupted by Democratic administrations and constantly embarrassed and retarded by Democratic threats of free trade or tariff for revenue only, it was so rapid and so satisfactory as fully to justify the claim that our cotton manufacturers and cotton growers would ultimately reach a condition of substantial independence.

Growth of the cotton-manufacturing industry in the United States, 1860–1913.

	1860	1870	1880	1890	1900	1910	1913
Number of spindles in mills of South	324,000	328,000	561,000	1,570,000	4,368,000	10,494,000	12,227,000
Number of spindles in mills of North	4,912,000	6,804,000	10,892,000	12,814,000	15,104,000	17,773,000	19,293,000
Bales used in mills of South	94,000	69,000	180,000	639,000	1,523,000	2,202,000	2,961,000
Bales used in mills of North	751,000	728,000	1,382,000	1,979,000	2,350,000	2,537,000	2,825,000
Wages paid in mills of South and North	$11,699,630	$35,928,150	$40,687,612	$54,339,775	$57,933,817	$87,962,669	$104,016,000

As the table shows, in 1860, under conditions which then existed and under a policy of free trade or tariff for revenue, to which the Democratic Party still adheres, the business of manufacturing cotton goods in the South was so insignificant as hardly to deserve notice. In that year the mills of the South used only a little more than 2 per cent of the cotton grown in the cotton States; less than $250,000 were paid in wages in their mills, while mills of the North, buying cotton from the South and struggling under the burden of unfriendly Democratic legislation, used 16 per cent of the cotton production and paid more than $11,000,000 in wages. The number of spindles—which is the measure of capacity—in southern mills increased from 324,000 in 1860 to 12,227,000 in 1913; and in northern mills, during the same time, from 4,912,000 to 19,293,000. Wages paid in southern mills increased from less than $250,000 in 1860 to approximately $30,000,000 in 1913; and in northern mills during the same period wages increased from about $11,000,000 to approximately $74,000,000; and, whereas in 1860 the quantity of cotton used in mills of the South was only one-eighth of the quantity used in the mills of the North, the number and capacity of southern mills have so increased that in 1913 the quantity of cotton used by them was actually greater than the quantity used in the mills in Northern States, the South using 2,961,000 bales, while the North used only 2,825,000 bales.

This is remarkable development, but we are justified in saying that it was not as rapid or as great as it would have been if there had been no change or interruption of the tariff policy by reason of occasional Democratic success; not as rapid or as great as it certainly would have been if the industry had not been constantly embarrassed and handicapped by threats of reduction or removal of protective duties.

I wish to call attention to the result of increases and of decreases of tariff duties in just one branch of the cotton-manufacturing industry. We all remember that the Republican tariff law of 1909—the Payne law—increased import duties on certain grades of hosiery. Previous to 1909 importations of these goods had been very large, and a small increase of duties, about 20 cents per dozen pairs, or 1⅔ cents per pair, was made. The increase was bitterly opposed; the hue and cry against it, by which the country was for a time greatly deceived being the result of a systematic campaign of misrepresentation by importers, particularly by large department stores which owned or were financially interested in cotton mills in Japan and Germany, from which immense quantities of hosiery made by miserably cheap labor were shipped to the United States.

The following table shows large importations of hosiery and cotton cloths for several years previous to the passage of the Payne law; it shows reduced importations during the years (1910, 1911, 1912, and 1913) that law was in force, and largely increased importations in 1914 as the result of reduction of duties by the Underwood law:

Importations of hosiery and cotton cloths into the United States during the years 1907–1914.

Imports.	1907	1908	1909	1910	1911	1912	1913	1914
Knit goods	$8,671,818	$9,032,554	$6,917,828	$6,462,375	$4,176,515	$3,247,894	$3,089,411	$5,671,863
Cotton cloths	13,008,067	12,424,860	10,190,137	10,040,667	8,801,004	7,760,729	7,757,928	11,845,801
Total	21,679,915	21,457,414	17,107,965	16,503,042	12,977,519	11,008,623	10,847,339	17,517,664

The higher duties of the Payne law shut out large quantities of goods which were the product of cheap labor of foreign countries. American cotton mills, paying American wages to their employees, were able reasonably to supply the home market; and it was very noticeable that the increase of price of hosiery predicted by importers and department stores as the result of increase of duties never was imposed upon the American consumer. American mills were opened, American labor was employed, America used the products of its own labor, and the price of the product to the consumer was not increased. The Underwood law repealed the increase of duties, and the result was that in one year, or from October 3, 1913, to July 1, 1914, importation of foreign goods increased more than 60 per cent.

I shall not make a lengthy argument to show the effect of the tariff on the cotton industry. I am giving a few facts and figures by which it can readily be seen that, with adequate duties for the protection of our manufacturers against competition of foreign mills in which wages paid are only a small fraction of the wages paid in this country, our mills can be successfully operated; that while reasonable tariff duties were maintained the number and capacity of our mills increased, the number of employees and the wages paid for labor increased, and the proportion of the cotton crop used at home increased; that with protective duties in force we were becoming more and more independent of foreign countries, as far as cotton and the output of cotton mills is concerned.

It will very likely always be necessary for this country to import some cotton goods, and it will always be profitable for our cotton producers to supply a part of their crop to foreign mills; but it seems the height of folly for us deliberately to fail to make reasonable use of our own products and refuse to protect and develop to the limit of our ability an industry which we are able to carry on with profit and advantage; to persist in our dependence upon foreign countries for a market for a product upon which the welfare of one section of our country, having one-third of the population of the entire country, absolutely depends.

Development of the cotton-manufacturing industry is vital to the South. The South produces cotton in abundance; it has this raw material at its doors; it has abundance of labor; its capitalists have shown ability and willingness to take advantage of these favorable conditions. It ought to embrace or permit a policy in respect to its own particular industry—a policy forced upon them, it is true, but the only policy under which they have ever enjoyed real prosperity, the only policy which gives assurance of substantial and permanent development.

The Democratic Party, its policy dictated by the South, opposes the Republican policy of protection. It is inconceivable that its people should be satisfied with and willing to return to the condition which existed prior to the enactment of the first Republican tariff law, that they should permit a vital industrial question to be determined by prejudice rather than by reason and experience. Is it possible that devotion to the Confederate constitution, which forbade import duties for the purpose of protection, leads the South to demand in this enlightened age a policy which makes development of manufacturing impossible and condemns their people to the growing of cotton for the use and advantage of foreign manufacturers? Will they not rather embrace a policy which promises large measure of prosperity and ultimate industrial independence? If the South wishes to continue in its course, will the rest of the country permit it to dictate the policy to be pursued? Will the rest of the country permit the continuance of a condition which results in loss and failure of business and employment, and which exposes the entire country to the danger of freak legislation whenever foreign business conditions are seriously disturbed?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, on Saturday we were notified that those of us who believed in relief for the cotton farmers would not be permitted to be heard. Until that embargo is raised I shall object to any extension of remarks of those who are opposed to such relief.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas objects.

Mr. LEVER. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL].

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I only wish in a few words to express my interest in and my approval of this bill, believing that it will promote to some extent the present purpose to aid the cotton growers of the country, to protect their interests in the present extraordinary crisis in the prices of cotton, produced by the European war, that has practically paralyzed their foreign markets.

Missouri is not usually considered as one of the cotton States, and the fact is that no cotton is produced in that State except in the district that I represent; but that district produces more cotton than either of the States of Virginia or Florida, and gives to the State the eleventh place in quantity and fourth in quality. My district in the year 1911 produced and sold 90,000 bales, with a total value, including lint and seed, of $5,390,000.

We are advised by the Agricultural Department that a bumper crop of cotton will be produced in the United States this year, amounting, it is estimated, to over 15,000,000 bales, and of this enormous production probably not more than 8,000,000 bales can be consumed in this country and Canada, and with but a small demand from European countries, on account of the war now raging there, it is generally estimated by experts upon the subject that we will have a surplus of from two to four million bales that must be carried in some way, otherwise the market would be so demoralized as to force the price far below the cost of production, to the great detriment of the country at large and to the very great loss of the thousands of farmers whose toil produced it.

This situation, forced upon us by the dreadful war which now afflicts the great powers of Europe, is one of the biggest problems that our country has ever faced, and is one of great concern to the entire country, and one of the gravest importance to the farmers of the country, who must depend upon the proceeds from the sale of their crops to discharge their financial obligations and to provide for another year the necessaries of life for themselves and families.

The purpose of this bill is to give to warehouses and warehouse receipts a recognized commercial standing, and thereby to aid the holders of cotton in their efforts to obtain financial assistance, so that they can hold their crops till adequate markets are reestablished. The provisions of the bill, I am glad to say, also include grain and other staple products of the farm, but the prices of grain have not yet been injuriously affected, hence at this time the cotton producers alone are in need of assistance and protection.

Let us pass this bill promptly as an evidence of our willingness and our desire to give relief to the farmers of the country.

Mr. Speaker, I ask permission to extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, is the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] here?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I am always here.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object, if gentlemen on that side object to extensions on this side.

Mr. WINGO. I do not object to that, but you have had plenty of speeches ridiculing proposed relief for the cotton farmer. The objection I made was because you objected to anybody speaking in favor of legislation for the relief of the cotton farmer.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman asked unanimous consent to extend his remarks. That will not be granted on one side if it is not granted on the other.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. LEVER. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN].

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I believe this bill can be explained in a few words. It simply provides that the Secretary of Agriculture may issue licenses to owners and operators of warehouses fit for the storage of cotton or grain; that he may accept bonds from the owners of the warehouses, so that anybody owning cotton or grain may have a place where he may store his cotton and grain with some security back of it to guarantee that if his part of the contract is fulfilled the cotton or grain will be returned to him; or, if the owner of cotton or grain desires to store it, to hold it for a higher market, he may store it and pay the charges and deposit his receipts with the bank as collateral security and borrow money on them. I need not say that under the present system the warehouse receipts which are circulating through the country now are not considered desirable collateral security, and that a high rate of interest is being paid on that class of security. Up to a few years ago money was loaned on warehouse receipts at a very low rate of interest, but on account of the frauds practiced, the failures and numerous receipts issued which were never redeemed, with no security back of them, warehouse receipts are not considered the most desirable collateral security. The bill provides for a guaranty back of the receipts which will enable the owner of cotton or grain to borrow money on the receipts at a low rate of interest.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, now that the steam roller has again been put in motion and a gag rule resorted to in order to pass this bill, a bill to tax the American people an additional $105,000,000, thus cutting off all Members from offering amendments and limiting debate to 7 hours, which on an average would give each Member of the House about 58 seconds to discuss this all-important bill, though I am grateful to my generous Democratic friends for the 58 seconds, yet rather than to undertake to present my views on the floor in the 58 seconds, I avail myself of the privilege granted Members to print. In so doing it is not my purpose to criticize, but to point out a few of the many promises Democrats made before election and incidentally to point out their inconsistency and blunders. First, the gag rule, which they so vigorously denounced before election. Their stock in trade then was "Down with autocratic rule; down with perversion and degradation of representative government." They proclaimed against it on the stump; they promised in their platform to do away with it; they declared that all party platforms would be faithfully lived up to, in this language:

> Our platform is one of principles which we believe to be essential to our national welfare. Our pledges are made to be kept when in office as well as relied upon during the campaign, and we invite the cooperation of all citizens, regardless of party, who believe in maintaining unimpaired the institutions and traditions of our country.

Why the pledge?

In my opinion that is exactly what might be expected from any party. Even the pirates of old had a sense of honor that led them to sacrifice their lives rather than their word. Every obligation, great or small, to friend or foe, had to be redeemed unconditionally. Certainly in this enlightened, civilized, and Christianized age we have a right to expect that pledges made are made to be kept.

In the Democratic platform adopted July 13, 1912, I find this language:

> We call the attention of the patriotic citizens of our country to its record of efficiency, economy, and constructive legislation.
>
> It has, among other achievements, revised the rules of the House of Representatives so as to give to the representatives of the American people freedom of speech and of action in advocating, proposing, and perfecting remedial legislation.
> We direct attention to the fact that the Democratic Party's demand for a return to the rule of the people expressed in the national platform four years ago has now become the accepted doctrine of a large majority of the electors. We again remind the country that only by a larger exercise of the reserved power of the people can they protect themselves from the misuse of delegated power and the usurpation of governmental instrumentality by special interests. For this reason the national convention insisted on the overthrow of Cannonism and the inauguration of a system by which United States Senators could be elected by a direct vote. The Democratic Party offers itself to the country as an agency through which the complete overthrow and extirpation of corruption, fraud, and machine rule in American politics can be effected.

It is sufficient to say that the rule adopted by the Democratic side in order to pass this bill, a revenue bill proposing to tax the American people $105,000,000—under it no amendments are permitted and only seven hours given for debate. In the language of your platform, $105,000,000 is to be wrung from the people by oppressive taxation, and that at the rate of $15,000,000 an hour. In connection with this it seems proper to call attention to what Democrats had to say about a similar rule adopted in order to pass the toll bill. After the adoption of that rule Speaker CLARK, on March 31, page 6057, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, referring to the fight on the autocratic rule adopted in the House, had this to say:

> I often think of the 172 Democrats and thirty-odd insurgent Republicans who achieved our great victory on March 19, 1910, which started a political revolution. I love those men too well to quarrel with them now. [Applause.] You and I, Mr. Speaker, happened to be the Democratic leaders in that historic parliamentary contest, and among House Democrats you and I have been the chief beneficiaries. You owe the leadership of the House and I owe the Speakership to the fact, fortunate to us, that we were the Democratic leaders on that memorable occasion, but I have asserted a thousand times, and I do now reassert, that every man of the 172 Democrats and thirty-odd

Republicans who fought with us on that bloody field is entitled to his full share of honor. In the immortal words of Admiral Winfield Scott Schley, "There was glory enough for all." With such men I will not quarrel. Indeed, the dignity of the high position which I hold by the partiality of the House forbids that I quarrel with any Member. I refuse to degrade the Speakership by so doing.

I assume that every Member will vote honestly the way his intellect and his conscience dictate; but why should I be denied the same privilege? No man here should be a "rubber-stamp" Congressman. [Applause.] I refuse absolutely to be either a "rubber-stamp" Representative or a "rubber-stamp" Speaker. [Applause.] If I did, you would have no respect for me. I stand for the dignity, the privileges, immunities, prerogatives, and the good name of the House of Representatives. I do not want to see this House degraded by passing, right or wrong, without any tenable reason, a bill which reverses our solemnly recorded action of two years ago, and which the Democrats indorsed at Baltimore.

There has been much felicitation among the supporters of this bill about their tremendous victory on the adoption of the rule. When it is remembered that the majority was only 28 on the rule and that a change of 15 votes would have defeated it in a House with 144 Democratic majority the grounds for their self-congratulation are hard to discover.

When Pyrrhus, King of Epirus, was walking over a battle field whereon he had won a hard-fought victory and observed the number of dead and wounded among his own soldiers, he mournfully exclaimed:

"Another such victory and we are undone."

I am willing to follow where he leads so long as he is in the White House and so long as he does not ask us to repudiate a plain platform declaration, and there I draw the line. [Laughter.]

Under our system a national convention is the grand inquest of a political party, the highest authority for the declaration of party principles, higher than President or congressional caucuses; ind ed, higher than President and congressional caucuses combined. There is no question about that.

The fathers also devolved upon Congress certain duties which we are sworn to discharge faithfully and well, duties which we can not shirk or fail to discharge without self-stultification and the condemnation of the people and of our own consciences.

The President discharges his duties. The question is, Have we the wisdom, the courage, and the patriotism to discharge ours? If not, we should make way for men imbued with the spirit of '76, to the end that we may transmit our priceless heritage of liberty to our children and our children's children unimpaired. [Applause.]

The declaration in favor of free tolls for our coastwise trade was writ large in the Baltimore platform. It is in these words:

"We favor the exemption from toll of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the canal."

Was there ever a plainer sentence written since writing was invented? [Applause.]

We went to the people on that platform containing the free-tolls plank; headed by President Wilson himself, we all indorsed it; standing on it, we appealed to the voters of the land for their support; and they, responding to our Macedonian cry for help, enabled us to sweep the land from sea to sea by amazing majorities in the Electoral College. And now it is proposed that we reward their faith in us and their support of us by repudiating one of the planks of that platform on which we achieved that astounding victory, a plank so clear that there could be no misunderstanding about it, no possible misconstruction of it. I refuse absolutely to be a party to any such performance. [Applause.] Tell it not in Gath, proclaim it not in the streets of Askalon, that the Democratic Party will not keep faith with a confiding public.

Democrats found fault with special rules brought in in Republican Congresses; they have been in control for three and one-half years, and in that time they have brought in 52 special rules. Before election they denounced caucus domination; after election the caucus has dictated practically every important vote. In caucus they have been told how to vote; they were told to play the game and vote as told or get out of the party.

I refer you to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of September 12, 1913, page 4803. HARDWICK, of Georgia, who was trying to explain his action in the House, said:

Whenever I enter a Democratic caucus I always support the nominee, no matter how much I dislike him or how great a rascal I think he is. Square dealing requires that.

[Laughter.]

Read the RECORD of September, 1913, page 4860. Mr. CALLAWAY, of Texas, is explaining as to the passage of the currency bill. He is recorded as having said:

It was whipped through the committee by the administration, brought into the caucus and made a party measure by the administration, and whipped through the caucus by the same power. It is not the product of the committee; it is not the product of the caucus. The administration handed it to us, and because it did the committee took it and the caucus took it. That settled it for the House. You cut off all Democrats from offering amendments and bound them to vote down any offered. I think the bill ought to have come into this House on its merits, and if it has not got merit enough to survive the criticism of Democrats and the assault of the Republicans, who are a hundred in the minority, and divided at that, it must be woefully lacking in merit.

This, I believe, explains the situation.

A word as to free tolls. Their platform reads:

We favor the exemption from toll of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the canal.

President Wilson, in his message to Congress March 5, 1914, had this to say:

I have come to ask you for the repeal of that provision of the Panama Canal act of August 24, 1912, which exempts vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States from payment of tolls, and to urge upon you the justice, the wisdom, and the large policy of such a repeal with the utmost earnestness of which I am capable.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, on March 27, page 5617, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, speaking against the adoption of the rule said:

In my judgment you are making a serious mistake to adopt this cloture rule, and I would not be worthy to hold your commission as the leader on this side of the House if, believing that you are making a serious mistake, I did not have the courage to stand here and tell you so in spite of everything.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma, on the same day, states:

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, like the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Clayton], I take this position because I am a Democrat. [Applause.] Evidently between us there is a difference in the definition of "Democracy." He doubtless takes the Democracy of this Nation to be the President. I do not. I deny the right either of the President or of this Congress to determine what is Democracy. Democracy is made in a representative convention duly assembled by the people. [Applause.]

We are here asked to violate our pledges twice in the same transaction—first, by a "gag" rule that will not permit the bill to be amended or an amendment to be offered, a thing that every Democratic nominee down to road overseer denounced in the campaign of 1912.

I am opposed to this "gag" rule, moreover, because if we are to stab our own party to death and a national policy of free "sees" of 100 years, we ought to have more time in which to commit the murder. [Applause.]

I take it that the Democratic platform and the statement of Speaker CLARK, President Wilson, Democratic Leader UNDERWOOD, and the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY] will be accepted as authority and that there can be no question as to the purpose of the rule adopted or as to their repudiating the three planks referred to. I voted against free tolls when the bill granting free tolls was passed, and voted for its repeal. While I was much pleased to see our Democratic friends acknowledge that they were in the wrong, I regret the necessity of repudiating their platform. I repeat what I said March 28, 1914, when the Panama Canal tolls bill was up for consideration:

In my opinion, the only ones benefited by the free tolls would be the special interests. If so, if the combine is the only one to be benefited, and even if the coast commerce would be benefited to some extent, now that the canal has been built by all the people, it seems just and fair that the special interests directly benefited should pay at least a part of the expense in maintaining it. It hardly seems fair that the people who have so generously contributed toward its construction, as, for instance, the people of Iowa, who will receive practically no benefit commercially from it, should now be called upon to pay a proportionate share of all the expenses of maintaining it in all time to come, without any remuneration whatever by the combine directly and most benefited by it.

In their platform I find this language:

We condemn the present methods of depositing Government funds in a few favored banks, largely situated in or controlled by Wall Street, in return for political favors, and we pledge our party to provide by law for their deposit by competitive bidding in the banking institutions of the country, National and State, without discrimination as to locality, upon approved securities and subject to call by the Government.

In the President's message to Congress September 4, 1914, I find this language:

The Treasury itself could get along for a considerable period, no doubt, without immediate resort to new sources of taxation But at what cost to the business of the community? Approximately $75,000,000, a large part of the present Treasury balance, is now on deposit with national banks distributed throughout the country. It is deposited, of course, on call. I need not point out to you what the probable consequences of inconvenience and distress and confusion would be if the diminishing income of the Treasury should make it necessary rapidly to withdraw these deposits. And yet without additional revenue that plainly might become necessary, and the time when it became necessary could not be controlled or determined by the convenience of the business of the country.

* * * * * * *

In order to meet every demand upon the Treasury without delay or peradventure, and in order to keep the Treasury strong, unquestionably strong, and strong throughout the present anxieties, I respectfully urge that an additional revenue of $100,000,000 be raised through internal taxes devised in your wisdom to meet the emergency. The only suggestion I take the liberty of making is that such sources of revenue be chosen as will begin to yield at once and yield with a certain and constant flow.

If it is necessary and proper to supply banks with money to tide over, why not purchase another printing press and turn out $75,000,000 in addition to the $300,000,000 already issued under the Vreeland Act? Banks pay 2 per cent on Government deposits referred to in the message. Under the Vreeland bill they pay from 3 to 6 per cent. Is it necessary to wring an additional $105,000,000 from the people already overtaxed through the process of oppressive taxation in order to accommodate a few favored banks with 2 per cent money instead of 3 to 6 per cent money? Is it good policy to take from the people's pocket $105,000,000 in order to leave $75,000,000 undisturbed in banks drawing only 2 per cent? Would it not be better to do as is being done, issue currency and loan it at from 3 to 6 per cent profit, and thereby save you from the humiliation of repudiating another plank in your platform? But why do either? Why not adopt business methods in all branches of our Government? If so, instead of wandering around to find something to tax, Uncle Sam would have money to loan. Chairman UNDERWOOD devoted much time in defense of the Underwood bill in showing what a splendid revenue measure it had proven to be; that it had produced revenue beyond expectations. In looking over the statement issued by the United States Treasury for September 23, 1914, page 3, under the head of "Receipts and disbursements," I find the total receipts for this month to September 23, fiscal year 1915, reported to be $42,319,728.53 and for same period for fiscal year 1914, $44,050,174.72, a falling off of revenue for the 23 days of only $1,730,446.19. I find that the total receipts for the fiscal year 1915, up to September 23, are reported to be $166,616,800.38, and for the same period, fiscal year 1914, $165,881,896. According to the statement, instead of a falling off of revenue we have an increase in revenue for the present fiscal year, up to September 23, 1915, over a like period in 1914, of $734,904.38.

Upon investigation I find that the Republican administration turned over to the Democratic administration on March 4, 1913, a net balance in the general fund of more than $149,000,000. Now, the question is, if receipts have increased and if a net balance of $149,335,771.78 was turned over to the Democratic administration, what has become of the money? And why are you now asking for $105,000,000 more? Before the war in Europe, some thousand miles away, in trying to explain why this industrial, commercial, and financial stagnation, we were told it was psychological. Now it is the war in Europe; but no appropriations have been authorized since the beginning of that war; every dollar appropriated for the current fiscal year was made before the outbreak of the war, and if there has been an increase in revenue for the fiscal year instead of a decrease, there must be some other reason for it. I regret to say that the reason appears to be that of extravagance. I regret it especially because in their platform I find this language:

REPUBLICAN EXTRAVAGANCE.

We denounce the profligate waste of the money wrung from the people by oppressive taxation through the lavish appropriations of recent Republican Congresses, which have kept taxes high and reduced the purchasing power of the people's toil. We demand a return to the simplicity and economy which befits a democratic government.

Has this promise been fulfilled? According to the table prepared by the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations, instead of a decrease in appropriations, as promised, the appropriations have been increased. In making the comparison I will be liberal with my Democratic friends, for I feel that they are to be pitied rather than censured.

I will give them the benefit of the large reduction in appropriations for the building of the Panama Canal, which, because of its completion, is only $21,000,000 this year, while in the past, during its construction, it has reached as high as $48,000,000, and inasmuch as the river and harbor bill passed by the House this session, carrying $53,683,004, has not yet passed the Senate, I will omit it, and the appropriations $49,380,541.50 for 1911, $30,883,419 for 1912, and $41,073,094 for 1914, made for rivers and harbors, and thereby giving them the benefit of the $14,492,138 excess over amount appropriated by a Republican Congress for the years 1911 and 1912; that is, if the amount agreed to by the House is appropriated for rivers and harbors this year. According to the table, appropriations made by a Republican Congress were, for 1911, $978,521,087.68; for 1912, $995,799,462.72; total for the two years, $1,974,320,550.60. Appropriations made by the present Democratic Congress is reported to be, for the fiscal year 1914, $1,057,605,694.40; for 1915, $1,089,408,777.26; total for the two years, $2,147,014,471.66, which is $172,693,921.26 in excess of appropriations for 1911 and 1912, which they denounced as waste of money wrung from the people by oppressive taxation. But they tell us now that because of war in Europe we must tax the American people an additional $105,000,000. They would have the country believe that because of the war, appropriations for war purposes have been increased, and therefore pass the bill. That statement, like many others, of course, is not a fact. The table shows that appropriations made for Army, Navy, and fortifications for the fiscal year 1915 to be $11,228,690.07 in excess of appropriations for the fiscal year 1914; but appropriations for pensions is less by $11,150,000, besides two battleships, the Idaho and Mississippi, were sold and $4,635,000 out of the proceeds of the sale were turned into the Federal Treasury, and adding that amount to the decrease of appropriations for pensions, instead of having an increase of appropriations because of war, we have a decrease of $4,556,309.93.

I take it that no further evidence is required to prove that the $105,000,000 asked for is because of extravagance and not because of the war in Europe. The war in Europe had nothing more to do with the $172,693,921.26 increase in appropriations than had King Dodo. Why this unjustifiable and indefensible extravagance? How was it brought about? The distinguished gentlemen from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] and New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] and others have from time to time shed light on the subject. In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 24, 1913, page 3836, Mr. SISSON, of Mississippi, is recorded as saying:

But I want to say to my Democratic colleagues that if they do not want to put a check upon these appropriations to the income of the Treasury to-day Woodrow Wilson during his second, if not the first, year of his administration will be confronted with a bond issue. * * *

We denounce you because you have expended $90,000,000 more than you expended in the preceding year. The question arises, Why on earth have the Democrats the right to denounce Republicans for extravagance in the future? For the life of me I can not see.

He went on appealing to his colleagues to carry out the pledges to the people, and said:

And be able to go home and look the honest electorate squarely in the face and say that we have kept the faith.

On April 3, 1914, page 6210, again the distinguished gentleman, Mr. SISSON, in lecturing his Democratic colleagues and advocating economy, is reported saying:

Principle has gone to the four winds of the earth and we are writing ourselves down in the history of the country as being the most outrageously and most criminally extravagant Congress that ever sat on the American continent * * *. I said that in a speech before in the last session, and when I made that speech, Members of the Democratic House came to me and asked me not to put it into the RECORD because it would be used by the Republicans in their campaign book. Let them use it. * * * You may use the statement now, gentlemen, because when Democrats get to be so violently extravagant that it makes its own record look bad as compared to the very marked record of the Republicans, I must apologize to you Republicans for having ever used the words "criminally extravagant" in criticizing the appropriations that you made, for if that expression "criminally extravagant" was proper to apply to you, my God, the English language has never found an adjective strong enough to apply to Democratic extravagance.

If you will turn to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 10, 1914, you will find Mr. FITZGERALD, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, expressing himself in this language.

It may seem somewhat strange, but I hope it is not out of place to remind Members on this side of the House that the Democratic platform pledged us in favor of economy and to the abandonment of useless office. * * * In a few months I shall be called upon in the discharge of my duty to review the record that the Democratic House shall have made in its authorization of the expenditure of the public money. Whenever I think of the horrible mess I shall be called upon to present to the country on behalf of the Democratic Party, I am tempted to quit my place.

In admonishing his Democratic colleagues he said:

They seem to take it to be a huge joke not to obey the platform * * *. We have not had their support * * *. They have voted against recommendations that they should not have voted against. They have unnecessarily piled up the public expenditures until the Democratic Party is becoming the laughingstock of the country. Those who propose to continue to do so should at least have the courage openly to assert upon the floor of this House that they believe the profession of the Democratic Party has not been in good faith; that they can not be carried out, and that we are not entitled to power because of their profession.

I might read from remarks of others, but I believe this to be good authority and sufficient.

In order that we may more fully appreciate the enormity of the large and unprecedented waste of money it may be well to make a few comparisons. According to the Statistical Abstract I find that the $172,693,921.25 appropriated in excess of Republican appropriations is forty-six times the total expenditures for the public schools in Alabama, the home of the distinguished author of the Underwood bill. It is five times the total expenditures for public schools in the South Atlantic States, and twice that in the South Atlantic and South Central States. Thus good southern Democrats have been rewarded for their loyalty to the Democratic Party. The $172,693,921.26 in excess of Republican appropriations is more than eleven times the total expenditure for public schools in Iowa for 1912. According to a statement furnished me by the auditor of my State, the tax levy in Iowa for State purposes during the year 1913 was 3.4 mills, producing in taxes $2,510,910.84; in 1914, 2.9 mills, producing in taxes $2,724,693.30; total for two years, $5,235,604.14.

The average levy for counties during the years—
1913 was 50.88 mills, producing	$33,689,650 25
1914 was 49.5 mills, producing	40,811,801 83
Total for 2 years	74,501,452 08
In indirect State taxes during the years—
1913 there was collected	$2,916,943 84
1914 there was collected	3,479,663 16
Total for 2 years	6,396,607 00

According to his statement, the $172,693,921.26 appropriated by a Democratic Congress in excess of appropriations for 1911 and 1912, which was characterized in the Democratic platform as a waste of money wrung from the people by oppressive taxation, that amount is thirty-three times as great as tax levy in Iowa for State purpose during the year 1913–14 and twice as great as the taxes levied and produced in the State of Iowa for State and county purposes for the same years. The total taxes levied each year in Iowa for State purpose equals a little more than $1 per capita in Iowa. The $172,693,921.26 excess is almost equal to $2 per capita in the United States. The total appropriations for either 1914 or 1915 by a Democratic Congress is more than $10 per capita in the United States. The $172,693,921.26 excess appropriation is nearly six times the $30,000,000 spent a year for foreign missions by the Protestant Church of the world in support of 25,000 missionaries in the field. It is nearly twice as large as the $88,301,023 production of gold in the United States; four times the $40,864,871 commercial value of production of silver in the United States for 1913. The average annual increase of appropriation for the years 1914–15 over 1911–12 in amount is as great as the total production of gold and twice the amount of the commercial value of silver produced in the United States for 1913.

If Democratic Congresses continue to increase appropriations at the rate they have been going, the increases in four years of Democratic administration will in the aggregate exceed the value of the 624,764,650 pounds of butter produced in creameries and the 994,650,610 pounds of butter produced on the farms in the United States for 1910. In other words, 5,864,493 farmers will feed and milk their cows and churn their cream for a whole year to produce an amount equal to the $172,693,921.26 excess appropriations made by the Democratic Party over what they in their platform condemned as waste. At the rate you are increasing appropriations, in five presidential terms of Democratic extravagance and mismanagement appropriations will be increased in amount equal to the value of all church property in the United States.

Truly it can be said that Democratic Congresses are skilled in the art of wringing money from the people by oppressive taxation. No one has ever doubted the ability of Democratic Congresses to tax. They have always succeeded in doing that; they always found and always will find something to tax. True, as stated by the distinguished gentleman from Alabama, the Underwood bill has produced revenue, but to raise revenue is one thing and to spend it wisely and economically is another. The distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] pointed out the procrastination in passing appropriation bills under Democratic management. He pointed out that in 1913 none of the great appropriation bills were passed until the second month of the fiscal year; that for the fiscal year 1914, after 13 months' actual sitting, they permitted two of the great supply bills to die; that in this Congress, with 8 months' extra session before the regular session, still four of the great appropriation bills were delayed in their enactment until weeks after the fiscal year had commenced; that during the first year of Cleveland's last administration, with his party in full control, none of the 12 great appropriation bills were passed until some days after the fiscal year had begun, and some of them not for many weeks; also that under Republican control public business is always promptly dispatched; that with Democrats in full control Congress is obliged to sit the full year around in order to do its work; that 20 years ago, with a majority of 80 in the House, they could not keep a quorum here without docking Members, and now, with a Democratic majority of 141, they are again obliged to resort to the same humiliating device in order to keep the Members here; that from the 5th of last June until their salaries were threatened there had not at any time been a quorum of Democrats present at any roll call, despite their enormous majority of 141. As further evidence as to their incompetency I quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 14, 1914, page 8608:

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to discuss the merits of this bill, but I do desire to discuss the condition of public business in this House. This House has been in almost continuous session for three years. In my judgment the membership of this House are entitled to great credit for earnest work and a desire to do their duty and for the work that they have performed in the interest of the American people. But I equally believe that this House is entitled to adjourn at a reasonable date this coming summer. [Applause.] The membership of this House are entitled to go home to present their views to their constituents in the coming elections. More than that, this country is looking for peace, not only peace on the American border, but industrial peace. [Applause.]

The people of the United States are not clamoring as much for legislation to-day as they are for an opportunity to do business. [Applause.] But there are some matters of importance before this House that ought to be transacted before the House adjourns, that the Congress ought to have an opportunity to vote upon before the adjournment is reached. If the membership of this House will do its duty, will maintain a quorum of the committee and a quorum of the House during the sessions of the House, and other Members will be reasonable, so far as their own personal ambitions are concerned and their own personal desires are concerned, and suppress them, we will be able to vote on the great public matters that are before us and reach an adjournment, in my opinion, early in July. [Applause.]

But we certainly can not accomplish it if the House intends to pursue the tactics that have been pursued in the last two days. In the first place, it is the duty of Members to maintain a quorum here. In the second place, it is the patriotic duty of every Member of this House not to throw any unreasonable obstructions in the way of the House doing business.

As we all know, recently Mr. UNDERWOOD was compelled to bring in a resolution identical with one passed during Cleveland's administration, docking absent Members, in order to insure their attendance and to make up a quorum. This, I believe is sufficient to prove Democratic incompetency; that they are slow to act, there seems to be no question about that; yet, while they are slow to act, they are sure to make up lost time when it comes to taxing the people.

Senator TILLMAN at the very beginning of this administration said:

The Biblical quotation I used a few days ago will become historical: "The wild asses of the desert, athirst and hungry, have broken into the green corn." That applies all along the line from top to bottom. The Democrats have been out in the cold so long * * * that they are simply wild.

Evidently the present embarrassment and unfortunate condition is not psychological, nor is it because of Democratic incompetency to raise revenue, but because of their competency for spending it, and, in the language of their platform, "to wring money from the people by oppressive taxation." Just what is going to come of it all I do not know. I am not a pessimist. I said at the beginning I would not criticize, hence I dismiss the subject of Democratic extravagance and lavish appropriations by simply saying that when I stop to consider the unwise, indefensible increase in appropriations of $172,693,921.26; and, in addition to that, in the first seven months of the calendar year, before the war began, we suffered a loss of $248,234,773 in our balance of trade, which, of course, has drawn heavily on our supply of gold, as balances are settled in gold or its equivalent; that, with no evidence of retrenchment or improvements over present methods in administering the governmental affairs, I confess that the outlook is not as bright as I would like to see it. And in addition to the excessive appropriations and loss in balance of trade, the railroads are contending that because of the depressed condition they should be permitted to increase transportation rates. They point out that on May 31, 1913, they had 50,908 idle cars, and on May 31, 1914, seven months after the enactment of the Underwood bill, the number of idle cars had increased to 241,802, an increase of 190,894; that from 175,000 to 200,000 railway employees were laid off and out of work. They told the President that the operating income of 35 eastern roads for the year was $74,002,581 less than for 1913, and therefore they should be allowed to increase transportation rates 5 per cent. What a contrast, under Republican rule, for the year 1913: The net operating revenue of railroads operating 221,748.58 miles of road increased $85,478,325.97 over 1912, and under Democratic rule, in 1913, the operating revenue of 35 roads fell $74,002,581. Judging from the patient hearing granted representatives of the railroads by the President and his sympathetic letter addressed to railroad representatives who were granted a hearing, the further fact that immediately after the President's letter was given out the Interstate Commerce Commission ordered a rehearing of the rate case, and that so recently after the railroads had been denied an increase, after a most exhaustive investigation by the Commission. I take it that the 5 per cent increase will be allowed, at least, if the President may have his way.

The operating revenue of railroads is in the aggregate about $3,000,000,000; and 5 per cent of that amount would be $150,000,000, so, then, not taking into account the falling of prices caused by free trade, the depression of business in general, the loss to hundreds of thousands of people out of employment and those working short hours, the loss of gold, the decrease in bank clearings, which decreased $779,666,215 during the first nine months of the operation of the Underwood bill, the destruction of industries such as the sugar-beet industry, the commercial failures, and hundreds of other unfortunate things incidental to depressed business conditions; the three items alone—the increase in rates, $150,000,000; loss in trade for seven months, $248,234,773; increase in appropriations for two years, $172,693,921.26—aggregate $570,928,694.36. If we multiplied $150,000,000, annual increase of railroad rates, by 4, we have $600,000,000; if loss of balance of trade continues at the rate of $35,462,111, same as was the average loss for seven months prior to the beginning of the war, in four years the American people would suffer a loss in balance of trade of $1,702,181,328; if increase of appropriations and expenditures continue at the same rate as it has in the past two years, the excess of appropriations for four years over what Democrats denounced as waste in 1912 will amount to $345,387,842.52. The three items alone will amount to $2,647,569,170.52, which represents only three of the many Democratic blunders. The cost to the American people will be more than nine times the annual salaries paid superintendents and teachers in public schools, or five times the total expenditures of public schools in the United States. It is three times the value of dairy cows and one and one-half of all the cattle in the United States. It is four times the value of mules, asses, and burros, the chief industry of Missouri. What a consolation it must be to the American people to know that if they will dispose of and sacrifice all their mules, asses, and burros and close their public schools, they will break even at the end of four years of Democratic rule.

But you say that the Underwood bill is not the cause of our unfortunate condition. According to the Monthly Summary of Commerce and Finance, July, 1914, imports for seven months, including July, 1913, were $1,018,648,675; for seven months, same period, 1914, were $1,140,593,373. According to it we have an increase in importation for seven months prior to the war in 1914 under the Underwood bill over 1913 of $121,944,698; our exports for the same period are reported to be, for 1913, $1,327,273,137; for 1914, $1,200,982,162; increase in exports for the seven months, $126,290,075, making the net loss of trade in seven months $248,234,773. In fairness I have given figures up to the beginning of the war to a time when war was not even dreamt of.

It would, of course, be unfair to compare exports, imports, and prices during the war, which has created such an unusual demand for products, especially farm products, and caused prices to go up.

What are the results of the Underwood bill and how did it pass? Congress organized with a majority in the House and Senate, in the House with 139 Democrats from the 18 Southern States; 31 from New York, the home of Tammany; 11 from New Jersey, the home and shelter of trusts; and 105 from the great Northwest. The Southern States out of their modesty took the chairmanship of 38 out of the 57 committees. The States north of Missouri and west of the Mississippi got the chairmanship of the Committee on Expenditures on Public Buildings, a committee that has not met for the consideration of bills for a quarter of a century. The South and Tammany took every important committee save two, on pensions and one one on elections, which went to Ohio. Here is what the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KINDEL], a Democrat, had to say about committee assignments (see CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, August 11, page 13332):

Here is the cause of it all:

[Mr. KINDEL here exhibits a parcel-post map, on which the residence of the 21 members of the committee are indicated by marks.]

Every one of the 14 Democratic members of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee resides within the circle of 650 miles, which is east of the ninety-seventh meridian. Every Democratic member of the committee is a lawyer by profession, and that is why I told them in Democratic caucus there was not a man among them that knew the difference between a bill of lading and a bill of fare. The three members of the committee that are shown west of the ninety-seventh meridian are Republicans.

Denver is located over here—one hundred and fifth meridian [indicating]. We had a representative on this committee in the last Congress, and before I came here. Every one of my colleagues, with the Senators, came to my bedside and promised me they would get me on that committee; but I did not get on, and that is why I am ready to tell on the floor of the House instead of in committee what I know about transportation rates. This shows the apparent discrimination. I regret that permission to insert the following maps in reduced size has been denied me.

There [indicating] is the Post Office and Post Roads Committee, within a circle of 600 miles. The fourteenth one is down in Texas—a Democrat—and the sixteenth is the Republican gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON]. No wonder we are paying these outrageous transportation rates. Talk about getting a square deal——

* * * * * * *

Mr. KINDEL. That is what they infer, but there is no proof of it. I am showing you by proof that there is not.

The Ways and Means Committee is within that circle of 650 miles. Denver is located out here. There is one Democrat, No. 10, Mr. GARNER, from Texas, and No. 21 is the Progressive gentleman, Mr. VICTOR MURDOCK, our esteemed friend, from Kansas. He is out here on line of ninety-seventh meridian [indicating]. Outside of those two we have not a soul from the trans-Mississippi West on that committee.

Here is the Appropriations Committee. Here is Denver [pointing]. The only committeeman on this important committee west of ninety-seventh meridian is the Republican gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]. We of the West are not considered when it comes to making up committees. We might as well be off the map. Here is the Agricultural Committee. We are the recognized bread basket of the universe in this the trans-Mississippi West [pointing]. We have been fighting for relief from discriminative rates for years. That is why I consented to get into politics, and why I led the Democratic victory in Colorado.

They called a caucus, and as a result of the splendid teamwork the 181 Members from New York, New Jersey, and the South overpowered the 105 Democrats from the Northwest. It was reported that some of the northern Democrats kicked and found fault, but they were subdued and put to sleep, and came out with mouth sealed, hands and feet tied, and have never peeped since. Because of their good behavior they have been permitted to sit at the pie counter and draw fat jobs for their lieutenants, while their constituents have reluctantly and inconveniently paid the bill. While they and their lieutenants have been looking after primaries and campaigns, their constituents have been selling what they had to sell in competition with the products of the cheapest land and labor on earth.

As a result of that caucus, products of the Northwest, such as cattle, corn, beef, mutton, pork, veal, milk, cream, eggs, and bacon went on the free list; duty on butter was reduced from 6 to 2½ cents a pound. On rice grown down South, they put a duty of 1 cent a pound on cleaned and five-eighths of a cent on uncleaned. On cotton goods, made from cotton grown down South, the duty was fixed at 30 per cent. Sacks to sack the wheat, corn, and oats up North were highly protected, but cotton ties went free. Trust-made articles, such as iron and steel, were well taken care of. Yet we have been told that there is no sectionalism in that—simply teamwork.

Democratic Congresses spent several thousands of dollars in investigating the Sugar Trust. Here is what representatives of the Sugar Trust told the Hardwick special committee:

FRANK C. LOWRY, SALES AGENT, FEDERAL SUGAR REFINING CO., "SECRETARY AND TREASURER," THE "COMMITTEE OF WHOLESALE GROCERS."

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr Lowry, I notice by a paper here that you are secretary, and the paper says secretary and treasurer, of the grocerymen's committee.

Mr. LOWRY. That is correct.

* * * * * * *

Mr. FORDNEY. How much money has been spent in distributing literature by that committee?

Mr. LOWRY. Somewhere in the neighborhood of $12,000.

Mr. FORDNEY. Who paid that money?

Mr. LOWRY. * * * the only one that subscribed was the Federal Sugar Refining Co.

Mr. FORDNEY. So that the Federal Sugar Refining Co. have paid in this $12,000 for the distribution of the literature?

Mr. LOWRY. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. And no other concern has paid in any sums of money?

Mr. LOWRY. No other concern; no. (Pt. 19, pp. 1607-1608 of hearings.)

* * * * * * *

Mr. FORDNEY. The Federal Sugar Refining Co. has paid, then, for the distribution of all this literature?

Mr. LOWRY. Yes; so far they have. (Pt. 19, p. 1609 of hearings, July 13, 1911.)

* * * * * * *

Mr. LOWRY. No.

Mr. FORDNEY. Does Mr. Spreckels donate all the expenses, pay all the expenses of sending out this literature? That is what you told us before.

Mr. LOWRY. He has been the only subscriber so far. (Pt. 41, p. 3379 of hearings, Dec. 9, 1911.)

* * * * * * *

CLAUS A. SPRECKELS, PRESIDENT FEDERAL SUGAR REFINING CO.

Mr. HINDS. Mr. Spreckels, you have been carrying on a campaign to reduce the tariff as beneficial to the cane-sugar refiners?

Mr. SPRECKELS. I have.

Mr. HINDS. Of course that will be damaging to the beet-sugar refiners?

Mr. SPRECKELS. To some extent it will. (Pt. 27, p. 2275 of hearings.)

* * * * * * *

Mr. HINDS. Now, Mr. Spreckels, it was testified in Washington that the movement for lowering the tariff on sugar, the movement which is going on now and in which you were interested, that your company had expended $12,000 for literature, etc.

Mr. SPRECKELS. Possibly. I do not know what the amount is. I dare say we have. (Pt. 27, p. 2276 of hearings.)

Communications sent out by Mr. Lowry. Here is one, Bulletin No. 34:

(Committee of wholesale grocers formed to assist in obtaining cheaper sugar for consumers through reduction of duties on raw and refined sugars, 138 Front Street, New York, N. Y.)

Reasons why the present "infamous" sugar tariff should be materially reduced, if not removed, at this time.

	Refined sugar.	Raw sugar 96° test.	Assessed difference per degree.
	Cents.	Cents.	Cents.
Present rate.....per pound..	1.90	1.685	0.035
Rates we propose.....do....	.624	.60	.006

Under reciprocity treaty importations from Cuba pay 50 per cent less in both cases.

CLAUS A. SPRECKELS, PRESIDENT FEDERAL SUGAR REFINING CO.

Mr. HINDS. In other words, perhaps, you would take it [the tariff] all off, would you not, and have free trade?

Mr. SPRECKELS. I would have free trade. (Pt. 27, p. 2277 of hearings.)

Mr. HINDS. You would have free trade in sugar?

Mr. SPRECKELS. Absolutely. (Pt. 27, p. 2278 of hearings.)

CHARLES R. HEIKE, SECRETARY AMERICAN SUGAR REFINING CO. FROM 1887 TO 1910.

Mr. FORDNEY. Now, if the duty were removed absolutely on sugar could we produce either cane or beets in this country?

Mr. HEIKE. I doubt it very much.

Mr. FORDNEY. Then that would destroy the industry absolutely in this country?

Mr. HEIKE. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. And you would approve of that?

Mr. HEIKE. Yes. (Pt. 4, p. 292 of hearings.)

WILLIAM G. GILMORE, PARTNER ARBUCKLE BROS., SUGAR REFINERS

Mr. MADISON. In other words, you think the thing to do is to take off the duty, and that it would be to your advantage to take it off as a refiner of cane sugar?

Mr. GILMORE. Yes, sir.

JAMES H. POST, PRESIDENT NATIONAL SUGAR REFINING CO.

* * * As far as I personally am concerned, I would like to see free sugar. As we look at the country at large, however, I think it would be a very unfair proposition. (Pt. 6, p. 527 of hearings.)

WILLIAM A. J. JAMISON, PARTNER, ARBUCKLE BROS.

Mr. RAKER. Michigan sugar, you say, competes with yours in New York?

Mr. JAMISON. Yes; the Michigan sugar has been down to New York State and all through there. It has interfered with us very largely in sales in Ohio and Pennsylvania.

Mr. RAKER. And West Virginia?

Mr. JAMISON. Yes.

EDWIN F. ATKINS, VICE PRESIDENT AND ACTING PRESIDENT AMERICAN SUGAR REFINING CO.

Mr. HINDS. So that a reduction of the tariff passing beyond a moderate amount would tend to the prosperity of the refiners and to the detriment of the beet-sugar people?

Mr. ATKINS. I think they say truly, that it is for the refiners' interest to have a low rate of duty rather than a high rate of duty, and reduce the basis of value upon which they can sell. The lower the price of the refined sugar the greater is the consumption. I think their position is well taken. (Pt. 2, p. 174 of hearings.)

* * * * * * *

The CHAIRMAN. Is it really on account of the competition, Mr. Atkins? * * *

Mr. ATKINS. I think so. * * * There is very much larger capacity than is required, and the beet sugars are taking away the trade of the refiners year by year. (Pt. 1, p. 48 of hearings.)

* * * * * * *

Before election they solemnly promised not to injure or destroy a single worthy and legitimate industry. It is generally understood that every Democratic candidate for Congress in Iowa promised before election not to vote to destroy the beet-sugar industry. What happened? After that the Sugar Trust frankly told the Hardwick special committee that it wanted free sugar, that it had spent money in order to destroy the beet-sugar industry, its only competitor, to enable it to put up prices on sugar as had been its practice in the past when the beet-sugar was not on the market. Upon that showing and having sworn allegiance to the doctrine "United we stand, without Tammany and the trust we fall," Democrats in a single stroke killed the cane and beet sugar industry in the United States dead as a doornail, not exactly all at one time but by degrees, like the Irishman who cut the dog's tail piece by piece so as not to hurt the dog so much. So with the Democratic Party, they started with a reduction and ended up with free sugar on and after May 1, 1916. Every factory in my State and 12 others have closed. Others are allowed to linger on to May 1, 1916, when the Underwood bill is expected to consign the cane and beet sugar industry to its last resting place. The Sugar Trust did exactly what it said it would do. It put the price up, and the consumers are footing the bill.

Under the "new freedom" free trade, liberal expenditures, and rich in blunders, in the first nine months under the operation of the Underwood-Simmons bill, compared with the corresponding nine months of the previous year, the importation of cattle increased from $5,771,094 to $16,345,448; corn, from $160,761 to $7,598,702; oats, from $37,678 to $7,882,735; meat products, not including sausage, from $1,103,949 to $19,622,635; butter, from $258,367 to $1,646,408; eggs, from $143,784 to $1,059,593.

Did it affect prices? Take, for instance, corn; we have the evidence of a number of grain men, exporters and importers, who appeared before the Committee on Agriculture when that committee had under consideration the grain-inspection bill. All, regardless of political affiliation, agreed that the importation of Argentine corn had affected the price of domestic corn. Here is what Mr. George W. Eddy, Chamber of Commerce, Boston, had to say (see page 131 of the hearings):

Mr. HELGESEN asked this question:

Do you think that if we import corn that the imported corn in small quantities tends to establish the price?

Mr. EDDY. It does; and I think corn would have sold from 10 cents to 15 cents per bushel higher this year if it had not been for our importations.

Mr. HAWLEY. Does the corn go into the interior country?

Mr. EDDY. It moves into the interior.

Mr. RUBEY. What is the amount of corn imported from Argentina?

Mr. EDDY. Last year they exported about 200,000,000 bushels.

Mr. PADDOCK (from Toledo). They raised about 400,000,000 bushels. (Page 236.)

Mr. PADDOCK. We are feeling very seriously at this time the importation of Argentine corn as a competitor of native corn, which is already largely distributed through New England, New York, and central Pennsylvania

Mr. HAWLEY. Have you lost any market by reason of it?

Mr. PADDOCK. Yes, sir. We have not sold a car of corn in Boston in three weeks, where we usually sell 10 to 20 cars a day. We have not sold a car of corn in Buffalo in six weeks, where we usually sell 10 to 20 cars a day.

Mr. HAUGEN. What is the reason for that?

Mr. PADDOCK. The reason for that is that the Argentine corn comes in so low.

Mr. HAUGEN. Does your company think the price of our corn has been affected by the importation of corn from Argentina?

Mr. PADDOCK. Undoubtedly.

Mr. HAUGEN. To what extent?

Mr. PADDOCK. We had a 2,000,000,000-bushel crop last year, and if it had not been for the importation of Argentine corn I think the farmers would have realized 10 cents per bushel above the present price of corn.

Mr. SLOAN. Then the producers of corn this year did not get the benefit in price on what they sold that they would have gotten if the Argentine corn had not been shipped in in competition?

Mr. PADDOCK. I think not, sir.

Here we have the testimony of men with experience and who knew what they were talking about. With a drought in Kansas, Missouri, and Nebraska, the Iowa farmer did not suffer as much as they did farther east. Because of the drought he sold his corn in those States, close to his door, and, in most instances, sold above net Chicago prices, while if we had had a normal crop in the United States he would have had to do as he has been doing in the past—pay freight and sell in Southern and Eastern States. In that case he would have had to sell his corn in Southern States, pay more freight, and meet the price of Argentine corn, selling there at 66 cents per bushel. If on the coast or in the Eastern States, he would have had to meet the price of Argentine corn, selling there at 60 cents, which was about 12 cents less than the Chicago price, which, of course, would have brought the price down considerably from what he has been getting.

Judging from discussions reported at dairy meetings held throughout the country, prices of butter prior to the war were not satisfactory to the dairy people. I take it that the importation of seven and one-half million pounds of butter, at an average price of 22 cents per pound, had something to do with bringing the price down. But they complained of the high cost of living, and because the farmers in the Northwest were riding in automobiles they decided that they might be sacrificed in the interest of the consumer. So they put his product on the free list; but instead of the cost of living going down, it has continually gone up, and so far I know of no consumer who is very enthusiastic over the result or is now clamoring for Democratic free trade to lower the cost of living.

When it was fully demonstrated that the high cost of living was not being lowered by their free trade, they embarked upon a policy to eliminate the retail merchant, to put him out of business. They appropriated money to employ people to act as agents and to distribute farm products and merchandise. Two hundred thousand dollars were appropriated for a Bureau of Markets, and besides thousands of dollars to be expended in various ways.

They hoisted the flag upon which was written in large letters "From the farmer, the factory, and mill direct to the kitchen by parcel post." They sent out literature, employed and turned loose a large number of men and women to educate the consumer how to order direct from the farmer, factory, and mill by mail, or through representatives of the Government. The weight limit on parcel post was increased to 50 pounds, and the services of the large army employed in the Post Office Department was placed at their disposal. Still the packers, the produce combine, and transportation companies kept on putting prices up; they worked night and day, still prices went up. What next? More attorneys were employed and 30 Washington merchants were indicted; farmers were indicted and prosecuted for selling decomposed eggs; but eggs old as Methuselah continued to come in from China and foreign countries, free and without limit; Dr. Melvin was sent to South America to teach the packers and people there how to pack and ship their meats here; Argentine meat came in, notwithstanding all their efforts and the money expended; prices paid to the farmer fell, but the price to the consumer continued to go up. Why? The answer is simple. They had overlooked the fact that the trusts, combines, and transportation largely fix the price, not only to the farmer, but to the consumer as well. Right now, in the midst of the European war, foodstuffs are sold cheaper in England than here. Take, for instance, only a few days ago, bacon selling in Liverpool at 28 cents and in New York at 31 cents. Before the war farmers were getting 18 cents for eggs, 26 cents for creamery butter; the consumers in Washington paid 35 cents for eggs and 40 cents for renovated butter and 45 to 50 cents for creamery butter, and as high as 50 cents per pound for beef. It is clear, then, that while tariff may in some cases affect prices, the trusts and combinations generally control. In my opinion, if the cost of living is to be reduced the Government should, instead of prosecuting the farmers and merchants, it should prosecute trusts and combinations in restraint of trade and lower transportation rates, and not grant increase of rates, as has been done. It is true that the Justice Department has in years past prosecuted a number of trusts, combinations, and monopolies, but, while I do not wish to criticize, it is a well-known fact that trusts have been prosecuted, convicted, and fined, but compromises have been made and fines abated.

In this connection, though suggestions offered may fall on deaf ears, I venture to suggest instead of impairing the Rural Free Delivery Service by letting the service to the lowest bidder, thus bidding for the slowest and poorest service obtainable, as is proposed by the Postmaster General, dispense with duplication, red tape, and antiquated bookkeeping; instead of increasing pay to railroads for carrying mail matter and parcel post, as is proposed to do in the bill recently passed by the House, cut the pay in two, the railroads would still receive more than two times the rate paid railroads by express companies for a similar service, after investigating Col. Mulhall's charges; instead of reporting lack of jurisdiction, report expulsion and prosecution; instead of sending and paying doctors $2,500 for examining Rockefeller, send the Sergeant at Arms; instead of giving immunity baths and doing what told to do by the Sugar Trust, do what seems to be in the best interest of the producer and consumer.

Instead of appointing officers and directors of trusts to office, as was attempted to do in nominating the second largest contributor to the Democratic campaign fund to a position to the Federal Reserve Board, instead of putting directors of the trust at the head of our banking institution and campaigns, instead of accepting money from lawbreakers to defray campaign expenses, they should be made to answer for their sins and to pay fines into the Federal Treasury, and, possibly, after paying fines and penalties, the consumer might look forward to some relief.

Instead of increasing the number of Government employees, as has been done, as, for instance, in the Treasury Department the number has been increased to the extent of 358 in the Treasury and 678 in the field, incurring an expense of $1,750,000; instead of appointing men to send into the field to look after nominations and elections of Democrats, put them to work for Uncle Sam; instead of levying taxes at the rate of $15,000,000 an hour, introduce sound and sane business methods in the administration of Uncle Sam's affairs. If they will do that and couple with it a little economy here and there, then they will obviate the necessity of passing the proposed bill, and the burden of not only the $105,000,000 carried in the bill but many hundred million dollars more can be saved. Before election they condemned Republican extravagance. In my opinion their position was well taken; there always was and always will be duplication, overlapping, and waste expenditures under our form of government, although Uncle Sam's business, aggregating more than a billion dollars a year, is the largest business in the world.

As a general thing, neither Congress nor the executive branch of our Government is made up of men with business training or experience, or with full comprehension of the cost and value of a dollar. If so, let us get away from the idea that Uncle Sam's business can be run economically and as successfully as the average business institution is run. Senator Aldrich said one time that one hundred million, and possibly three hundred million, dollars would be saved annually by applying business methods. Before election Democrats joined him in his condemnation of unwise expenditures; after election they forgot their promise and in two years added more than $172,000,000 to what they declared to be waste of money wrung from the people by oppressive taxation. Certainly no one reading the warnings sounded by Leader UNDERWOOD, Chairman FITZGERALD, Mr. GILLETT, or Senator TILLMAN will point with pride to the competency or the achievements of the Democratic Congress.

The Democratic platform declared rural credit of equal importance with currency legislation. They purchased a pair of scissors and a pot of paste; it is alleged that they hired a Wall Street editor to cut a few sections out of the Aldrich bill, which they so severely criticized before election; they included the Vreeland bill and passed it as their own. It contained many wise provisions, but the promised rural credit was not included. To the contrary, practically every Democrat voted against incorporating it in the currency bill. No rural-credit bill has ever been reported from the committee, and none is expected to be reported. When the gold began to disappear because of the falling off of our balance of trade, when the panic was on and the banks were about to suspend payment, instead of resorting to their own bill they reduced the rate of interest to banks in the Vreeland bill and turned on the printing press and issued currency under its provisions. Here is what the platform had to say:

RURAL CREDITS.

Of equal importance with the question of currency reform is the question of rural credits or agricultural finance. Therefore we recommend that an investigation of agricultural credit societies in foreign countries be made, so that it may be ascertained whether a system of rural credits may be devised suitable to conditions in the United States; and we also favor legislation permitting national banks to loan a reasonable proportion of their funds on real estate security.

We recognize the value of vocational education, and urge Federal appropriations for such training and extension teaching in agriculture in cooperation with the several States.

And here is what Democrats say after election (see CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, May 14, p. 8608):

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the gentleman from Oklahoma is right about the rural-credit bill. The gentleman is not half as much in favor of a rural-credit bill as I am, because I have strenuously insisted and endeavored to have a rural-credit bill presented to this House; but I say that the policy the gentleman is pursuing in his efforts to get a rural-credit bill is not a credit to him or an aid to the cause he supports. [Applause.] I say this without any intention of personal criticism of the gentleman, but I desire to point out to him where he is not aiding his cause.

* * * * * * *

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. I want to say that the gentleman's position in the caucus does not square exactly with his talk on the floor.

* * * * * * *

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But I do not intend it for facetiousness. I mean it as a statement of fact. I had overlooked the fact that the gentleman himself had made the point of no quorum.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman may as well understand that a few Democrats and a few Republicans do not constitute the Committee on Banking and Currency, which has not met since last September, and I have not received any notice or any word of any of the conferences, and yet I am a member of that committee.

* * * * * * *

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly; but I will ask the gentleman not to take up too much of my time.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. I shall not take up much of the gentleman's time. Does not the gentleman think that it is quite important that the rural credit bill should be reported here, in view of the fact that the Democratic caucus last August instructed the Banking and Currency Committee to bring in this rural credit bill at this session?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. So much so that I framed that resolution of instructions myself.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. After voting against incorporating it in the banking and currency act?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. When a few of us were insisting that it should go there in that act?

In this session the Democratic Senate adopted an amendment to the deficiency bill appropriating $175,000 to pay officers' longevity pay. It provided for payment for those held to be unloyal by reason of having joined the Confederate Army and raised the bar of statute limitation, but did not provide for payment or raising bar of statute limitation to those loyal and in the Union Army. The Democratic leader, Mr. UNDERWOOD, on July 23, 1914, moved to recede and to concur in the amendment. The Republican leader, Mr. MANN, called attention to the discrimination in the following language (see CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, July 23, p. 12560):

You can not pay the Confederate soldiers who have these claims and refuse to pay the Union soldiers who have these claims, and while this proposition in this pending amendment, it is true, only pays the Confederate soldiers who had the claims, it is nonsense to say that we can do that and then refuse to pay the Union soldiers who had the claims. No one would claim that. No portion of the claims has yet been paid to anyone.

Mr. FITZGERALD, chairman of the Appropriations Committee, had this to say (see CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, July 23, p. 12563):

Mr. Speaker, this amendment provides for the payment of longevity claims of officers of the United States Army who left the United States Army and entered the Confederate service. No officer of the United States Army has received any allowance for longevity claims of this character during the period covered by this amendment. The only longevity claims of this character that have been paid are those for the six years prior to the decision of the United States Supreme Court. The adoption of this amendment means that men who were in the United States Army and who resigned from it to enter the Confederate Army are to be allowed these longevity claims, while no provision is made for men who were in the United States Army and remained in the Army and fought on the Union side.

This is the most ingenious amendment ever devised and presented to the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is stated in the report. I read it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not care about the reports, because I do not read them very often. I do not have the chance. But nobody ever suspected that Congress was proposing to open the door to claims of men who left the Regular Army to go into the Confederate service, and at the same time denying the opportunity for claims for the same service for the same period to be presented by men in the Regular Army who remained loyal to the Union.

* * * * * * *

I would go as far as anyone to wipe out whatever lingering or smoldering animosities there may be arising out of that terrible conflict which divided this country from 1861 to 1865—and what I say is not for the purpose of arousing any feeling—but I would not have Congress do an act which, in effect, puts a premium upon the action of the men who left the service of their country to take arms in the Confederate service, and that is what is done in this amendment.

* * * * * * *

The awful conflict, which resulted finally in the preservation of the Union, has long passed. It is the duty of everyone to cooperate as much as possible to obliterate the causes of ill feeling that so long remained and to do everything possible to restore the common brotherhood of this country. But to say that Congress intended, in order to meet the condition that existed and to bring about a better feeling, to enact a law which gave the men who went into the Confederate service an advantage and preference and an opportunity to present I claim to which Congress has persistently refused to the men who remained in the Army and were loyal to the Union is going far beyond what anyone can justify.

This Democratic Congress voted to cut their mileage and delayed making appropriations until after the primaries, and then passed a bill restoring the old mileage. Among other things, the Democrats condemned campaign contributions. According to reports on file, the Democrats reported having received $1,158,446.33 and paid out $1,134,848. Republicans received $904,827.67 and paid out $900,363.58. Progressives received $676,672.73 and paid out $665,500. In other words, they condemned campaign expenditures and spent a quarter of a million dollars more than any other party.

Mr. LEVER. I wish the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] would withdraw their objections, and let the other gentlemen extend their remarks. There are a number of gentlemen who would like to extend their remarks.

Mr. WINGO. On Saturday the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] gave notice, when some one objected to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] speaking on the cotton situation in the South, that he was going to object to all similar requests. Now, there have been speeches made ridiculing the southern cotton farmer, and until some one is permitted to speak in his behalf I feel that in justice to them I should object to Members extending remarks ridiculing proposed relief for the cotton farmers. As far as I am concerned, if you want to take the bridle off, and let both sides have an equal chance, I have no objection.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I think the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] only said that he was going to object to giving time to anyone to discuss it on the floor. He had no objection to the extension of remarks, but he objected to debate on the floor on that subject while the Philippine bill was pending.

Mr. LEVER. I hope that the two gentlemen who have objected will allow the other gentlemen to extend their remarks.

Mr. WINGO. For that purpose I am willing to withdraw my objection. I have no desire to be unfair.

Mr. HAUGEN. I ask unanimous consent that all who speak on the bill be permitted to extend their remarks in the RECORD. I believe that is nothing more than fair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen who speak on this bill have the right to extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN] be permitted to extend his remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON] asks unanimous consent that his colleague [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN] be permitted to extend his remarks.

Mr. WINGO. I could not permit that under the circumstances.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I withdraw the request, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MANN. I call for the regular order.

Mr. BORLAND. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] have unanimous consent to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. MANN. I object.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, a remark was once made that became famous, and it was, "What is the Constitution between friends?" As we read this bill to-day it may be paraphrased by saying, "What is the Constitution where cotton is concerned?" Mr. Speaker, I would not have believed it possible that a bill of this character could ever be proposed by any Democrat, especially from the Southern States. This bill is an invasion of State rights and an expansion of the Federal power far beyond the dreams of any disciple of Alexander Hamilton. I want to say this afternoon to any Democrat that votes for this bill in its present form his mouth should be forever closed against invoking the doctrine of State rights on the floor.

Mr. Speaker, this bill ought never to pass under a motion to suspend the rules. It is possible by amendment that it could be made into a workable bill, but there is only one provision in the bill to-day that will stand, and that is the provision taking $100,000 out of the Federal Treasury and spending it.

What does this bill do? It purports to authorize a license to a warehouseman, and then for the issuance of warehouse receipts and inspection. In the first place, a license issued by the Federal Government is not worth the paper upon which that license is written unless the thing that it authorizes to do is either something that the licensee can not do unless he had that permission or something that the Federal Government had the right to prohibit if he attempted to do it. There is not a lawyer that will admit or contend that in this case the Government has the right to go into every State in the Union and inspect cotton and grain and agricultural products, nor will they claim that we have a right to prohibit the doing of it. But gentlemen say this bill is permissive only; that it is not mandatory upon anyone. That is not true, in the first place, for under section 7 of the bill, when a warehouseman has once been licensed, the bill requires that all grain coming into that warehouse shall be submitted to Federal inspection.

Now, a man owns grain. That grain is grown in a State, goes to a warehouse in the State, to be consumed in the State, and yet this bill requires that grain to be submitted to Federal inspection. Will some one tell me where we get the power to do it?

Another section provides for the giving of a bond, and gives a right of action on the bond. Well, unless this bill authorizes something to be done which we have the right to prohibit doing a bond that is given by the licensee and the right of action of other persons is absolutely valueless. What would you think of the proposition of a pawnbroker from the city of New York coming to this Congress and asking us to license him to conduct a pawnbroking business in the city of New York and offering to give bond to protect his customers?

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. In a litigation upon a bond like that, or against any warehouseman holding a Federal license, where would such suit be brought, in the State or in the Federal courts?

Mr. LENROOT. It would not make a particle of difference if there was no authority for the issuance of the bond if the statute was invalid on which it was based.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Would not the suit have to be brought in the Federal court? And would not that give jurisdiction of the bond?

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, the gentleman does not get the point that I make. I do not care where the jurisdiction would be. I am willing to admit that it would be brought in the Federal court, but where would the jurisdiction rest upon which to give the bond, and where does it rest upon which the obligor is made liable?

It would have been easy to provide in this bill that this inspection should apply to warehouses only in case of interstate commerce. But you did not do that. You have provided by the terms of this bill that cotton or grain grown in a State sent to a warehouse in the State, consumed in that State, shall be subject to Federal law. Can you imagine any greater invasion of State rights than that?

Again, it is said that the warehouseman exercises his option to apply for this license, and that it being permissive the fact that he comes in and applies for a license he thereby consents to this jurisdiction. Even if that were so, if the bill stopped with the warehouseman there might be something said in its favor; but it does not; it goes on and provides for the issuance of warehouse receipts. There are two parties interested—the warehouseman and the man who owns the property. The man who owns the property has not submitted to the license. He has had nothing to say or do about it, and yet you undertake by this Federal law to say what kind of a warehouse receipt shall be given to that man.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. BORLAND. Then, the man who owns the goods is under no obligation to put them into a bonded warehouse. Has he not complete liberty on that subject?

Mr. LENROOT. Let us see. Here is a warehouse in a city or a village, made under the laws of the State a public warehouse. Under this bill that man can not put his goods in that public warehouse if the warehouseman takes out a Federal license, made so under the laws of his State, unless the goods are inspected under the Federal authority. Does the gentleman say that does not deprive the citizen of a State of the right to which he is entitled?

Mr. BORLAND. Certainly it does not.

Mr. LENROOT. Because you say that he does not have to put his grain into that warehouse, when he has a right to put it there under the laws of the State.

Mr. BORLAND. He has the right only by contract with the man who owns the warehouse.

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, no; I beg the gentleman's pardon. Under the laws of every State that warehouseman is running a public warehouse, and any man has right to put grain into that warehouse under the laws of the State.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. If I understand the gentleman's contention, it is this: That a warehouseman operating under the State law is compelled to deal with all on equal terms?

Mr. LENROOT. Exactly.

Mr. SHERLEY. And the fact that he undertakes to get a Federal license can not relieve him from that obligation, and there is therefore a conflict of law.

Mr. LENROOT. Absolutely; and the bill in terms says that nothing shall be inspected in that warehouse except by Federal inspection.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and sixty-one Members present—not a quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 269 Members—a quorum—responded to their names.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. The gentleman from South Carolina has 11 minutes and the gentleman from Illinois 7.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN]. [Applause.]

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I will be able to say but very little in that length of time. I sincerely trust that there will be no serious opposition to this bill. I am a member of the committee which reported this bill. It passed the Senate almost unanimously. It is emergency legislation. If the South were not in the distressed condition that she is, and if the legislatures of the States were in session, we might go to the States and get this legislation; but, Mr. Speaker, there is only one State in which the legislature is now convened, I believe, in the entire South. This is a bill that will greatly aid the producer of cotton at this time. If he is permitted to store his cotton in a warehouse and it takes out a license, it becomes a bonded national warehouse. If he takes that receipt to a bank and executes his note and pins his warehouse certificate thereto, it will enable him to get credit, to obtain money, and this will be of great benefit to him at this time. Now, as to the place where suit would be brought on the bond. It would have to be, I believe, the amount of $3,000 before it could be brought in the Federal court, and therefore it would be in the State court.

Mr. Speaker, when a national bank takes out its license it becomes a national bank. When a warehouse takes out its license it will become a national warehouse. The State warehouse is not affected by this bill. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] is entirely mistaken in his position on that. The State warehouse can operate independently under this bill. No warehouse is required to come under the operations of this bill. When it desires to do so, it will come under the operations of this bill.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. I can not; I have not the time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I trust that no gentleman on this side will vote against this bill because he thinks it will be interfering with State rights. I want to say to you gentlemen that the South is in the greatest distress that she has been in since the War between the States. This House does not seem to realize, or some Members in it, the distressed condition of that section. A billion dollars of property is now being sold below the cost of production, and I trust that gentlemen on this side will throw aside their objection on the ground of State rights and that we may pass this emergency measure. By doing that you will greatly aid the cotton producer. By standing in the way of this bill you are going to vote against a measure that will help us. [Applause.] Now, Mr. Speaker, if this bill passes there will be no objection to it in the Senate. This law will be put into immediate operation——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HEFLIN. And when that is done then the producer can take his warehouse receipt and obtain money at the bank. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY].

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, as far as I have been able to examine this bill this afternoon the title should be changed, and it should read: "A bill to repeal or destroy warehouse laws of the various States." As now drawn it seems to me to be saturated, reeking, unduly intoxicated with rank federalism. Mr. Speaker, it appropriates $100 000. It is not open to amendment. Here it is, a bill of 17 sections offered to the farmers and the producers of this country as a real remedy, when if you analyze it, as far as its good effect is concerned, it is as weak as if it were a mushroom springing up over night. Mr. Speaker, what the producers want is a real rural-credit system that ought to be passed here at the very earliest possible moment. [Applause.] And if such a measure were passed we would not be tendering such temporary makeshifts as this to the American farmer. Mr. Speaker, I do not say that this bill might not be revamped so as possibly to accomplish some real good. It might be, but I am not willing to have it put through to-day under whip and spur in 40 minutes without any right to amend. Let us, if this sort of a bill is to be acted upon, have it so that it can be perfected. It has been said here to-day that amendments will be inserted in conference. Why not insert those amendments on the floor of this House?

Texas has recently passed a warehouse law, and I am not willing to pass hurriedly this bill that seems to be a shell and makeshift. It may have enough vitality in it to injure, partially supersede, or jeopardize the Texas law. I am not willing to thus imperil State laws and State functions.

Mr. Speaker, the people of the South are prostrated in this present crisis. The war in Europe has brought on a terrible paralysis of the cotton industry, and I am not willing to pass a measure like this and tender it to the southern people and say it is of any present and real benefit to them. What we need is the rural-credit system of which I spoke and the strong arm of this Federal Government to be extended to the 30,000,000 people in the South who produce 15,000,000 bales of cotton, the great export crop, and thus relieve them from their paralysis.

Mr. Speaker, the cotton question is not local. It is not one pertaining alone to the South or any section of this country. It is a national question. Aye, it is more than a national question; it is an international question. Cotton is the only product that brings gold back to us when all other products and manufactures fail.

Therefore I am ready to face the real situation. Let us vote as we should and lay aside all temporary makeshifts.

THE COTTON AND CURRENCY SITUATION IN THE SOUTH.

Mr. Speaker, in order that my position in regard to the real needs of the cotton growers in this emergency and crisis brought on by the war in Europe may be understood, permit me to urge the following points and suggestions. They will demonstrate that such proposals as this loose House bill will not salve our present distressing difficulties in the South. The remedy must be quicker, more heroic, and must swiftly come with healing in its wings.

Mr. Speaker, at the outset on this phase of the case I wish to present a telegram from the governor of Texas touching the cotton situation in that State. In my judgment the same condition obtains in all the cotton States of the South:

AUSTIN, TEX., September 18, 1914.

Hon. R. L. HENRY, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.:

Cotton conference passed resolution, with only four dissenting votes, in harmony with resolution adopted at El Paso and with your efforts to secure currency to be loaned either direct or through banks at 3 per cent on guaranteed cotton warehouse receipts. I want to add my hearty indorsement of your efforts. Situation is one beyond control of individuals. National banks absolutely not aiding cotton farmers with emergency currency. Unless National and State Governments can aid present situation, with enormous cotton crop coming on market in October, bankruptcy will overtake thousands of people in cotton-growing States. United States Treasury often has placed hundreds of millions of dollars of Government money in banks for their protection. Why can not this be done to save the cotton farmer and the merchant in this emergency?

O. B. COLQUITT,
Governor of Texas.

Gentleman, that telegram does not overstate the case, but gives accurate information in regard to the situation in Texas and the entire South. The conditions are simply deplorable and distressing there, and if something is not done by this Government within the next 60 days bankruptcy will ensue and many men will be destroyed in a business way. I have an abundance of information from various parts of the great State of Texas verifying just what Gov. Colquitt has said. There are 248 counties in that State, and they will produce something like 4,500,000 bales of cotton this year. The testimony is piled high every morning when my mail is received, confirming every single statement made by Gov. Colquitt. What we imperatively need in Texas and the South in this crisis, brought on by the war in Europe, is an emergency currency that will go directly to the farmers. We need this emergency currency under some kind of temporary arrangement, so that the men who have produced the cotton crop may get the cash as promptly as possible.

Gentlemen, the Federal reserve act has been passed and is now law. From my investigation in regard to the inauguration of that system I am going to take it for granted that it will not be in execution within 60 days. I do not believe that the Federal reserve act will be in complete operation until the 1st of January, or later than such date. I have no sort of criticism to make of that act, and will do everything in my power as a Representative in Congress to strengthen it and see that it accomplishes everything its authors intended it should accomplish. Therefore, for the present, I am going to assume that the Federal reserve act can not be made available to rescue the people of the Southern States from the ruin confronting them. And turning from that act to the Aldrich-Vreeland emergency law, I do not hesitate to say that such law will not serve the purpose. The emergency currency now being taken out by the national banks is not reaching the farmers. You may authorize the issuance of millions of dollars under the present conditions and it will not get directly to the farmers. Mr. Speaker, if you are to do anything, you must promptly pass a temporary act in order to relieve the situation. The Federal reserve act being in abeyance for the present, not being fully organized, and the Aldrich-Vreeland Act proving to be utterly futile in this crisis, the Secretary of the Treasury and the Federal Reserve Board are powerless to come to our aid. Is there any way that this great Government can save our people from impending ruin? The southern people are not coming as petitioners and beggars in this matter. They are presenting to you a question that is national, international, and world-wide in its aspect. For when you strike down the cotton industry in the South, you destroy a national and international product. You not only injure the South, but every State in this Union and the balance of civilized mankind. The farmers of the South did not bring this condition upon themselves. The terrible war conditions in Europe have brought it about. We all hope that those conditions will pass within the next few months and that our markets for cotton will be reopened and that the situation will be normal. And when the war is terminated and the market is reopened, then cotton can be purchased.

Last year nearly 9,000,000 bales of cotton were shipped to Europe; nearly 4,000,000 went to England, about 2,500,000, in round numbers, went to Germany; a little over 1,000,000 went to France; and a great many bales went to the other countries now drawn into the war. Our domestic consumption was something around 3,000,000 bales. But now there is an utter paralysis and there is no market for cotton. We appeal to you to view this as a national and international question. Is there any way to meet the emergency? This Government has met such emergencies before and can do it again. In 1907, when a great panic was about to sweep over us, the Government took its public deposits and in four days placed in the hands of J. Pierpont Morgan & Co. $39,000,000. Mr. Morgan was not a director or an officer in a single bank or trust company. He took those funds and deposited them with his favorite bankers in order that they might be loaned to stock speculators. And, I may say, without appearing to be harsh or without indulging in unjust criticism, to be loaned to stock gamblers in order to relieve the situation in Wall Street. These public funds, the Government's money, were deposited in those banks through the agency of Mr. Morgan, without interest, and were loaned to distressed stock speculators. The way out of the difficulty in the South is for the Government to do the same thing in regard to the cotton market.

Mr. Speaker, I have introduced a bill, after conference with representatives of the farmers' organizations and other bodies, that will relieve the situation. When this bill was introduced, on the 31st day of August, it was thought that the Federal reserve act would be in full operation by the 15th day of September, and this bill was drawn so as not to interfere with the provisions of that act, but to strengthen it. With permission of the committee I want to refer to section 16 of that act in regard to note issues:

Federal reserve notes, to be issued at the discretion of the Federal Reserve Board, for the purpose of making advances to Federal reserve banks through the Federal reserve agents, as hereinafter set forth, and for no other purpose, are hereby authorized. The said notes shall be obligations of the United States, and shall be receivable by all national and member banks and Federal reserve banks, and for all taxes, customs, and other public dues. They shall be redeemed in gold on demand at the Treasury Department of the United States in the city of Washington, D. C., or in gold or lawful money at any Federal reserve bank. Such application—shall be accompanied with a tender to the local Federal reserve agent of collateral in amount equal to the sum of the Federal reserve notes thus applied for and issued pursuant to such application.

Mr. Speaker, under section 16, in connection with other provisions of the bill, hereafter the paper money of the Government to be issued shall be "Federal reserve notes," and those Federal reserve notes can not be issued upon the initial movement of the Federal Reserve Board. That board is powerless to order the issuance of a single dollar in Federal reserve notes until a member bank, through a Federal reserve bank, presents its commercial paper to the Federal Reserve Board. And then Federal reserve notes, United States money, can be issued as an "advance" to the owners of those notes. So, in passing the Federal reserve law we have built a great market house for the commercial paper and assets of the business world. And the Government's money, United States notes or Federal reserve notes, can only be issued on that paper to care for financial situations. This is our permanent system. When national-bank notes are finally retired that is the only kind of Government paper money that will be issued. But we can not avail ourselves of that law now, because it is not in working order, and I am sure will not be in time to relieve our people in the South. Then, what is the remedy? Forgetting for the moment that we have in our statutes a Federal reserve act, and dismissing for the moment the Aldrich-Vreeland emergency law—because it has proved to be a snare and delusion in getting these issues of new currency to the farmers who need money—disregarding those two acts and coming squarely to the question, "What is there that Congress can do to remedy the situation in the cotton States"? I have redrafted my bill, disregarding for the present that such law has been passed. I can better state what is in my bill by reading two or three sections and then outlining to you the balance of it. Section 1 provides:

That the Secretary of the Treasury shall deposit in national banking associations and State banks situated in the following States, to wit, Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Mississippi, Missouri, North Carolina, Oklahoma, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, and Virginia, $500,000,000, to be advanced to the producer of cotton or owner of lands upon which the same was produced, at a rate of interest not exceeding 3 per cent per annum. The deposits herein authorized shall be advanced upon the terms prescribed in this act. The deposits herein authorized shall be apportioned among the several States above mentioned in accordance with the number of bales of cotton produced therein during the year 1913, as ascertained by the Department of Agriculture.

Here we provide for the deposit of public funds in the national and State banks as a trust fund, to be loaned directly to the farmers who are faced with ruin during the war crisis. It is purely a great war emergency, and not a permanent system. The Government has deposited its funds heretofore; it can increase them and can deposit them again if it will. It is not proposed to loan this public money directly without resorting to the fiscal agency of the Federal Government and State governments. This Government can make and establish by law as many depositaries as it deems proper, and if there should not be a bank in any cotton county of the South, the Government can decree that its postmasters shall be custodians of these funds and make the post offices depositaries. So the first proposition is to deposit this money. Then the next question is, "Where will we get the $500,000,000?"

Section 2 provides:

That the Secretary of the Treasury shall immediately cause to be prepared United States notes to the extent of $500,000,000, to be used for the purpose of making the deposits in compliance with this act. And said notes shall have all the legal qualities of the United States notes now outstanding, and shall be of such denominations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe: Provided, That all United States notes deposited under this act and not used as prescribed herein shall be returned to the Secretary of the Treasury and shall be canceled.

So we resort to the issuance of United States notes by the Federal Government, the only sovereignty and agency that has the power and upon whom rests the duty to supply the people with an adequate amount of currency in such crises as these. It does not provide for irredeemable paper money; it provides for redeemable currency, and endows these notes with all the legal qualities possessed by the United States notes issued during the war; that is to say, they shall be legal tender; they shall be redeemable in gold, in view of the fact that we are now upon a gold basis; they will be as good as any other paper money of the Government now in circulation. In my judgment, it would not jeopardize the credit of this great Government one particle to use its power and issue $500,000,000 in emergency United States notes. I do not believe it would hurt the credit of this Government if we issued a billion dollars in United States notes and made them redeemable in gold.

Mr. Speaker, what ought to be done is to stop the issuance of emergency currency under that temporary system—the Aldrich-Vreeland Act, put a brake upon their operations, and say, "You shall not issue any more of it, because it is not going directly to the people in distress." We should say, "We will travel another road." After refusing to allow the banks to go further and secure additional emergency currency under the Aldrich-Vreeland Act, we will resume the function that this Government undeniably has and issue United States money and deposit it as a trust fund in this terrible crisis, so that it may go directly to the men who have produced the cotton crop of the world, for this product clothes the people in all civilized countries. Is there anything undemocratic, anything un-American in that? We have done it before. And for my part I think it was a matter of financial wisdom when the greenbacks were issued during the early sixties to carry on the war and sustain the Government. And I think every word written in the Legal Tender decisions was absolutely correct and in strict accord with the Constitution of the United States. There is the proposition and there is the source of power for getting the money. Then, what is the next step? Loan this money, advance it—using the word that is used in section 16 of the Federal reserve act—to the men whose necessities you are undertaking to relieve, and here is the way we will do it:

Whenever any producer of cotton or owner of lands upon which the same was produced shall present to the National Banking Association or State bank within which State the said bank may be situated a bill of sale in writing to cotton in bales grown in 1914 in such form as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, said bill of sale to be signed and sworn to by the producer or person upon whose land the same was produced, giving the number, mark, weight, classification, and location of said cotton, it shall be the duty of said banks to advance a part of said deposits on said cotton at the rate of 10 cents per pound for middling cotton, and other grades at the prices, off and on, according to the established differences in prices based on middling cotton at 10 cents per pound.

Mr. Speaker, we propose to issue the Government's money and to advance it to our farmers of the South, just as we advance the Federal reserve notes to the commercial interests of every State in the Union on their commercial paper and assets when they are seeking a market and wish to find relief in securing currency from the Government. We do not ask one whit more than is done in the Federal reserve act and has been done before. We have placed the price at 10 cents per pound. Why do we say 10 cents per pound? Because during the last five years cotton has brought on an average more than 12 cents a pound. It is worth the 10 cents a pound, and costs that much to raise it. In my own State we had to replant two or three times. So we have put it at 10 cents per pound, which would mean $50 per bale. But if you think that figure too high, if you are willing to advance money to relieve the situation and will make it absolutely possible for any farmer to walk up to the bank and secure $35 a bale as a loan from the Government, we might leave out 10 cents a pound. It would relieve the situation and perhaps might not be necessary to pay 10 cents a pound. We ought to loan or advance cotton growers the 10 cents a pound on cotton.

That is the next proposition. But if you leave it with the banks, where this emergency currency is now going, it will never reach the men who need it. Many banks in Texas and other States of the South are getting this currency and speculating with it. They are hoarding it and are shipping it back to New York and money centers, and the men who need it most are not receiving it. And this is no gratuitous statement on my part. I want to here ratify and confirm these things by cold evidence from my section, now blighted by this terrible paralysis in the cotton market. I read you part of a letter from Judge W. H. McClelland, county judge of Upshur County:

Upshur County will produce this year about 30,000 bales of cotton. Up to this date I understand that four bales have been marketed in this county at 8 cents per pound. Farmers are unable to get money for their cotton and are forced to keep it on their farms as long as their creditors will permit.

Then they met in a great mass convention in that county and passed resolutions. This convention was composed of men who do not want to injure this Government, but who are patriotic and are seeking a way to solve the difficulties confronting them. And here is one of their resolutions:

We desire to present to the convention—

That is, to the great convention held at Austin subsequently—that in this (Upshur) county we have two national banks and nine State banks. Only one of the State banks under the amended Aldrich-Vreeland Act will be entitled to emergency currency, because of the amount of capitalization of State banks. None of the banks in this county will be able to furnish to the individual farmer emergency currency on warehouse receipts for cotton stored in warehouses. The individual farmer and producer will be unable to hold his crop, because he is forced to pay his merchant; and unless some relief is given promptly 30,000 bales of Upshur County's crop must be sacrificed.

And I want to add, further, the information from my congressional district that tenants—and, by the way, three-fourths of the cotton crop of Texas is produced by tenants—have abandoned their own crops, have walked out of their fields, and have gone to their neighbor's cotton fields to pick cotton in order that they might secure cash to buy meat and bread and clothing for their wives and children, for the winter will shortly come. That is the condition as I get it from practically every county in my congressional district, and I am quite sure that you will find it to be the situation in other parts of Texas and the South.

Then, here is a letter from a gentleman whom I happen to know. This is from Mr. W. B. Yeary, of Farmersville, in Collin County, one of the greatest counties in Texas. He says:

My home is in Farmersville, in Collin County. I have a farm of 1,000 acres and 75 shares in the Farmers and Merchants' National Bank of that place. I have been a close student of conditions all my life, am 54 years old, and this is the most serious condition that I have ever seen, but offers the best opportunity for correcting the evils we have in marketing farm products I have ever seen, if it is handled right.

To show you the strained condition, I can not borrow a dollar on bank stock, cotton, real estate, or anything else. I may have to suspend publishing the paper because of this condition.

He publishes a cotton journal in Dallas.

Here is another letter from out in the western part of the State from W. R. Timmons, chairman of the finance committee of the Roby Warehouse Association. Speaking of loans on cotton, he says this must be done—

For the reason that the national banks, notwithstanding the fact that they can secure emergency currency under the Aldrich-Vreeland law, are not assisting the farmers to get the money on their cotton.

The situation is desperate, and you can only imagine the conditions existing when the farmers are not able even to get the money to pay for the picking of the cotton.

The thing that the farmers need is money on their warehouse receipts, not credit. They need cash, and they must have it now.

Here is a letter from a gentleman in my district. I happen to know him, and do not think it would be inappropriate or out of place for me to say that in normal times this gentleman is worth a great many dollars. He is a merchant and cotton buyer and farmer. He is from Moody, a little town in the heart of as fine a cotton country, I believe, as there is in the State of Texas. He says:

The banks in this section are not lending one cent on cotton, and under present plans will not lend any.

That is from Mr. Charles Howard, a reputable gentleman and one who purchases many bales of cotton every year.

Then here is a letter from Benarnold, a town in a rich cotton country in Milam County; it is from Hon. Ike Looney, an ex-member of the legislature and a farmer on a large scale. He says:

The banks are not letting any money out for less than 10 per cent, with the usual discount. In fact, the banks are doing all in their power to force the farmer to part with his cotton. They get the money for 2 per cent and we are forced to pay more than 10.

Here is a letter from Wills Point, Tex., several hundred miles away from Milam County. This letter is from northern Texas. And I am picking these out of my mail this morning in a haphazard way, in order to lay them before you gentlemen. This gentleman is Mr. J. J. Gibbard. He says:

It has been made very clear to the people of Texas that they can not depend on the banks or efforts of the Federal Government through the banks to relieve such business depression as now exists. Permanent help must come from aid by the Federal Government direct to the farmers, and no effort through the banks will prove effective, for the simple reason that in time of panic the banks are the first to lose their nerve and contract rather than expand, thus increasing the condition.

And here is a statement that comes from the city of Fort Worth. I happen to know this gentleman, John M. Scott, Esq., one of the prominent lawyers of that city. He sends an advertisement wherein one of the banks offers to loan on 1,000 bales of cotton, with certain restrictions, at 6 per cent interest. And then he goes on to explain what that means, and I think just a few lines of the letter should go into the RECORD. He says:

It loans to the grower at 6 per cent for advertising purposes on 1,000 bales, and at 10 per cent on all over 1,000 bales. Country banks are paying the local banks here 6 and 8 per cent for this money and loaning it to the grower for anything his necessities may require him to pay for it. Under the ruling of the Secretary of the Treasury this bank can take this 1,000 which it has secured by loaning $30,000 on and borrow from the Government $37,500 at 3 per cent, thereby reimbursing itself for its $30,000, and getting a surplus of $7,500, and making a profit of 100 per cent on the transaction in its 6 per cent interest, which it is getting from the farmer.

It occurs to me that there is an open field for you to come to the rescue of the cotton grower of this State in attempting at least to have the Government limit the profits which these banks may make to 1 per cent for handling this money between the Government and the grower.

There are hundreds of letters of that sort, and to my mind they establish the proposition beyond any controversy that this money is not getting to the farmers, the men who need it, and those who produce this crop; and that it will not reach that class of our citizens as long as the banks have the option of handling this trust fund, the people's money, as they see proper, and not in accordance with legal restrictions laid down by Congress, by and through which they shall distribute this Government money amongst the cotton farmers.

I am only discussing general principles here. If this bill is not properly drawn you gentlemen can help us to draw one that will recognize the absolute right of the producer of cotton to go to some agency set up by the Federal Government and put up his security, his cotton, and borrow money; have it advanced to him as a direct loan, if you choose, at a low rate of interest. Do not imagine that we are thinking of any kind of a permanent arrangement, and remember that our contention now is that you can not utilize the banks under the laws as they stand and get this money directly to the producers of cotton.

Gentlemen, there is other evidence in regard to these facts, if you want it.

Then section 4 of the bill provides:

That thereupon title to said cotton shall pass to and be vested in the national banking association or State bank making the advances; the said bank receiving such deposits shall pay the same over to the producer or person on whose land the same was produced, and shall thenceforward hold said cotton as custodian, with the right and power to appoint as many deputy custodians with actual possession as said custodians may deem proper and necessary; and among said deputy custodians may be included the producers of said cotton or owners of the land on which the same was produced; said custodians to take in all cases from the deputy custodian a forthcoming bond and an acknowledgement in writing of the fact that said deputy custodian holds the same as custodian of public property, with the common-law liabilities of warehousemen. The bank acting as custodian shall keep all cotton so held insured against loss by fire, loss, if any, payable to the said national banking association or State bank, and shall keep a correct and itemized account of insurance and storage actually paid; and upon the sale of said cotton, as hereinafter provided, shall have said expenditures refunded, together with interest on the same at the rate of 6 per cent per annum. Payments of insurance and storage are to stand until paid in the nature of an obligation of the United States. When said cotton is sold as hereinafter provided, said bank shall, in addition to the refunding just provided for, be paid for its labor and services as custodian 50 cents per bale, and as custodian shall be responsible only for gross negligence or breach of trust. All cotton upon which advances have been made as hereinbefore provided with such deposits shall be and remain the property of said bank until sold, at the pleasure of the Secretary of the Treasury, when and after middling spot cotton sells in the open market at Savannah, Ga., at 12 cents per pound, or upon request of the person or persons from whom title passed to the national banking association or State bank.

So there is your method for loaning on cotton and protecting it and holding it in the grasp of the Government until this crisis is over. We think that cotton will go above 12 cents per pound when this war is over. We know that the Government will not lose a single penny if it utilizes its public funds and its power to advance this money to the cotton growers, just as it will hereafter advance it to the commercial interests upon their assets to relieve their business necessities.

The section 5 reads:

That whenever the said bank, under the conditions named in the foregoing section, shall sell said cotton, interest shall be calculated on the original sums advanced by the bank at the rate of 3 per cent per annum, and principal and interest shall be remitted to the Secretary of the Treasury. The custodian shall prepare under oath and furnish the Secretary an account showing the amounts actually paid for insurance and storage, and interest thereon as hereinbefore provided, and also showing its compensation as herein allowed. These items the custodian shall retain to pay itself, and the balance of the proceeds arising from the sale of said cotton shall be paid over to the producer, or person on whose land the same was produced and from whom title passed to the said bank, or to the legal representative of such person receiving such loan.

SEC. 6. That this act shall take effect and be in force upon its passage.

SEC. 7. That this act shall expire by limitation on the 30th day of June, 1916.

Gentlemen, the principle of the bill is correct. There may be details that can be improved, but you can, if you will, put it in operation, and there will be no criticism from any part of this country, except from those who have been used to handling the money and monopolizing the money market. It is not their money; it is the Government's money; it is the people's money that we propose to use and that the money monopolists propose to use hereafter when they ask for currency.

I take it that it is settled that hereafter no State bank—and this is only my individual view, because there are other gentlemen who do not entertain this view—will be authorized to issue its notes to circulate as money, and I assume that the 10 per cent tax laid on State-bank circulation is permanent and will remain there under our system of government. So in our system of finance we have taken away from the sovereign States of this Union the power to create banks and corporations that can issue circulating notes. That is the first step.

In the second place, we have taken away from the national banks that were set up under the system established during the Civil War and subsequent to it the power to issue their notes. We have said that no State and no corporation created under any State law shall hereafter issue notes, and we have said in the Federal reserve act that no national banking association, when certain terms of that law have been complied with, shall issue its notes to circulate as money. We have resumed the function intended that this Government should exercise when the Constitution was written in 1789. That is to say that the Federal Government is the sovereignty and the power that should coin money and regulate the value thereof, and should issue, as the Legal Tender cases decided, the paper money to circulate as currency. We have now arrived at that point where the Government is the only agency that issues money. As far as I am concerned, I am not prepared to say that it is not a wise policy. But I shall not go into a discussion of State-bank issues. I am only recounting the things that have been done and the status to which we have come in regard to our monetary affairs.

So, that being the case, that no other power can issue money, then it becomes the duty of this Government to provide not only a permanent currency system but to provide an adequate amount of currency to serve the needs of the people in just such a crisis as this. I know where this proposition leads, and have deliberately counted all its consequences. But I have convinced myself, and think from an unselfish point of view, that this Government is as much in duty bound to look out for the distressed population of one-third of this country, occupying one-third of our area, and producing the great gold product sent abroad—that Congress is as much in duty bound to regard their interests in these crises as was done in 1907, when the Secretary of the Treasury deposited funds and took care of stock speculators, and as it has provided to do in the Federal reserve act. Am I violating any Democratic doctrine? Am I doing violence to any tradition of our Government or principle of the framers of the Constitution? We have done these things before. And I will allude to one or two of them, and then will have finished my remarks.

Why, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, you well remember that when we passed the irrigation act, in order to protect the people of 15 Western States, we provided that we would take the proceeds of the sale of public lands in certain States and construct great irrigation plants there with that money for the benefit of the people of the West, and that we would allow them to make their notes in payment for the use of the water; and we put up the people's money in order that they might purchase farms and develop them by and through the help of the Government of the United States.

And only recently we passed a bill extending and practically remitting all interest on, I think, something like $80,000,000, because those people were distressed and could not pay it. And I doubt if the time ever comes when that money, principal and interest, will be refunded to the people and returned to the Treasury of the United States.

What is the difference in principle between this and that? We came to the rescue of the people who lived in a barren part of this country. We extended the strong arm of governmental aid in a financial way, and we made it possible for them to purchase, cultivate, and develop their farms.

To-day we are asking you to help us preserve in the South what we have produced on our farms, and there is no difference in principle; one is developing farms, the other conserving crops.

Why, gentlemen, in 1890 we passed the act in regard to purchasing silver, 4,500,000 ounces of it every month, and authorized the coinage of 2,000,000 ounces during any month and no more. And how did we pay for it? And why was the act passed? With your leave I will read just a few lines of that act so that we may clearly make the point:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to purchase from time to time silver bullion to the aggregate amount of 4,500,000 ounces, or so much thereof as may be offered, in each month, at the market price thereof, not exceeding $1 for 371.25 grains of pure silver, and to issue in payment for such purchases of silver bullion Treasury notes of the United States, to be prepared by the Secretary of the Treasury in such form and of such denominations, not less than $1 nor more than $1,000, as he may determine.

SEC. 2. That the Treasury notes issued in accordance with the provisions of this act shall be redeemable on demand in coin at the Treasury of the United States or at the office of any Assistant Treasurer of the United States, and when so redeemed may be reissued and may be paid out again; but no greater or less amount of such notes shall be outstanding at any time than the cost of the silver bullion and the standard silver dollars coined therefrom then held in the Treasury purchased by such notes.

I will omit one or two sentences, and then read:

That upon demand of any holder of Treasury notes herein provided for, the Secretary of the Treasury shall, under such regulations as he may prescribe, redeem such notes in gold or silver at his discretion, it being the established policy of the United States to maintain the two metals on a parity with each other on the present legal ratio, or such ratio as may be provided.

That act was passed, and if you will examine the debates you will find the reason. It was enacted because times were hard. A terrible panic was sweeping over the mining States of the West, and Congress decided that it would go to the relief of the people of that section of the United States and purchase silver bullion, a mere commodity like cotton, and would keep the mines open and prevent men from being thrown into idleness; and would keep business going in the western part of this country by issuing the Government's money to pay them for this silver bullion, which is a mere commodity.

We are on the gold standard now, and so far as silver is concerned, for monetary purposes, it might as well be paper and would serve the same purpose, except perhaps that it may be a little more convenient in some instances to use silver.

But not only did we do that. Recently over in the Senate a bill passed without division, as I understand it, by which the Government would purchase 50 per cent of the output of the silver mines in the West and pay for it with Government money, with the people's funds, simply to keep those mines open and prevent our western brethren working there from being thrown into idleness; so that hereafter there might be an increase in the output of gold, which is a by-product in the mining of silver, and so that water might not run into the mines and thus place them out of commission. And there is the same principle invoked in the Senate of the United States.

Gentlemen, I think that makes the point in regard to this situation. This Government has the power to issue these notes. Read the legal-tender decisions, the latest one in One hundred and tenth United States Reports, and no living man can answer the argument found there that this Government has unlimited power to issue currency; and that being conceded, that we have the power to issue it, then we may advance our currency to cotton growers, just as we are going to advance it hereafter, through the Federal reserve system, to the owners of commercial paper and assets.

That is the proposition. I know that gentlemen will say that this is populism and amounts almost to anarchy in our financial system. Already I have been met with that answer. But I maintain that this Government was set up for the benefit and protection of the people. Sirs, in a crisis like this I have crossed the Rubicon, I have burned my bridges, and am ready to fight for the principle that this Government shall issue its currency and preserve the progress and prosperity of the southern people. [Applause.] I am ready to defend this principle everywhere.

We are not coming to beg Congress. This is the Government of all the people in this Union. We are coming to the only power that can give relief. We are saying to you, gentlemen, as we expect to say to the Federal Reserve Board, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the President of the United States, that the arm of your Federal reserve system is too short to save us now, and that the arm of the Aldrich-Vreeland Act has been seized by certain national bankers and those who would despoil the people in this hour of their need in the South, and they are withholding the relief that the Secretary of the Treasury and the President wish to go directly to the men who produce the wealth of the country. And I lay it down as an incontrovertible principle that if the Government, through the Aldrich-Vreeland Act, can deposit currency to be loaned to whomsoever the banks may choose to loan it, by the same principle it can deposit its currency in these banks as a trust fund and require that it be loaned to cotton growers.

And, restating the proposition, if the Federal Government, under the Federal reserve act, can deposit its money in the reserve banks as an advancement to be loaned on the mere paper merchandise of men placed there in return for it, and, furthermore, has power to deposit its authorized notes in national banks to be loaned under the Aldrich-Vreeland Act to any person of their choice, then by the same principle we are now warranted in demanding that this same Government send its currency, springing from its sovereign monetary function, to the stricken South, to be deposited in banks with the just restriction that it be advanced only to distressed cotton growers at a low rate of interest and upon reasonable terms.

Permit me, in conclusion, to invoke the Baltimore platform as ample warrant for our demand. It reads on this subject as follows:

We condemn the present methods of depositing Government funds in a few favored banks, largely situated in or controlled by Wall Street, in return for political favors, and we pledge our party to provide by law for their deposit by competitive bidding in the banking institutions of the country, national and State, without discrimination as to locality, upon approved securities and subject to call by the Government.

If we follow our pledge, then we "will render temporary relief in localities where such relief is needed" by issuing these emergency notes.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, there is nothing in this bill that will interfere in the least with any warehouses in any State or with any law governing warehouses in any State. As was stated a moment ago by the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], there is no requirement in this bill, and there could not be any requirement in this bill, of course, that would be enforceable, that would demand or require that they should come under its provisions. It simply provides for the establishment of warehouses to be licensed by the United States Government.

The farmers throughout this country have been asking for many, many years for the establishment of warehouses in which they might place their products that were nonperishable and that would furnish a basis of credit upon which they could secure money from the United States Government. This meets the requests, this meets the requirements, this meets the demands, of the farmers throughout the United States of America. Their request was recognized in the currency bill, and this bill will give them an opportunity to realize it in a substantial way, because the Secretary of the Treasury says he will advance money on warehouse receipts. They are not citizens of this country that you can lightly consider, for the reason that they stand behind not only the balance of trade in this country but its prosperity, its welfare, and its good; and they are not only patriotic citizens in time of peace but they are patriotic and brave citizens in time of war.

This is an emergency, as was stated a moment ago, and it is an emergency that must be met at this time. My friend from Texas [Mr. HENRY] may call it a "makeshift," still it is better to secure something in order to give the people some character of legislation and some measure of relief than to secure nothing and to give them no relief whatever. I had the honor to be on the subcommittee and helped to write this bill, and hope it will pass. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It is not a sectional bill. It has to do with crops worth millions upon millions of dollars. These crops involve the prosperity of the whole country and enter into the very centers of trade and effects vitally the interest of all our people. The city and the country are all alike involved. The prosperity of one contributes to the prosperity of all. Will you, my fellow Members, lend a helping hand and by your votes pass this bill and thus help us in the South in this hour of distress, and by helping us help your own people? I sincerely hope you will. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. HELGESEN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. HELGESEN] is recognized.

Mr. HELGESEN. Mr. Speaker, I am in sympathy with what this bill seeks to accomplish, and I am in sympathy with it, too, in spite of the fact that I represent a constituency that has no direct interest whatever in the price of raw cotton. I am in sympathy with it because I do not consider it a temporary measure. If it becomes a law, it will be a permanent law that will benefit all farmers so long as it remains on the statute books.

In our country we depend wholly upon the raising of grain. It is therefore called a "one-crop" country. Business is done on credit, and after harvest the farmers are compelled to throw their entire crop, almost, on the market immediately for the purpose of getting money enough to pay the running expenses of their farm operations. The throwing of this enormous amount of grain on the market in a hurry has the effect of depressing the price.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from North Dakota has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] is recognized for one minute.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, this bill may be unconstitutional. It probably is; but whether it is or not, it is certainly special legislation. It pertains solely to cotton. It started in the Senate in the interest of cotton. Canned salmon was tacked on over there, but canned salmon has been taken out and grain has been added to cotton, to catch up on agricultural products.

I call the attention of the "farmers' friends" who have already spoken on this bill to the fact that the farmer who raises potatoes, or tomatoes, or apples, or cranberries, or other perishable crops, will have no advantage under this bill. Even grain is not wholly nonperishable. Wheat is not nonperishable. It will have no advantage under this bill. It is a buffer here for cotton.

Mr. LEVER. It is in the bill, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE. It gets hot in the cars and it gets hot in ships. If the farmers who raise wheat or corn think they are going to get anything out of this bill, they should think twice. I want to help cotton, but I do not want to overlook other farm products that are equally entitled to our consideration. It is impossible to intelligently discuss this bill in one minute. However, it should be said that, while the bill looks like an agricultural bill, it intends to take care of cotton as the one great nonperishable farm product. The idea is to pave the way to finance cotton. Farmers who are not engaged in this special interest may not, and probably will not, have the warehouse-receipt opportunity of raising money that is here accorded to the planter. The representative on this floor of the ordinary farmer who raises other agricultural products than cotton ought to know that he is voting for a special interest if he votes for this bill.

Mr. MADDEN. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this bill. It proposes to extend the activities of the Federal Government into fields in which the States have ample powers, and if they properly perform the functions devolving upon them there will be no necessity for the Federal Government to interfere.

Section 3 of the House bill authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture "to investigate the storage, warehousing, classifying, grading, weighing, and certification of agricultural products." There is no limitation upon the authority conferred upon the Secretary of Agriculture in such investigations. It is like all similar legislation, couched in the most comprehensive language, accompanied by an initial appropriation of $100,000, eventually to mean that the Federal Government will have a horde of agents in every State in the Union inspecting warehouses, investigating warehouses, and performing functions that properly belong to States and municipalities. This is one of the evils of our present age, the constant tendency to transfer to the Federal Government from States and individuals burdens which properly belong to them.

I know that at present in many sections of the country an unfortunate condition exists, but that makes it all the more imperative that legislation designed to extend relief shall be guarded with the utmost care, that mere temporary expediencies shall not be adopted, to become a permanent policy, contrary to our traditions and to the unbroken policy of our Government. No more dangerous example can be set than to encourage the people of any community or of any section to believe that when disaster or trouble comes upon them a sure remedy can be found in Federal legislation. There are other fundamental objections to this bill based upon its underlying principles, which I can not discuss in the brief time at my disposal. The objections to the bill are such that I can not give it my support.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] has six minutes left.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to congratulate the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] upon the company he is keeping this evening. The gentleman has posed for two months around this building as the only simon-pure, genuine friend of the farmer. We have brought in from the Committee on Agriculture a bill which, to the minds of practical men, will afford a measure of relief to the distressed people of the South and at the same time add to our system of marketing a permanent feature which it does not now have. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] ought to remember that the Federal reserve act is about to go into operation, and that act, for the first time in the history of this country, recognizes agricultural products as being on a parity with commercial paper. This bill is a preparation for the utilization of that great currency measure. [Applause.] Where does the opposition to this bill come from? From my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations; and I want to say to him that except for the hundreds of millions of dollars that my distressed people are pouring into the coffers of your merchants and your bankers of New York your city would be growing up in grass and bulrushes. [Applause.]

The contention is made that this bill is an interference with State rights. The bill in its very language asserts that nothing in it shall be construed to interfere with existing State laws.

My distinguished and verbose friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] says that it is a cotton bill, that it has nothing but cotton in it. The gentleman has not read the bill, and I will bet him 20 cents to a dime that he has not. [Applause.] The very definition of the bill provides that it shall include cotton, grain, and such other stable and nonperishable agricultural products as shall be designated by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. I can not yield. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] says that it is an interference with State rights and that it reeks of federalism. Great heavens, let the gentleman from Texas go over to his friend from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN] and read with him the bills that the gentleman himself has introduced! [Applause.] But whenever we come with a piece of constructive legislation in the interest of the agricultural producing masses of this country we find men on this side and men on that side willing to oppose it on the ground of federalism or economy or something else. Why, we are appropriating more now for the harbor of New York than we are appropriating for the agricultural interests of the United States.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I beg the gentleman's pardon; we are not.

Mr. LEVER. How much are you appropriating?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Nothing, I regret to say. [Laughter.]

Mr. LEVER. Then the gentleman has been sleeping on his job.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I have not.

Mr. POU. New York Harbor has had $17,000,000.

Mr. LEVER. Exactly. Now, my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], who is usually very level-headed, complains because this bill is not predicated on the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution. The Agricultural Committee deliberately refused to do that for the reason that we did not want to concentrate all of the cotton, all of the grain, all of the agricultural products of this country in great central warehouses. We are trying to get the benefit of this bill right back to the farmer and not to the greedy corporations which bleed the farmer.

Now, I want to say to my southern friends that while this bill is not a sectional bill—it does not pertain to the South any more than it does to any other agricultural section of the country—at the same time, in this condition of distress, the worst that we have had since the Civil War, a few men may stand on little technicalities, small objections, and defeat the bill; but the responsibility will be upon you and not upon the patriotic, hard-working members of the Agriculture Committee [applause], who have tried, in season and out of season, to bring to this House bills for the general welfare of agriculture, and which would do the business. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired. All time has expired, and the question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

Mr. HEFLIN and Mr. LEVER demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 164, nays 109, answered "present" 5, not voting 150, as follows:

So, two-thirds not having voted in favor thereof, the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill was rejected.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. DOREMUS with Mr. ANDERSON.

Mr. NEELY of West Virginia with Mr. BARCHFELD.

Mr. RIORDAN with Mr. BARTHOLDT.

Mr. RUCKER with Mr. SMITH of Minnesota.

Mr. CARLIN with Mr. WINSLOW.

Mr. ANSBERRY with Mr. FREAR.

Mr. ELDER with Mr. MCGUIRE of Oklahoma.

Mr. HOWARD with Mr. SMITH of Idaho.

Mr. FOWLER with Mr. WOODRUFF.

Mr. GOEKE with Mr. TEMPLE.

Mr. ROUSE with Mr. DUNN.

Mr. SPARKMAN with Mr. LANGHAM.

Mr. STEDMAN with Mr. MCKENZIE.

Mr. WILSON of Florida with Mr. J. I. NOLAN.

Mr. HAMILL with Mr. SWITZER.

On this vote:

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi (for motion) with Mr. JOHNSON of Washington (against).

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. LINTHICUM, indefinitely, on account of illness.

To Mr. WALTERS, indefinitely, on account of illness.

To Mr. CARY, for 10 days, on account of illness.

To Mr. LENROOT, indefinitely, on account of illness in his family.

RURAL CREDITS.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that immediately after the reading and approval of the Journal on Thursday next I be given the right to address the House for 30 minutes on the question of rural credits.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that on Thursday next, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table, he be allowed to address the House for 30 minutes on the subject of rural credits. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS IN THE RECORD.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the subject of the war-revenue tax.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request upon the same subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan makes the same request. Is there objection?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, do gentlemen really wish to extend their remarks on the war-revenue bill, when they have had leave for 10 days, 7 days after the bill was passed?

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman that I realize that the time has expired and I had the leave, but I really intend to print some views on the war-revenue tax and on no other subject.

Mr. SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Moss] has submitted a request for a little time on a very important proposition. Objection is made to that, and I wish that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] would withdraw his objection. The gentleman from Indiana is a close student of the question.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I am going to object to all requests for time for speeches, regardless of who makes them. It is pretty nearly time for this Congress to stop talking and adjourn. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the requests of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN], and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] to extend their remarks?

Mr. MANN. Upon the subject of the war-revenue tax?

The SPEAKER. Yes. Is there objection?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to submit with that request a request that all gentlemen who spoke on the warehouse bill this afternoon may have the right to extend their remarks upon that subject.

The SPEAKER. Coupled with that request, the gentleman from South Carolina——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think they ought to be put separately.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will first submit the requests of the three gentlemen to extend their remarks on the war-revenue bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen who spoke on the warehouse bill shall have the right to extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, here is a bill that comes up under a rule with 20 minutes' debate on a side, and I suppose many gentlemen who spoke, who desire to extend, will want to extend speeches in the RECORD that if delivered would take two or three hours to deliver, but I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, there are a good many Members here, and some, at least, would like to have an opportunity to discuss the cotton situation in the South. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Moss] wants to make a speech in reference to rural credits. I wish we could have a night session or two at which we could discuss these propositions and do nothing but discuss them, and I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-morrow afternoon that it reconvene at 8——

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is when the committee rises.

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; when the committee rises, that the House shall take a recess until 8, and there may be a night session until not later than 11 o'clock for the purpose of discussing the cotton situation, and that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Moss] may have 30 minutes of that time, and I am to have 45 minutes of it. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] asks unanimous consent that to-morrow afternoon at 5 o'clock the House shall stand in recess until 8 o'clock, and there shall be a night session extending until not later than 11 o'clock for the sole purpose of discussing the cotton question, and that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Moss] is to have 30 minutes of that time and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] is to have 45 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask whether any other subject is to be discussed. I want 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Not under the request.

Mr. RAKER. Then, Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that I want 30 minutes at some time to address this House.

Mr. HEFLIN. I am in favor of having other night sessions. We will have plenty of time. There will be no trouble about that, I am sure.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, when the rule in reference to the Philippine bill came before the House the other day I called the attention of the House to what would be the effect of that rule—that it would crowd out everything else. In spite of that, the Democratic side of the House forced that rule through. Since then that side has extended no courtesy to this side of the House in reference to debate, and I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. BEAKES. Mr. Speaker, I ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. On what subject?

Mr. BEAKES. On the subject of the work of the Sixty-third Congress.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BEAKES] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the work of the Sixty-third Congress. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 57 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet to-morrow, Tuesday, October 6, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ADAMSON: A bill (H. R. 19113) to enable owners of cotton produced by them or on their land to borrow money by depositing as security warehouse receipts issued for the period of the loan; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado: A bill (H. R. 19114) to amend section 2324 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to mining claims; to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

By Mr. CASEY: A bill (H. R. 19115) to appropriate $50,000 to erect a suitable monument on the Wyoming battle grounds on the Susquehanna River, in the State of Pennsylvania; to the Committee on the Library.

By Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado: A bill (H. R. 19116) to grant certain lands to the city of Grand Junction, Colo., for the protection of its water supply; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. FOWLER: A bill (H. R. 19117) granting to the soldiers of the Civil War and the War with Mexico a pension of $30 per month, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Washington: A bill (H. R. 19118) providing that the annual assessment work on placer and lode mining claims in Alaska for the year 1914 may be performed not later than January 1, 1916, without lapse or forfeiture of such mining claims; to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

By Mr. LEVY: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 365) requesting the President to take such steps as he may deem necessary to have the Republic of Cuba reimburse the United States for expenditures from the United States Treasury, made necessary on account of the army of pacification in Cuba; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. FITZGERALD: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 366) authorizing the Secretary of War to use any allotment made under the provisions of an act approved October 2, 1914, entitled "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," for the improvement of East River and Hell Gate, N. Y.; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. CAMPBELL: Resolution (H. Res. 635) calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury for certain information concerning the deposit of Government funds in the National Park Bank, of New York; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BLACKMON: A bill (H. R. 19119) for the relief of William S. Yongue; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. CARY: A bill (H. R. 19120) granting an increase of pension to Vernon D. Bennett; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. COADY: A bill (H. R. 19121) granting a pension to Ida L. Carter; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 19122) granting a pension to Michael Williams, alias William H. Cabondy; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DOOLITTLE: A bill (H. R. 19123) granting an increase of pension to Angelette Van Buskirk; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FITZHENRY: A bill (H. R. 19124) granting a pension to Joseph M. Howe; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 19125) granting an increase of pension to William Kinsey; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. GREEN of Iowa: A bill (H. R. 19126) granting a pension to Julia E. Barber; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HULL: A bill (H. R. 19127) for the relief of the heirs of Joseph G. Berry; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. LANGHAM: A bill (H. R. 19128) granting an increase of pension to Mary J. Campbell; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 19129) granting an increase of pension to Harvey Haugh; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SHREVE: A bill (H. R. 19130) granting a pension to Stella M. Glas; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 19131) granting a pension to Bridget E. Reid; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 19132) granting an increase of pension to Marilla Shakelton; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 19133) granting an increase of pension to Thomas Williams; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SMITH of New York: A bill (H. R. 19134) granting a pension to John McGovern; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH: A bill (H. R. 19135) granting an increase of pension to Michael Cribbins; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. TAVENNER: A bill (H. R. 19136) granting a pension to Frank Mitchell; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 19137) granting a pension to Harvey C. Van Meter; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 19138) granting an increase of pension to John B. Kelley; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 19139) granting an increase of pension to Samuel Tygret; to the Committee on Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. CARR: Petition of E. F. Hemminger, of Meyersdale, Pa., and the Harris-Smith Coal & Coke Co., of Uniontown, Pa., protesting against bill to prohibit Post Office Department from furnishing return envelopes; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, petition of the Somerset County (Pa.) Medical Society, protesting against House bill 6282, the Harrison national narcotic bill; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. CARY: Petition of M. G. Rankin & Co., of Milwaukee, Wis., and Cudahy Bros. Co., of Cudahy, Wis., protesting against legislation to prohibit selling stamped envelopes with the address to business people; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. CURRY: Petition of 12 citizens of the third California congressional district, favoring national prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. MILLER: Petitions of sundry citizens of the eighth Minnesota district, favoring national prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

Also, petition of sundry citizens of the eighth Minnesota district, against national prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. POU: Petition of various merchants of the State of North Carolina, favoring the passage of House bill 5308, relative to taxing mail-order houses; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. REED: Petition of Hurd & Kinney, attorneys and counselors at law, of Claremont; J. F. Libby, attorney at law, Gorman; and Arthur T. Cass, cashier of the Citizens' National Bank, Tilton, all in the State of New Hampshire, protesting against the passage of the bill to discontinue the furnishing of special-request envelopes; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, October 6, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We thank Thee, our Father in heaven, that out of the terrible conflict now raging in all Europe a broader patriotism is being awakened in the hearts of our people, born of love for mankind, made manifest in the gathering together of the peoples of all churches, in response to our President's proclamation, in a universal prayer for peace; for the spirit of sympathy aroused for the suffering and sorrowing, demonstrated in the relief going out from our National Red Cross Association, and from many other sources, which will not only be felt and appreciated by the wounded but by all who are made to suffer by the cruel and relentless hand of war, and we pray that the horrors of war may teach the larger lesson of brotherly love and a clearer vision come to the world, which will forever make war impossible, peace sweeter, and the spirit of the Christ more universal in the hearts of men, and everlasting praise be Thine, our God and our Father. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On October 3, 1914:

S. 1930. An act granting to the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Co. a right of way through the Fort Wingate Military Reservation, N. Mex., and for other purposes; and

S. 3550. An act ratifying the establishment of the boundary line between the States of Connecticut and Massachusetts.

On October 5, 1914:

S. 657. An act to authorize the reservation of public lands for country parks and community centers within reclamation projects, and for other purposes.

On September 29, 1914:

S. 4274. An act to authorize and require an extension of the street railway lines of the Washington Railway & Electric Co., and for other purposes.

ANTITRUST LEGISLATION.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the conference report just presented from the Senate on the bill H. R. 15657, to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes, be taken up to-morrow for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] asks unanimous consent that to-morrow, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of matter on the Speaker's table, the conference report on the trust bill be taken up. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, would it not first require unanimous consent to dispense with the proceedings under the rule to-morrow?

Mr. WEBB. My idea of it was that by granting of unanimous consent to take up the trust bill to-morrow it would be tantamount to doing away with Calendar Wednesday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. BARNHART. Reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire of the gentleman if it will take all day?

Mr. WEBB. I think I can answer the gentleman in a few moments, after I have had a little parley with my friends on the other side.

Mr. MANN. We would undoubtedly insist on its taking all day.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. WEBB. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that we take up the conference report on Thursday.

Mr. BARNHART. I did not know that the gentleman's request had to do with the trust bill. I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, how much time for debate would the gentleman be willing to grant?

Mr. WEBB. Any liberal amount. We would have no objection to discussing it for half a day, if we can agree on what half a day would be in hours. I think that would be proper.

Mr. STAFFORD. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it possible, by unanimous consent, on a day other than Calendar Wednesday, to set aside the proceedings in order on that day?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it possible, by unanimous consent, on a day other than Calendar Wednesday, to set aside the proceedings in order on Calendar Wednesday?

The SPEAKER. Why, yes; the Chair would think so. The Calendar Wednesday rule provides simply for a two-thirds vote, and surely unanimous consent is better than a two-thirds vote.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is also that further rule of the House that the Committee on Rules is not permitted to bring in any rule that will set aside proceedings on Calendar Wednesday without a vote of two-thirds of the membership.

The SPEAKER. That is all true, but anything can be done by unanimous consent. And the Chair will undoubtedly hold that where there is unanimous consent given it outranks even a two-thirds vote.

Mr. STAFFORD. Unanimous consent being presented on Calendar Wednesday——

The SPEAKER. There is one thing about it; if the gentleman does not like this proposition, he can object.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is not the question. It is a question of Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. MANN. Would the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] be willing whenever this is taken up to allow us two hours and a half debate on a side, and make it so that if it comes up to-morrow and is not disposed of, as it might not be—I can not tell how much time might be taken up on other matters—it could go over then?

Mr. WEBB. Does not the gentleman think that four hours, two hours on a side, would be sufficient? It has been suggested by some of the minority members of the committee that that might be enough. I have no objection to five hours, if the gentleman thinks that much time is required.

Mr. MANN. As a matter of fact, I think two hours and a half would very much cramp this side of the House in discussing the conference report.

Mr. WEBB. I hope my friend understands that I have no disposition to curtail fair, open, and free discussion.

Mr. MANN. I understand. I think everybody would like to see it disposed of.

Mr. BARNHART. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARNHART. If the Printing Committee is deprived of its right of way on Calendar Wednesday by unanimous consent, might that not necessarily imply a relinquishment of its right of way for the following Wednesday?

The SPEAKER. No. Is there objection to taking up this conference report to-morrow after the reading of the Journal?

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, may I couple with that request the further request that in view of the time of five hours we meet at 11 o'clock?

The SPEAKER. Of course the gentleman can couple that with his request.

Mr. WEBB. That will enable us to clean up the bill before evening to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. How much time have the gentlemen agreed on?

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman that he make his request so that if the conference report is not disposed of to-morrow it will be in order on the following day.

Mr. WEBB. I do make it that way, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MANN. So that when we take it up we shall finish it before we go into something else.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand the gentleman's request is that immediately after the reading of the Journal to-morrow it shall be in order to take up the conference report on the trust bill, which has just come over from the Senate, and that there shall be five hours' debate, at the end of which time the previous question shall be considered as ordered and a vote shall be had; and that carries it over to any day when it would follow.

Mr. WEBB. That is my purpose, Mr. Speaker, so that it can be a continuous discussion until it is concluded.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] asks unanimous consent that the House shall meet to-morrow at 11 o'clock, and that the conference report on the trust bill shall be taken up immediately after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of necessary matters on the Speaker's table, and that the debate shall continue not to exceed five hours, one half, I suppose, to be controlled by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] and the other half by the gentleman——

Mr. MANN. By the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD]——

Mr. WEBB. Yes; the gentleman from Minnesota.

The SPEAKER. And the other half by the gentleman from Minnesota; and at the end of the debate the previous question shall be considered as ordered and a vote immediately had. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to propound a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. In case a point of order should be made against the conference report, this would not set aside the right to make a point of order?

The SPEAKER. Oh, no; all points of order are reserved. It will just give the right of consideration. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The House will meet to-morrow at 11 o'clock. Under the special rule the House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill 18459, with the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] in the chair.

THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 18459) to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands, with Mr. FLOOD of Virginia in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 18459, the Philippine bill, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 18459) to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

Mr. MURRAY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Oklahoma rise?

Mr. MURRAY. I wanted to withdraw my amendment before action is taken on the other amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. What amendment does the gentleman wish to withdraw?

Mr. MURRAY. The amendment that I offered with reference to jury trials.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. I object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the pending amendment be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending amendment is the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

Mr. MANN. I ask that it be reported, so that the committee may be advised.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BARTLETT:
Page 3, line 17, after the word "trial," insert the words "by an impartial jury to be selected from the district wherein the offense was committed."

Amendment by Mr. MURRAY:
Page 3, after line 19, add a new paragraph, as follows:
"The right of trial by jury shall be and remain inviolate, and a jury for the trial of civil and criminal cases in courts of record shall consist of 12 men, but in courts not of record a jury may consist of 6 men."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY] asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I want to know if there is going to be any such amendment as this pending or voted on, whether it is the purpose of withdrawing the question of jury trials altogether?

Mr. MURRAY. I did not hear what the gentleman said.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to know if the gentleman receded from the position with reference to jury trials, and whether that is the purpose he had in mind in withdrawing the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY] asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] objects.

Mr. MURRAY. I ask that, in view of the fact that the proceedings here the other day disclosed the fact that not only many portions of the Philippine Islands could not summon a jury qualified, but they were not capable of self-government; and therefore I recognize the principle that you must make a government to suit the people.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman say, in the face of the fact that everybody who advocates the passage of this bill admits the inability of the people of the Philippine Islands to serve on a jury, that they are still qualified for self-government? [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. MURRAY. Only the uncivilized tribes. I am sure that a portion of the Philippine Islands would be capable of having jury trials, but the argument the other day from both sides of the House tends to show that on a great portion of the islands they could not summon a jury that would be qualified. I have not changed my position upon the question of the jury trial, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. Does anybody know what percentage of the population of the people of the Philippine Islands are considered not qualified for jury service?

Mr. MURRAY. I would not undertake to say. There is a dispute about that question.

Mr. MADDEN. I object, Mr. Chairman, for the time being.

Mr. MURRAY. I understand that some say one-tenth and others more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] objects to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY]. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, may I make a request right there?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. I ask unanimous consent to strike from my amendment the words "in the district wherein the offense was committed," so as to let the amendment read "by an impartial jury."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modify the amendment by striking out the words "to be selected from the district wherein the offense was committed."

Mr. MILLER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, is it the gentleman's idea that there shall be a professional jury that shall travel with the court?

Mr. BARTLETT. No. That leaves the Philippine Legislature free to determine the manner of selecting the jury. I do not know whether I have the right to discuss the question, but it simply imposes on the Philippine Legislature the right to grant a trial by an impartial jury. I realize the force of the gentleman's argument, and that it would be almost impossible to secure a jury in certain parts of these islands. But this is only a provision imposing upon the Philippine Legislature the duty of granting to that people the right of trial by jury and leaving to them the manner of saying how the jury shall be selected.

Mr. MILLER. The gentleman understands that the Philippine Legislature has the power and authority without this amendment to grant trial by jury?

Mr. BARTLETT. They have the power and the authority, but it is not their duty unless we impose it.

Mr. MILLER. Well, I am not in sympathy with the amendment, but I will not object.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object——

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I call for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky calls for the regular order. The regular order is, Is there objection?

Mr. SHERLEY. Calling for the regular order is equivalent to an objection, and I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky objects, and the question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BARTLETT and Mr. MADDEN) there were 21 ayes and 74 noes.

So the amendment was lost.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MADDEN) there were 20 ayes and 45 noes.

So the amendment was lost.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a speech by the late Hon. Jeremiah S. Black on jury trial.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by publishing an address of the late Hon. Jeremiah S. Black on jury trial. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE. Reserving the right to object, did not the gentleman from Ohio have this address inserted in the RECORD some time ago?

Mr. GORDON. No; that was another address.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

That no law impairing the obligation of contracts shall be enacted.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the paragraph just read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 2, strike out the period and insert a colon, and add the following proviso:

"Provided, Any provision of a contract, expressed or implied, made by any person by which any of the benefits of this act or the general law is sought to be waived shall be null and void; and any provision of any contract or agreement, expressed or implied, stipulating for notice or demand other than such as may be provided by law as a condition precedent to establish any claim, demand, or liability shall be null and void."

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment ought to be clear to every one—that it is to protect those classes who are not able to protect themselves. For instance, it used to be a policy in some of the States of the West that when any man engaged to work for a railroad or some other corporation he was compelled to sign a contract that in the event that he was injured he would not claim any damages against the railroad or corporation. Then in some States if the law provides for notice to secure a lien or to foreclose a montgage, that the debtor may waive those rights. This is intended to make all such contracts contrary to public policy and to provide that he can not waive by contract any right under this act or under the general law. In other words, he can not waive by contract his right to his day in court, and he can not waive any other right that any citizen ought to have under the general law by a contract. He might waive it under this provision at the time, but he could not make a contract in advance to waive it.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY. Yes.

Mr. HELM. Has the Supreme Court of the United States ever held any such waiver valid?

Mr. MURRAY. I do not know that it has; I do not know that the Supreme Court of the United States has ever been called upon to pass on the proposition. Certainly if you are going to give rights of self-government to the Filipinos, you ought to take care of those who can not protect themselves.

Mr. HELM. This is a Federal law, and the State law, of course, would not be applicable unless some of the waivers or defects in the law have been held by the Federal court or by the Supreme Court of the United States to be valid.

Mr. MURRAY. We know that in the old Indian country when the Federal laws were in force they had a right to waive it, and we enacted this in our State constitution to prohibit that kind of conduct, and it has been the salvation of our laboring men.

Mr. HELM. Were those rights held to be valid by the Federal court or the State court?

Mr. MURRAY. They were held to be valid in the Federal court prior to statehood. I would not undertake to say that a man could not waive any right, but he can not waive it in a contract at a time when he would not know what he ought to do. This provides that a waiver in a contract shall be contrary to public policy and therefore null and void. Certainly a man would have the right to make the waiver subsequently, but no man on general principles ought to have the right to waive in advance his rights under the general law or under the fundamental law of the land. We are making here something in the nature of a constitution for the Philippine Islands. They are granted the largest legislative power and the largest power of government possible. Doing so, we ought to protect first the man who can not protect his rights, and yet through this entire act we have looked after the rights of the Filipinos as we ought. I repeat again, that the first consideration here in favor of these men should be for those who can not protect their rights, and I trust that the amendment may be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY].

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I confess that I am not entirely clear in my own mind as to the meaning of the proposed amendment, although I have listened to the gentleman, and have read the amendment with some care. But at any rate it seems to me that it is a legislative matter that is proposed and that it ought to be left to the legislative body rather than attempt to embody it into the organic law.

Mr. MURRAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. MURRAY. The very clause to which I have attached this is legislation.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The clause to which the gentleman seeks to attach it is that no person shall be imprisoned for debt.

Mr. MANN. That is not the paragraph to which it is offered.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I beg the pardon of the gentleman. The last clause read was that no person shall be imprisoned for debt.

Mr. MURRAY. I offered it to the one above.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman offered the amendment to come in after line 2.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. So far as that is concerned, that is immaterial. I think, however, for clearness in engrossing, it ought to be clearly understood that the amendment is offered to the paragraph above.

Mr. MURRAY. It was read that way. I want to ask the gentleman if this clause itself could not be made a legislative power?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes; it could be.

Mr. MURRAY. Is there any distinction between a legislative right and the power of a constitutional convention?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That carries us into a broad field of argument. As I understand the gentleman's proposition, it seems to me that this covers it, that no law impairing the obligation of contracts shall be enacted, because a statute is a part of a contract made under that statute.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Oklahoma says this is a legislative provision; but is it? This provision is that no law shall be enacted, and so forth. This is a constitutional provision and not a legislative provision, while the gentleman's amendment is really a legislative provision. This is an inhibition upon the legislature to do a thing.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the gentleman from Oklahoma stated that it was a legislative provision, I did not understand him correctly. I understood him to inquire of me if the legislature could not enact this provision, even if it were not included in the constitution, and I responded, of course, that the legislature could; but if the gentleman from Oklahoma meant to say that this is a legislative provision as distinguished from a constitutional provision, then certainly I would not agree with the gentleman, because it is a constitutional provision.

Mr. MANN. Surely the legislature could not enact this provision, because the legislature could not bind a succeeding legislature by stating that no succeeding legislature should pass a law. This is a constitutional provision and not a legislative provision. We have the power to say that the legislature shall not pass a law, but the legislature has no power to say that a succeeding legislature shall not pass a law.

Mr. MURRAY. The fact that you have stated that the obligations of contracts shall not be nullified makes it necessary to provide an exception in this case. If you leave out this section you have in the bill, it will be unnecessary to put in the provision I have offered; but I have offered it as the exception, where it would be contrary to public policy, and the fact that you have included that statement makes this necessary as a constitutional provision.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. So far as I understand the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma, it is, in the first place, a purely legislative provision. In so far as it may be termed a constitutional provision it is really covered by the language that is already included in this amendment. I do not believe that in the adoption of an organic law for these people we ought to encumber it with long legislative provisions.

Mr. MURRAY. I will not agree that the gentleman can differentiate thus between constitutional and legislative provisions. I think I know something of constitutional provisions, and the statement that there is any distinction will not go before this House.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Well, I submit—I yield to the gentleman; certainly.

Mr. MURRAY. I want to say——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. MURRAY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Tennessee may have five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURRAY. A constitutional convention is a body of the highest legislative power, and whatever it does is in the nature of legislation, and many of the provisions placed in State constitutions could be enacted by the legislature without being placed in the constitution, just as in this case; but the fact that you provide that no contract shall be violated makes it necessary to give the exception, and that is why I offer it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, so far as I know it has not been found necessary for a hundred years for the States to include such a provision as that, although this other provision which is here included has been carried from the beginning of many of their constitutions. I repeat again, Mr. Chairman, I do not think it is desirable in an organic law to render it complex with details. I think, sir, that one of the elements of strength in the Constitution of the United States is its brevity, its simplicity of statement, and the absence of details. This bill of rights which we are carrying in this enactment is substantially the bill of rights that is carried in the present organic law of the Philippine Islands. It is the act to which the people are accustomed. I do not believe it wise to encumber it with long details that are not absolutely fundamental in character and therefore constitutional in their elements, but are legislative in character.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I feel I should long hesitate to differ with the able committee who have given this matter so much patriotic consideration, when it is true I have given it so little consideration, but at the same time I could not help but observe what the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] said when he admonished this Congress not to put in the bill of rights certain salient features that the people of the Philippine Islands may later be entitled to, and I shall not from now or in the future subscribe to the theory the gentleman lays down—that we can not in the bill of rights, or in the constitution, so called, or in the first powers conferred upon that people, lay down some appropriate safeguards that ought to be laid down. It matters not to me that the provision be so-called legislation; what is a constitution anyway but legislation.

It has been my pleasure to live in a Territory where the Federal Government did all of the legislating, excepting what a more or less loosely organized legislature did.

During the early period of a Territory the legislation is usually not strong enough to combat the influences that present themselves, and it needs good strong safeguards handed to it by a body strong enough, first, to pass it, and, second, to enforce it. I have not read with care or studied with precision the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY], but I hope the committee will not sweep aside too hastily the amendments offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma, and I do not say too much in his behalf when I say that he presided over the constitutional convention in our State, which at the time was more or less criticized, but I call the attention of this House to the fact—and they may smile at it or frown at it, as they please—that every constitutional convention which has been held in this Republic since that constitution was made, has fashioned its constitution after it, almost to the letter, and I might also call the attention of this House to the further fact that this Congress every time a question has brought itself before it squarely on its merits, and every national convention not alone in my party, but in the other parties, when these questions have been brought squarely to their attention and well understood, have adopted them almost in toto.

Mr. Chairman, I can remember when it was almost a matter sufficient to cause an arrest to say that one believed in the initiative and referendum. I can remember when any of the advanced laws or legislation enacted in the public interests would be scoffed at and brushed aside, and still in our platforms we find it, still in our Congress we find recognition of it, still in our own enactments we find it, and we find recognition of it everywhere in all parties in American politics.

I shall not try to say that the committee should accept this amendment, because they know better about it than I do; but I urge on them not to sweep aside too hastily any amendments that are offered for the benefit of the Filipino people during the formative period of the Philippine Islands. When they begin to take on power and corresponding responsibility and start with their legislation they will have all sorts of influences to contend with; they will have all sorts of obstacles thrown in their way; and they will have all sorts of impediments that a weak territorial legislature thousands of miles away from us can not contend with, and if by this enactment we can say that the weak and dependent people who have to labor for and serve in the employ of those railroad corporations and other corporations that will spring up and become strong and powerful, sufficiently so to head off legislation, may be benefited by such an amendment as this, then we ought to adopt it.

I shall vote for the amendment, full well realizing that I take some chances, because a Member takes a good deal in his hands when he comes in and attempts to override a committee that has studied a subject carefully. I have every confidence in the committee. I have even affection for most of them. I am usually willing to follow them. They are entitled to great credit for their work in this and other matters.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to enter into any discussion as to the provisions of the Oklahoma constitution. I may say that I am in complete accord with what both of the gentlemen representing that great State have said as to the merits of this particular amendment. I do not, however, think it ought to be incorporated in the Philippine bill of rights. The gentleman who last addressed the committee [Mr. FERRIS] said, or I understood him to say, that in the first organic law of the Philippines this proposition should find a place. I wish to say to the gentleman that 12 years ago Congress passed an organic law for the Philippine Islands, under which the inhabitants of those islands have been living ever since they have had a civil government. I wish to say further that the language employed in this bill is exactly—not substantially—like it, as my friend from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] said. The same language is also to be found in the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I will.

Mr. MURRAY. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] made the statement a while ago that because this was not found in the ordinary constitutions, therefore it was legislative. The very next paragraph, prohibiting a person from being imprisoned for debt, is not in the Constitution of the United States and is in no other constitution except that of the Republic and State of Texas; and I think it is wise here; and if this protects a right, why should it not be announced as a constitutional provision?

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I can not speak as to what the gentleman says of the constitution of Texas. I am, however, perfectly willing to admit that what he says is true. I think, however, that this is a legislative provision, and that for that reason it should be left out of the Philippine bill of rights. Certainly the legislature of the Philippine Islands can under this bill adopt such a provision as this if it desires to do so, and I fully agree with my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], that we ought not to go, in the preparation of a bill of rights for the Philippine Islands, into too much detail. I am not questioning the wisdom of this or any other provision in the constitution of the State of Oklahoma. This provision is not in the constitutions of a great many of the other States of the Union. It is not in that of my own State, which probably was adopted subsequent to that of Oklahoma. Therefore I hope that the committee will not insist upon incorporating in this bill of rights matters that the Committee on Insular Affairs thought ought to be left to the legislature created in this bill.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The provision in the bill is as follows:

That no law impairing the obligation of contracts shall be enacted.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that very clearly that is not in the nature of a regulation of private business between private individuals, but an inhibition upon the legislative power, and for that reason it is constitutional and fundamental and not legislative. Here is a protection against legislative enactment for the people, but not a protection as between individuals. The provision which the gentleman would have incorporated reads in part as follows:

Provided, That any provision of a contract, expressed or implied, made by any person by which any of the benefits of this act or of the general law is sought to be waived shall be null and void.

That is, if a private individual anywhere in the Philippine Islands shall make a contract with another private individual or with a corporation by which it is sought to waive any of the provisions of this act or the general law, that then the contract shall be null and void. Now let us see what is to be waived. This act is the act we have before us. We know what that means. It also says "or of the general law." What is the general law? Is it possible we would write into the Constitution a provision making null and void any provision in a private contract which waives some right granted by general law? Surely that would work harm in a thousand ways. Certainly, but to state the proposition is sufficient. Mr. Chairman, there is another feature that seems to me more important perhaps than any that I have stated. Continuing, the paragraph reads:

And any provision of such contract or agreement, expressed or implied, stipulating for notice or demand other than such as may be provided by law as a condition precedent to establish any claim, demand, or liability shall be null and void.

Let us see what that means. Without any attempt to trace it in all its relations, take one illustration. An insurance contract is a contract made by a private individual, usually with a corporation. It may be made with a partnership, an insurance company. Those contracts always contain, and properly contain, a certain provision in reference to notice. If it is an accident policy, notice of the accident; if it is a health policy, notice of the loss of health; if it is a life policy, notice of the death of the insured. Will anybody say those provisions are not proper? Will anyone say every one of these provisions should not be in a contract of that kind, not simply for the protection of the individual which has the insurance but for the corporation that is the insurer?

So, Mr. Chairman, if we are going to enact this as the fundamental law we would have to say that the Philippine Legislature must enact a law specifying in every individual case the kind of notice that shall be introduced in case of a life policy, the kind of notice necessary in accident insurance, if it be an accident policy, and this has nothing whatever to do with the relationship between employee and employer. It is easy to see how this could reach out in other ways and really work a great deal of confusion and, I think, a great deal of injury. While, Mr. Chairman, I am one of those, like the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS], who believes that any suggestion coming from the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY] respecting a constitution and the protection of the rights of the people under it is entitled to serious consideration, yet it does not seem to me that this amendment is framed so as to fit into this bill, and that before we do this, unless it is so framed, its results would be exceedingly harmful and certainly full of great danger.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced the noes appeared to have it.

Upon a division (demanded by Mr. MURRAY) there were—ayes 12, noes 30.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, at the end of line 3, strike out the period and insert a comma, and add the following: "or held in satisfaction of the same in involuntary servitude by his creditor."

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is offered with the intent of curing the practice of peonage in the islands that from reports that I can gather is pretty general.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will yield.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman think the language in lines 22, 23, and 24 cover that?

Mr. FESS. No; I do not think so. It is a question whether that would cover it in satisfaction of a debt; at least it has not covered it so far in practice.

Mr. MURRAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will yield.

Mr. MURRAY. If the gentleman will permit just a statement I wish to make. In the adoption of this provision we adopt into the law all the decisions of the courts where they now exist and they have held just what the gentleman is trying to put into it, so that in view of that I think they would hold it in the Philippines.

Mr. FESS. Well, Mr. Chairman, whatever might be held by Members on the floor here, there is not any doubt but what there is a condition of peonage pretty generally in the islands, and there ought to be something done by this body to prevent it. I realize——

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is not that condition that exists there in spite of and not by authority of the law?

Mr. FESS. Probably——

Mr. SHERLEY. Is not that actually so?

Mr. FESS. Probably there is truth in the statement. I do not mean that this is all of it, but what I am after is to cure, if possible, a condition that seems not to be cured by the amount of legislation now on the statute books. I realize very distinctly the difference between constitutional sanction and legislative enactment.

Mr. QUEZON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I should like to be permitted to make a statement before yielding.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. FESS. It has been clearly stated here that this body has the right to grant constitutional sanction for legislation in the Philippines, and the Philippine Assembly, acting upon that sanction, can enact it into law. This is, in my judgment, one of the serious conditions of this sort of legislation. We are not sharply distinguishing between the two bodies. The one is granting the constitutional sanction to do a thing, which is this body, and the other is enacting that into law, which is not this body, but is the body over in the Philippines. There is a conflict here. We give authority to do a thing; recommendations are made that it should be done, but those recommendations are not acted upon. Now, in view of the fact that there is a system of peonage widespread in the islands, I take it that we ought to do something to prevent it. I want to read from a report.

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman yield right there? The gentleman says "in view of the fact that there is a widespread system of peonage in the islands." I admit there has been some discussion on that subject, a good deal of controversy about it, but the gentleman is aware of the fact, is he not, that the Philippine Legislature last winter passed a law on this subject which absolutely prevents the existence of peonage in the islands?

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, the fact that the legislature has enacted it does not prevent the succeeding legislature repealing it at some future time, and therefore the law does not satisfy me. Judge Ostrand, judge of the court of land registration, has made this statement, among others:

In 1907 a woman from the town of Balincaguin, in Pangasinan, came to my office and stated that she, about six years before, had

"mortgaged"—the terms "salda" in Ilcano and "sanla" in Pangasinan are usually translated "mortgage," but also imply pledge, as the creditor generally takes possession of the mortgaged property—her 12-year-old son for some ₱20 to Don Cirilio Braganza, the member of the Second Philippine Legislature for the district in which I was then living—

I hope the Members will note that this mortgagee was a member of the Philippine Legislature.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. McKELLAR). The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to continue for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to continue for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES. May I ask the gentleman from what he is reading?

Mr. FESS. I am reading from the report of Judge Ostrand.

Mr. JONES. What is the book?

Mr. FESS. It is Dean Worcester's book of two volumes.

It says further:

That her son had been working for Braganza ever since; and that, according to her reckoning, the debt had already been paid, but that Braganza had unjustly charged the loss of a carabao to her son's account, thus adding ₱120, if I remember correctly, to the debt.

* * * * * * *

While practicing law in the Province of Pangasinan during the years 1905 to 1909 hardly a week passed but what cases of involuntary servitude, as defined in the within communication, came under my observation.

And then I read from a report of the secret-service department of Manila, as follows:

ROSALES, March 26, 1912.

CHIEF OF THE SECRET SERVICE DEPARTMENT, Manila.

DEAR SIR: On behalf of Garegorio Almario, a young girl residing at my house, I write to ask you if you can not have this matter attended to.

Six years ago a man named Tomas Almario, living at present in Rosales, borrowed some money (₱20 only). This man was unable to repay this money, so he sold this girl, named Inocencia Almario, to a Mr. Galban. I think he is the president of Bautista. Her sister has been to Bautista to take this girl away, but she has been rebuked by these people in my presence. They state she owes ₱60, the extra ₱40 being interest on the ₱20 borrowed six years ago.

On page 720 of the second volume of Dean Worcester's work it says:

I have not made the slightest effort to get the peonage records of Philippine assemblymen, but have taken cases as they came; yet three of the limited number here discussed concern members or ex-members of the assembly. Is it any wonder that that body refuses to consider a law prohibiting and penalizing peonage?

Now, Mr. Chairman, this unfortunate situation, whatever may be its source—and it certainly can not be disputed in the islands—ought to have a remedy somewhere. I think there is not anything so lifeless, so hopeless, as a system of peonage, where a person is held in satisfaction of a debt and held in servitude, and allowing the debt to be increased every year instead of lessened. There is case after case that I am going to put in the RECORD where individuals, going into the service of some other person to whom they owe a debt, will remain there, and the debt instead of lessening increases with the years, until it is absolutely hopeless, where hour after hour, and day after day, and year after year they toil hopelessly without any thought of ever having their freedom, and do not really know why they are so held.

I would like to have this particular amendment adopted, which simply says that no person shall be held for debt, and which adds that no person shall be held in involuntary servitude in satisfaction of a debt by his creditor. It seems to me that that is a province for us to act upon, because the legislative assembly may make a law that will repeal the present law, and if this is the official authority for legislation we ought to take a position upon that for the sake of the individual Filipino.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield before he takes his seat?

Mr. FESS. I will.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I again invite the attention of the gentleman to the language at the bottom of page 4.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Ohio be extended for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It is the desire of the committee, of course, as it will be of the House, to completely prevent any of those things which the gentleman has described. It ought to have been done long ago, and I do not understand why it was not. Now, I call the gentleman's attention to the language at the bottom of page 4 of the bill, as follows:

That neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the parties shall have been duly convicted, shall exist in said islands.

That is the exact language of the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and the Supreme Court of the United States decided within the last three or four years that that was clearly against the existence of peonage.

Mr. FESS. In reply to my friend from Tennessee, I call his attention to the fact that there was a case that was passed in the Philippine court of first instance and then was appealed to the Supreme Court of the Philippines, where it was decided that the law fixed no penalty whatever, and therefore slavery was not forbidden in the Philippines by this provision.

For that reason, it seems to me, we ought to do something, and I want to say that I very fully appreciate the discrimination which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] made a while ago, that a constitutional provision is one thing and a legislative enactment is another, and I therefore hesitate to ask any legislation that would be placed in that light or to encumber the organic law with legislative affairs. But this amendment simply adds to the prohibition of imprisonment for debt that other prohibition of peonage. I am not here discussing slavery in the Philippines, but that form of servitude which places a debtor within the control of his creditor. This system is certainly in vogue in the islands and should be prevented, so far as we can do so. Here is the place to take the first step.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Chairman, whether the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] is or is not right in his contention, that the object of the amendment introduced by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] is accomplished by the provision of the last paragraph on page 4, I am prepared to say that I should not, so far as the object aimed at is concerned, have the slightest objection to having the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio put into the bill.

I regret, however, that the gentleman thought it necessary in the discussion of his amendment to revive the question of the supposed slavery and peonage in the Philippines.

I am particularly regretful that the gentleman from Ohio should have renewed the discussion of this subject, because the matter he refers to has been thoroughly investigated by the most unimpeachable authorities and has been fully disposed of. This discussion is, therefore, out of date, and certainly it throws no light upon this bill.

So far as I know, this issue was raised for the first time in the United States early in 1913, when a resolution of inquiry regarding the question of slavery was introduced in the Senate. This resolution grew out of an article in the National Humane Review, largely made up of a letter written by Mr. Worcester, in which Mr. Worcester made the charge in question. In due time this resolution was answered by the Secretary of War in a letter reading in part as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 6, 1913.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

SIR: I beg leave to acknowledge the receipt of the following resolution of the Senate:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to send to the Senate any and all facts bearing directly or indirectly upon the truth of the charge publicly made that human slavery exists at this time in the Philippine Islands and that human beings are bought and sold in such islands as chattels."

In response thereto I beg leave to state as follows:

There is not in this department, to the knowledge of the Secretary thereof or of the head of the bureau having charge of insular affairs, a record of any facts bearing directly or indirectly upon the truth of the charge, publicly made, that human slavery exists at this time in the Philippine Islands and that human beings are bought and sold in such islands as chattels.

The only information concerning this matter of which there is any record in this department or the branch of it having to do with insular affairs is the following:

In a hearing before the Committee on Insular Affairs of the House of Representatives, on Wednesday, February 10, 1904, Mr. Taft, then Secretary of War, said:

"I have no doubt that slavery continues in part of the Moro Province, and that there is some slavery in some of the Christian Filipino Provinces that lie near to the mountain tribes. This latter we are trying hard to eliminate. I had a report from a constabulary officer from the Province of Isabela, saying that it was not the general custom, but that it was not uncommon for hill-tribe parents to bring their children into a Filipino village and to sell a child to a wealthy man in the village who would use him as a servant. That is contrary to law, and we have directed prosecution in every case brought to our attention."

The foregoing is taken from the printed report of the hearings before the House Committee on Insular Affairs.

* * * * * * *

It would seem from such investigation as time has permitted to be made of the law existing in the Philippine Islands, that there are provisions in the criminal code, both with respect to that part of said islands inhabited by Moros or other non-Christian tribes and fully organized Christian Provinces, covering unlawful detention, whether called slavery or not, as a result of which a person unlawfully detaining another or coercing him to work against his will may be imprisoned and fined.

Very respectfully, LINDLEY M. GARRISON,
Secretary of War.

One would think, Mr. Chairman, that this should have been a sufficient reply to the injurious suggestion originating with the former secretary of the interior of the Philippines, but, as it happened, further conclusive evidence on the subject was also furnished to the American public in a statement issued by former Justice James F. Tracey, of the insular supreme court. Justice Tracey said, in a letter published in the New York Times:

The April number of the National Humane Review, the organ of the American Humane Association, published an article headed "Human Slavery Still Exists Under the United States Flag," made up chiefly of a letter from Hon. Dean C. Worcester, secretary of the Interior of the Philippine Islands, to Dr. William O. Stillman, president of the Humane Association. To this article currency is given by the publication of a summary of it in your issue of this morning in a dispatch from Washington printed under the caption "Slaves Even in Manila." The deduction drawn from the supposed condition of slavery in the islands is that the Philippine Assembly by refusing to pass a bill punishing slavery throughout the islands as a crime has demonstrated its incapacity as a legislature to deal with this modern humane problem.

Mr. Worcester's charge is largely based on the decision of the Supreme Court of the Philippine Islands, the syllabus of which is quoted by him at length, as follows:

"There is at present no law punishing slave holding as a crime.

"The constitutional provision of the Philippine bill 'that neither slavery nor involuntary servitude shall exist in these islands,' while operating to nullify any agreement in contravention of it, requires supplementary legislation to give it effect criminally.

"We are dealing not with a civil remedy but with a criminal charge in relation to which the Bill of Rights defines no crime and provides no punishment. Its effects can not be carried into the realm of criminal law without an act of the legislature."

It happens that to me, as one of the justices of the Supreme Court of the Philippine Islands at the time, was assigned the writing of the opinion of the court in the case, which is reported at page 64 of the eighth volume of the Philippine Reports, now before me. Without desiring a controversy with Mr. Worcester or Gen. McIntyre, also mentioned in your Washington dispatch, I feel it incumbent on me to promptly call attention to the substance of this decision. The record before the court shows not that slavery existed in any form throughout the Philippine Islands, but only a custom of child servitude or apprenticeship in certain mountain regions. The opinion says:

"It is proved in the case that it is an Igorot custom to dispose of children to pay the debts of their fathers, the transaction in the native language being termed a sale, and the defendant appears to have engaged in the business of buying in Nueva Vizcaya children to sell in the lowlands of Isabela. * * *

"The name applied to it by the custom of the Igorots is not enough to establish that in truth and in effect it was a sale or anything more than a contract for services. * * *

"The employment or custody of a minor with the consent or sufferance of the parents or guardian, although against the child's own will, can not be considered involuntary servitude."

It is likened to an 'indenturing of children, in accordance with custom, unprotected by statutory safeguards. After calling attention both to the American constitutional declarations against servitude and the humane provisions of the Spanish codes prohibiting the abuse of minors, as well as the declaration of the Spanish law of the thirteenth century that "slavery is a thing that all men naturally abhor," the court suggests that any remedy is for the consideration of the legislature rather than action by the criminal courts.

The further inference is to be drawn from Mr. Worcester's letter that antislavery laws were thereafter passed applicable to the mountain Provinces and the Moro Province, and the offense which he finds is that the legislature refuses to apply a similar law to the civilized parts of the islands. The reason for the refusal is plain. The assembly does not consider that slavery exists in the civilized parts of the islands. It is stated in the letter that "there are Negrito slaves held to-day in the city of Manila." If this is so, their liberation can be enforced any day through a writ of habeas corpus. I am too well aware of Mr. Worcester's skill as a seasoned controversialist to believe that he has ventured upon a specific assertion without holding some proof of it in reserve. I can only say that having been some years a resident of Manila in official position, such a condition of things is unknown to me, as it was unknown to my colleagues, some of whom have resided in the Philippine Islands all their lives. The condition must be exceptional and abnormal, as it is illegal, existing in the islands, as phrased by Gen. McIntyre, "Just as crime exists everywhere."

It may also be observed that for years before the organization of the Philippine Assembly the legislation of the Philippine Islands was in the hands of a commission dominated by Americans, having in its power the passage of an antislavery law on any day at any hour. The reproach, if it be genuine, lies with far greater force against the American commission than the Philippine Assembly, in view of the existence of this species of servitude in the mountain Provinces, which were immediately under the jurisdiction of the secretary of the interior.

It has passed into an adage that "you can not indict a whole people." All history proves that by innuendo you may calumniate a whole people. I may be permitted to say that while not one of those who think Philippine independence a timely or tenable thing to-day, I deplore the creation of a public opinion in this country based on misconception of a subject that truly needs all the light that can be shed on it by men holding official places.

JAMES F. TRACEY.

ALBANY, May 3, 1913.

Mr. Chairman, the foregoing testimony of the Secretary of War and of an ex-member of the Philippine Supreme Court ought to have been satisfactory and final in closing this unfortunate controversy. But Mr. Worcester would not stop at that point, and, at a great expense to the Filipino people, he had printed a voluminous report entitled "Slavery and Peonage in the Philippine Islands." Though this was supposed to be for the Governor General of the Philippine Islands, extra copies were made and sent broadcast throughout the United States. Later he included much of this document in his book entitled "The Philippines, Past and Present."

Mr. Worcester, in a vain effort to justify his early declarations that slavery exists in the Philippines, used all the agencies of the Philippine Government to find out individual instances of deprivation of personal liberty that had taken place in any part of the islands, the Moro Province included, and cited them in the publications I have referred to before as technical cases of slavery. Any sensible person will attentively and without prejudice read both the report and the book of Mr. Worcester will at once be convinced that the efforts of the ex-secretary of the interior have failed, because if they show anything whatever it is that there is no such thing as slavery in that part of the Philippines inhabited by Christian Filipinos—certainly not in the sense that it existed in the United States prior to the Civil War. The so-called "typical cases of slavery" cited by Mr. Worcester are in fact, in some instances, criminal actions, for which there are very heavy punishments provided in the penal code, and which are given in that code such names as "illegal detention," "kidnaping," and so forth. Indeed, many of these so-called typical cases have been actually tried in the courts of the Philippine Islands and the defendants therein have been convicted and imprisoned. In other instances these "typical slavery cases," such as all those that Mr. Worcester calls "purchase and sale of human beings," are either ordinary contracts for personal services, wherein the employer advances the wages of the employee to the employee's parents or tutors when he is a minor, or they are cases of adoption, wherein the adoptive parents make a present to the destitute mother of the adopted child. When Gov. Gen. Harrison visited last year the town of Bacolor, one of the young men who delivered an address of welcome to the governor in correct English was the "victim" in one of Mr. Worcester's slavery cases. He was "purchased" when still a baby, and his "purchaser," who was a wealthy Filipino of the town of Bacolor, educated him, and upon her death made him her heir. There is therefore no reason for the anteries of Mr. Worcester, and much less for the expenditure of the money of the Filipino people in printing and distributing broadcast his report, except Mr. Worcester's desire to unjustly depict the Filipino people—for whom he has always entertained an ill-concealed, strong dislike, if not contempt or hatred—as a people devoid of all humanitarian sentiment and moral sense and badly in need of an iron hand to keep them in good behavior.

The following paragraph, which appears on page 82 of Mr. Worcester's special report, and is repeated in more or less the same words on page 729, volume 2, of his book, gives a fair idea as to the impression that the ex-secretary of the interior for the Philippine Islands meant to create in the United States:

Without hesitation I assert that the existence of slavery and peonage in the Philippines is the greatest single problem which there confronts the Government of the United States in its effort to build up a respectable and responsible electorate and to establish representative government.

Shall human flesh be openly bought and sold under the American flag?

If this pathetic and shocking statement presented any semblance of actual conditions in the islands, what a serious charge would the American Government have to answer before the inexorable bar of history! How would the United States satisfy the enlightened opinion and humanitarian sentiment of the world horrified by the discovery that after 15 years of continuous and supreme American control of the archipelago "human flesh is still openly bought and sold" and that this "greatest single problem" of the islands is still unsolved? And what an indictment—if the above-quoted statement of Mr. Worcester was true—what an indictment such a statement would be against every Governor General of the Philippines, beginning with Mr. Taft and coming down to Gov. Forbes, as well as against every member of the Philippine Commission who sat in that body up to the year 1913, more particularly against Mr. Worcester himself, the only commissioner who has held a commissionership continuously from the inauguration of that body until September, 1913.

Fortunately for the United States and for Mr. Worcester himself, they need not suffer the condemnation of mankind on this score, because there never existed in the islands any such problem as alleged. To be sure, in the Moro Province—a territory which has always been under the exclusive control of American officials—slavery was at one time a common practice, and upon the arrival of the first American troops a treaty ratified by the Sultan of Jolo and the American commanding officer provided that this institution should not be interfered with by the American Government. But this shameful treaty was at once repudiated by the Washington authorities, so that even in the Moro Province within a few years following American occupation no "human flesh" was any longer "bought and sold under the American flag."

But whatever the merits of Mr. Worcester's admonition at the time it was uttered, this "greatest single problem" confronting the United States in the Philippines at the end of 15 years of supreme American rule was promptly and early met by the Philippine Legislature after the Filipinos came into control of both of its branches. On November 28, 1913, an antislavery act was adopted. This originated with the Philippine Assembly, and it passed both houses at a time when Filipinos alone, and without any American member excepting the Governor General, sat in the legislature.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from the Philippine Islands yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. QUEZON. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. MILLER. On the occasion of the visit I made to the legislature, which the gentleman so very well described the other day, the assembly passed the act prohibiting slavery, and the gentleman's statement is correct. Is it not also true that prior thereto the American commission had on three separate and distinct occasions passed such an act prohibiting slavery, and that each of those acts was killed by the assembly?

Mr. Chairman, I am very sorry that my distinguished friend has asked me that question, because he compels me to go further than I intended to into this subject, thus forcing me to mention facts that may not be pleasant. The question of the gentleman reopens the whole controversy about slavery, now happily closed.

It would seem to be suggested by his leading question that the Philippine Commission had done everything in its power to enact an antislavery legislation and that it was the assembly's fault that such a measure failed to become law. Indeed, Mr. Worcester has openly made this charge against the Philippine Assembly.

A little of the history of the Philippine Government since American occupation would at once reveal where the fault lay, were it true that slavery exists in the Philippine Islands in so general and an alarming a form—as the quoted statement of Mr. Worcester would indicate—that it required the immediate adoption of measures for its eradication, which had been until lately neglected.

Upon the assumption of sovereignty by the United States over the Philippine Islands all the powers of government were vested, up to October, 1907, first, in the military commander of the army of occupation, and, subsequently, in an American Governor General and in a Philippine Commission, presided over by that governor and composed chiefly of Americans, appointed by the President of the United States. This Philippine Commission, from 1900 up to October, 1907, was exclusively vested with the power to legislate for the Philippines, and it could have passed during that time any act that it chose regardless of the attitude and desire of the Filipino people.

Had the Philippine Commission intended to pass such an act as was suggested by the gentleman from Minnesota, it could easily have done so prior to the establishment of the Philippine Assembly—an event which did not occur until October, 1907. Why this negligence? Both in the report and book of Mr. Worcester he says that shortly after the establishment of the American commission as the legislative authority for the Philippine Islands, the members of the commission, Mr. Worcester himself not excepted, heard of cases of the type that Mr. Worcester calls slavery. Why did the commission do nothing to prevent or punish such crimes during all the seven years of its unrestricted and supreme exclusive legislative control? The answer to this question given by Mr. Worcester is one of the most remarkable acrobatic mental efforts I have ever seen.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Chairman, I am very sorry——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Chairman, I am very sorry, but I must decline to yield. Since the gentleman refused to yield to me when he had the floor, although I only wanted to ask him a fair question, certainly he can not expect me to do for him what he would not do for me. [Laughter.]

An attempt to draft such an act, according to Mr. Worcester, took place in October, 1903. The suggestion that the act be drafted and submitted to the commission for action was made by Mr. Taft, then president of the Philippine Commission; but the act never saw the light at the time. "Why such an act was not drafted and passed, I do not know," says Mr. Worcester, on page 22 of his report and on page 602, volume 2, of his book.

So, this first attempt at antislavery legislation took place in 1903. "My personal attention," Mr. Worcester tells us, "was forcibly drawn to the existence of slavery outside of the Moro territory when I first inspected Nueva Vizcaya in 1905." But Mr. Worcester did not then induce the commission to enact at once antislavery legislation, because, as he explains it, he "then entertained the belief, still held by some Americans, that both slavery and the sale and purchase of human beings could be adequately punished under certain provisions of the Spanish penal code, which were then and still are in effect."

In order, however, to have an authoritative opinion on the subject, Mr. Worcester says that the attorney general was asked to render his opinion on the subject. This was done, and in accord therewith a test case was brought before the courts. Note, Mr. Chairman, that we are told, on the one hand, that in 1903 Mr. Taft had recommended that an antislavery act be framed, a step which for some unknown reason was not taken; and on the other, that in 1905, after the personal attention of Mr. Worcester "was forcibly drawn to the existence of slavery outside of the Moro territory," he—Mr. Worcester—did not immediately renew the effort initiated by Mr. Taft to enact such antislavery legislation because the opinion was still held by himself that the Spanish penal code offered adequate punishment for would-be or actual slaveholders.

But let me continue. A test case, according to Mr. Worcester, was brought before the courts and a final decision rendered thereon by the highest tribunal of the Philippine Islands acquitted the defendant. Mr. Worcester construed this decision as meaning that the supreme court had decided that the Spanish penal code did not punish slavery. Many a lawyer in the Philippines, and especially the Philippine Assembly, did not agree with this construction placed by Mr. Worcester upon that court's decision. I, for one, believe that the ground whereon the court dismissed the case was that there was no evidence presented in support of the complaint. But this is immaterial to the point that I am now trying to make. The material fact is that Mr. Worcester himself in his report and book says that, in view of this decision, "the necessity of legislation seemed obvious."

Let us see how Mr. Worcester, after his "personal attention was forcibly drawn to the existence of slavery," and after he felt that "the necessity of legislation seemed obvious," acted in performance of his plain duty. At that time the commission was still the sole legislative authority of the Philippine Islands and Mr. Worcester a very influential—indeed, the ranking—member of that commission. Did Mr. Worcester then frame and introduce the legislation regarding which he says he did not know why it was not enacted in 1903? Did he frame and introduce the legislation which after the test case was disposed of he says was, in his opinion, an obvious necessity?

He did not. What is his reason now? Let him speak for himself. He says:

> The Philippine Assembly was about to meet for the first time. The work of drafting a proper bill was duly provided for, and I am sure that no member of the commission for a moment entertained the belief that there would be any difficulty in securing the concurrence of the assembly in the passage of a reasonable act prohibiting and penalizing slavery, involuntary servitude, peonage, and the sale and purchase of human beings.

When it is remembered that from October 1 to October 12, 1907, four days immediately preceding the inauguration of the Philippine Assembly, the commission, in its desire to cover all subjects of legislation before there was a popular house to reckon with, enacted 70 laws, one may reasonably question the value of Mr. Worcester's explanation. But I shall take it at face value. Let us now see whether, after the inauguration of the assembly, Mr. Worcester tried to secure the enactment of the badly needed legislation. He himself says that not until 1909 did he draft the desired bill. Why this delay? Why, on such an important measure as this—the measure that was to give the final blow to "the greatest single problem confronting the United States in the Philippine Islands"—why, I repeat, on such important legislation as this should two years have been allowed to pass without any action on the part of the commission?

Mr. Worcester again gives us his reason, but it is no more fortunate or convincing than his earlier ones. He says:

> The gentleman charged with drafting the bill encountered difficulty in so framing it that it would accomplish the desired end without unduly interfering with the rights of parents to dispose of their children. Long delay occurred.

Mr. Chairman, on the strength of this statement, if I did not know Mr. Worcester's ability "as a seasoned controversialist"—in the words of Justice Tracey—I should think him lacking in common sense, but being familiar with his controversial ability I must believe that he takes for granted that, outside of himself, there is no man in this world who can recognize a joke when he sees it. He must have been in an extremely good humor, an unusual thing with him, when he wrote that paragraph.

How can any man say, and keep from laughing at himself or at his readers, that to frame a single act to punish slavery, involuntary servitude, and peonage, with many similar measures in other parts of the world to copy from or to follow as "precedent," is so difficult a task that long delay is inevitable? And this delay lasted two years! If it be true that the Philippine Commission could not frame so simple and plain a law in less than two years, with the office of the Attorney General and other law offices at their command, then that commission stands convicted of utter incompetency. Yet the Filipino people were for many years under the exclusive legislative authority of such a commission! Of course, the commission was able to frame this bill had it desired to do so. Mr. Worcester himself is a well-informed man. He could have written such a bill in a day; at any rate, in much less time than he employed in writing his report. Doubtless Mr. Worcester, in telling us the difficulty of framing this bill, was amusing himself at his own expense or that of his colleagues of the commission and of the general public as well. But I am not so much surprised, Mr. Chairman, at Mr. Worcester's unexpected jocosity as I am amazed to see that there could be found people who, after such nonsense, would pay any attention to anything that Mr. Worcester might say about slavery or peonage in the Philippine Islands! It is sad to see that Mr. Worcester let his opportunity slip by to become the Lincoln of the Philippines!

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from the Philippine Islands has expired.

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to continue for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from the Philippines asks unanimous consent to be allowed to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from the Philippines yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. CLINE. The gentleman says that during the last session of the Philippine Legislature they passed a law punishing slavery and peonage?

Mr. QUEZON. Yes, sir; this law originated with the Philippine Assembly and was passed also by the commission when only one American member was in the islands.

Mr. CLINE. It is charged, though, by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] that on three different occasions the Filipinos had an opportunity to concur with the commission in those acts.

Mr. QUEZON. Yes.

Mr. CLINE. How do you explain their failure to do it?

Mr. QUEZON. I am coming to that now, but I thought I should first inform the committee as to the whole process that this antislavery legislation went through, according to Mr. Worcester's own account, so that gentlemen may form a proper conception of the true import of the so-called slavery question in the Philippine Islands and the reasons that the assembly had for not concurring with the commission in the passage of the antislavery legislation, as suggested by the question of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER]. From what I said, Mr. Chairman, or, rather, from what Mr. Worcester himself says, the salient, clearly established fact is that from the creation of the Philippine Commission down to 1907 the commission was the sole legislative body of the Philippine Islands, and that down to 1909 no antislavery legislation was passed by that body. Now, such being the case—and there is not the slightest dispute about it—we are face to face with this dilemma: That either there was no slavery in the Philippines so real or so general as to demand immediate attention and to require special legislation on the part of the Philippine Commission, or if there was slavery, so openly and extensively practiced as to constitute "the greatest single problem confronting the United States in the Philippines," there never was a body of more incompetent or more criminally negligent officials than the members of the Philippine Commission, who, down to 1909, failed utterly and in disregard of their most imperative duty to enact the necessary legislation. Since this last theory would seriously indict several men of recognized capacity and devotion to duty, such as ex-President Taft, ex-Secretary of War Wright, ex-Gov. Gen. Smith, ex-Gov. Gen. Forbes, and others, the only possible theory is that Mr. Worcester's agitation about slavery in the Philippines is a tempest in a teapot. And this is really the truth and the whole truth in a nutshell. That is why the assembly refused to concur with the Philippine Commission in passing the antislavery legislation, which unexpectedly became at the eleventh hour the mania of the ex-secretary of the interior.

The members of the Philippine Assembly did not believe then that in the territory inhabited by their respective constituencies slavery in its legitimate meaning existed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. QUEZON. I ask for two minutes more, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from the Philippines asks unanimous consent for two minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Chairman, I can anticipate the further question that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE] is formulating in his own mind. He wishes to know if the members of the assembly who have enacted this antislavery legislation came at last to the conclusion that slavery is practiced among their constituents and that the penal code did not contain provisions punishing that crime. I can answer that question, for I am fully informed that nothing of the sort had happened. I for one can give a very good reason why the antislavery act had to be passed in 1913 while no such act was needed prior to January, 1912, regardless of whether there was slavery or not in the Philippine Islands and of whether prior to 1912 the provisions of the penal code imposed heavy penalties for all kinds of violations of personal liberty. The fact is that on January 20, 1912, a law was enacted in the Philippine Islands legalizing compulsory service and providing severe penalties for employees who should leave the service of their employers before they had paid their debts. This law was introduced in the Philippine Commission on November 11, 1911, passed that body on November 14, 1911, and became law on January 20, 1912, as I stated. This infamous law, the only one which has ever in the Philippines given legal sanction to the forcible retention of one man by another for the purpose of compelling the former to render to the latter a service, was passed by the commission at a time when Mr. Worcester was the ranking member of that body and was insisting upon having the Philippine Assembly concur with the Philippine Commission in passing antislavery legislation. This infamous law was enacted while Mr. Worcester was attracting the public attention of this country with his alarming denunciations that slavery and peonage were being practiced in the Philippine Islands. No better proof could be given either of the lack of sincerity of Mr. Worcester in his alleged effort to eradicate the supposed slavery and peonage in the Philippine Islands, or of the nonexistence of these evils that he was denouncing, than the fact that the commission passed the peonage bill. For if Mr. Worcester was really attacking this evil, why should he consent to pass an act that would legalize that practice? The fact that the commission had to pass such a bill indicates, at least, that if slavery and peonage were common practices in the Philippine Islands the time had arrived when the working class knew that its members had the right to work for whomsoever they chose and to leave the service of their employers at will. And these unfortunate creatures were to be deprived of that inviolable right by an act which Mr. Worcester himself took part in passing!

To the everlasting benefit and glory of the Filipino people, to the confusion and shame of those who accuse them of tolerating, if not heartily supporting, the use of their fellow men as animals, the present Philippine Legislature, by enacting last year its antislavery legislation, blotted out forever the only page on our statute books which bore upon it a barbarous, inhuman, criminal act. [Applause.]

I shall print this law in the RECORD, and side by side with it I shall print the antislavery legislation enacted by the present Philippine Legislature:

ANTISLAVERY LAW PASSED BY FILIPINIZED LEGISLATURE NOVEMBER 28, 1913.

An act confirming existing legislation prohibiting slavery, involuntary servitude, and peonage in the Philippine Islands, subject to modifications as provided in sections 268, 269, 270, and 271 of the act of the Congress of the United States approved March 4, 1909, entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States," and adopting measures for preventing violations of said laws.

By authority of the United States, be it enacted by the Philippine Legislature, that—

SECTION 1. Nothing provided in the existing legislation shall be understood or construed as directly or indirectly permitting slavery, involuntary servitude, and peonage in the Philippine Islands. Subject to the modifications provided in the next following section, the provisions of law prohibiting and punishing slavery, involuntary servitude, and peonage are hereby continued in force and effect.

PEONAGE LAW PASSED BY COMMISSION NOVEMBER 14, 1911.

An act relating to contracts of personal service and advances thereunder, and providing punishment for certain offenses connected therewith.

By authority of the United States, be it enacted by the Philippine Legislature, that—

SECTION 1. Any person who, with intent to injure or defraud his employer, enters into a contract for the performance of any act or personal service, and thereby obtains money or other personal property from such employer as a gratuity or advance on wages to be earned under such contract of employment, and without just cause, and without refunding such money or paying for such property, refuses or fails to perform such act of service, shall on conviction thereof be punished by a fine of not more than ₱200 or imprisonment for not more than six months, or with both penalties.

ishing slavery, involuntary servitude, and peonage contained in any laws, orders, ordinances, decrees, instructions, or regulations promulgated during Spanish government and applicable to the Philippine Islands are hereby confirmed and ratified.

SEC. 2. The provisions of sections 268, 269, 270, and 271 of the act of the Congress of the United States approved on March 4, 1909, entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States," are hereby adopted, with the necessary modifications, as if they had been enacted by the Philippine Legislature, to be in force within the territory subject to the jurisdiction of said legislature, so that said sections, as modified, shall read as follows:

(a) Whoever kidnap or carries away any other person, with the intent that such other person be sold into involuntary servitude or held as a slave; or who entices, persuades, or induces any other person to go on board any vessel or to any other place with the intent that he may be made or held as a slave, or sent out of the country to be so made or held; or who in any way knowingly aids in causing any other person to be held, sold, or carried away to be held or sold as a slave, shall be fined not more than ₱10,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

(b) Whoever holds, arrests, returns, or causes to be held, arrested, or returned, or in any manner aids in the arrest or return of any person to a condition of peonage shall be fined not more than ₱10,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

(c) Whoever obstructs, or attempts to obstruct, or in any way interferes with or prevents the enforcement of the section last preceding shall be liable to the penalties therein prescribed.

(d) Whoever shall knowingly and willfully bring into the Philippine Islands or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof any person inveigled or forcibly kidnaped in any other country, with intent to hold such person so inveigled or kidnaped in confinement or to any involuntary servitude; or whoever shall knowingly and willfully sell, or cause to be sold, into any condition of involuntary servitude, any other person for any term whatever; or whoever shall knowingly and willfully hold to involuntary servitude any person so brought or sold, shall be fined not more than ₱10,000 and imprisoned not more than five years.

SEC. 3. It shall be the duty of the provincial governor of every province organized under act No. 83 of the Philippine Commission to obtain information and take all measures that in his judgment may be proper to forestall and thereafter to prevent any violations of this act, and in case such violations have been committed, to order immediate prosecution. It shall also be the duty of the provincial governor to order, where necessary, the institution of habeas corpus proceedings, and he may apply to the provincial fiscal, and in his default to the proper court, for the designation of a lawyer to protect the rights of the person or persons for whose benefit the habeas corpus proceedings shall have been brought, and no fees shall be charged for such services, and the costs shall in every case be de oficio.

SEC. 4. The courts of first instance shall have original jurisdiction over all cases for violations of this act.

Enacted, November 28, 1913.

SEC. 2. Any person who, with intent to injure or defraud his landlord, enters into a contract in writing for the rent of land under an agreement to cultivate such land, thereby obtains money or other personal property from such landlord, and without just cause, and without refunding such money or paying for such personal property, refuses or fails to cultivate such land or to comply with his contract relative thereto, shall on conviction be punished by a fine of not more than ₱200 or imprisonment for not more than six months, or with both penalties.

SEC. 3. Any person who, with intent to injure or defraud, shall contract with another to receive from him personal service of any kind and to compensate him therefor, and thereafter with like intent receive the benefit of such service in whole or in part and fails or refuses to pay the compensation agreed upon shall upon conviction thereof be punished by a fine of not more than ₱200 or imprisonment for not more than six months, or with both penalties.

Enacted, January 20, 1912.

Mr. Chairman, Mr. Worcester has paid me his respects both in his report and in his book. He has openly questioned my sincerity or veracity when I first took issue with him as to the question of slavery in the Philippine Islands. I paid no attention to such attacks, for I do not care to lose my time in a useless discussion with him. I should have not brought these questions forward upon this floor had there not been insinuations as to the alleged unwillingness of the Filipino people to prevent the mistreatment and exploitation of their weaker fellow citizen by those who are stronger and unscrupulous. What I am ready to tolerate or overlook regarding myself I shall never let go unchallenged regarding my people.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, it would be preposterous to say that there are not, or there may not be, cases when some Filipino has taken advantage of another Filipino. That would happen there as it happens everywhere, as long as there are bad and good men, strong and weak men, wise and ignorant men. But it is true that at no time was there lacking in the Philippine Islands, in the territory inhabited by Christian Filipinos, a law that would punish such actions; neither is it true that the law was not properly applied when any such case was brought before the court, save perhaps in instances when the judge was not equal to his duties—a misfortune that may happen anywhere and which did happen from time to time during the period of Spanish rule.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUEZON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. In view of the gentleman's statement, what objection is there to putting this provision into the law?

Mr. QUEZON. As I said at the beginning of my remarks, I have no objection to its substance or object, and I would be glad to have it put into the law, but I regret that the distinguished college professor from Ohio [Mr. FESS] should think it necessary to bring into this discussion one of the charges more deeply resented by the Filipinos than any other, because they think that the subject was brought before the American people not for the purpose of curing that evil but for the purpose of denouncing them as being in favor of enslaving their own people, and that it was necessary to send to the Philippine Islands high-salaried men like Mr. Worcester to defend the people of that country against the selfishness of their countrymen. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I shall insert in the RECORD in connection with my remarks a review of Mr. Worcester's book, entitled "The Philippines—Past and Present," printed in the Wisconsin State Journal, May 30, 1914.

The review referred to is as follows:

No more important work regarding the Philippines has yet been printed in English. No more interesting work regarding them is likely to be written. To properly review it, either for content or argument, would demand much more space than is at our disposition. The title of the work is misleading. It might better bear one somewhat like this: "The achievements of Dean C. Worcester, as judged by himself, with slaps at Judge Blount." The Good Book tells us that when the Maker of all had finished His six days' toil, He inspected it and declared it good. There have been many human imitators of this divine example; rarely have we known one so satisfied as Prof. Worcester. He declares his Philippine achievement to be very good. The book is one of the "before taking" and "after taking" advertisement sort. It shows us the Philippines before they had Worcester and after they had him; one must be blind not to see the improvement. Mr. Worcester's fundamental proposition is that the Philippines are only possible with us in charge. We have built a splendid structure there, and if we leave it it will crumble. The Filipinos are not fit for independence and will not be for a long time. So we must stay, even if we wished to leave. The earlier chapters of the book are historical, after a fashion. They are intended to relieve conscience. They discuss whether independence was promised and whether we destroyed a republic. It is claimed that we did neither. Insurgent rule is shown to have been a failure, shockingly brutal and cruel, supported by "murder as a governmental agency." The insurrection is said to have been premeditated and the war is stated to have been conducted treacherously. This is a faint picture of the conditions as Worcester depicts them. If one takes his statement just as it stands, it is alarmingly conclusive. Having proved all these things to his own satisfaction, Mr. Worcester proceeds to show what benefits we have conferred and details them one by one. It makes interesting reading, and taken at face value causes one a glow of satisfaction. One may, however, read between the lines. And one sometimes doubts whether Mr. Worcester really takes himself seriously. Almost every topic he takes up raises questions. For example, take health service. We fully appreciate the good done, but there are some curious things in it. We have been too short a time in the islands to know much of cholera and its course there. There was a dreadful outbreak of the disease in 1902–1904. I quote two paragraphs relative to it: In 1902, "before it was finally checked in Manila, there were 5,581 cases, with 4,336 deaths; while in the Provinces, in many of which it necessarily long ran its course practically unhindered, there were 160,671 cases, with 105,075 deaths." In 1904 "the conditions for combating cholera were now more favorable than in 1902," and we have the following results: In Manila "a total of 283 cases and 243 deaths."

"In the Provinces the results of the campaign against cholera were far less satisfactory than in Manila, as was to be anticipated, owing to the lack of adequate personnel, but the cases, which numbered 34,238, and deaths, which numbered 22,938, were far fewer than during the previous epidemic." Examine these satisfactory results a little. In 1902 in Manila 76.7 per cent of the cases died under care; in the Provinces 66.2 per cent of the cases died with inadequate care. In 1904 in Manila 85.8 per cent of the cases died under care, with improved and more favorable conditions; in the Provinces 66.9 per cent of the cases died under inadequate care. Will the death rate in the Philippines, apparently pretty steady at 66 per cent in neglect and bad conditions, finally rise in Manila to 100 per cent when the medical treatment is perfected along modern lines? Mr. Worcester aims, however, to give the impression that danger from cholera is past; that the disease has been stamped out. Thus he states that deaths from cholera have diminished. "In 1908 they numbered 18,811; in 1909, 7,306; in 1910, 6,940; in 1911, 203; in 1912 there were none, and thus far in 1913 there have been none." Curious contrariety of things! In a footnote we read: "Just before I left Manila, in October, 1913, cholera reappeared there."

WORCESTER'S REASONING.

There is no question that Mr. Worcester has been doing his duty all these years in the Philippines with Spartan inflexibility and firmness. He long ago recognized that no thanks were to be expected from the Filipinos. His "wild people" are responsive, but the Filipinos are ungrateful. Mr. Worcester's best friends will hardly claim that he is a man of tact. In his effort to prove the Filipino Assembly incapable of good legislation, Mr. Worcester quotes Speaker Osmeña as follows: "The bill itself was sent to the assembly for action; but on account of the unfriendliness of the members for the secretary of the interior and the lack of sympathy between the assembly and him, it was not given the consideration that it would have received if Mr. Worcester had at the same time sent us the facts which he has sent on to the United States." To Mr. Worcester this remark of Señor Osmeña merely emphasizes the incompetence of the Filipino politician. He excuses his not supporting his bill by the sending of facts by the plea that they all knew the facts. The truly interesting point, however, here is that Mr. Worcester hung onto his job, even when he was so much hated personally that legislation was adversely affected. This was true for years. His usefulness in the commission ended when he was completely disliked by that body, which officially represents seven-eighths of the Philippine population. The tenacity with which he clung to his office after his usefulness was gone became a joke. If it were not so pathetic it would be very, very funny.

On the first occasion when I saw Prof. Worcester he was talking in defense of the Benguet road; he is still defending it; he will have to defend it to his dying day; and after he is gone apologies will still be in order. There are some things, however, into which he does not go. Thus he makes but two incidental references to his libel suit against El Renacimiento. It was the best newspaper in the Philippines. It was ably edited. Mr. Worcester's suit against it was a famous incident, which should not have been neglected in this book. Your reviewer felt at the time that the United States Government would have done wisely to buy off Mr. Worcester at any price. To have paid him $50,000 or $100,000 or $200,000 damages to compensate him for his injured feelings would have been good policy and real economy. There had been things before that irritated the Filipinos, but with the closing up of El Renacimiento Mr. Worcester's usefulness in the islands came completely to an end.

A WASHING OF DIRTY LINEN.

But the book is full of interesting matter. Some of it is commendable, some is open to criticism; there is much fact, much fancy; there is much unassailable statement of fact, much casuistry. On the whole it is an apology, a party document, a washing of dirty linen. Whom he loves, he adulates; whom he hates, he lashes. Many excellent men who have done great work in the Philippines he ignores. Toward the end of his book he lays an excellent basis for exploitation; he appeals to our cupidity; he shows the wealth and strategic importance of the Philippines Having demonstrated to his own satisfaction that they can not and will not develop and utilize, we must. It is a simple and easy argument. We must use the Filipino to develop the Philippines for us. He will work under direction, not alone. "We soon discovered that by picking fairly strong men and feeding them plenty of meat we could make them able and willing to do it"—i. e., work. Keep at it! There are millions there for us, if only we can make them do the heavy work. Worcester's book will make a capital promoter's handbook for an exploitation company.

Of course, we can never fit the Filipino for independence and self-government He must fit himself. We shall never make him into a white man like ourselves—not in a thousand years. Why should we try to do so? He is best to be what nature made him capable of becoming. When we withdraw—but, alas, we are unlikely to withdraw—he will not maintain what we have developed. He ought not to do so; he should not try. Our model government there is a misfit. Filipinos can develop a fitter one. Judged by our standards, it will no doubt be inferior. But they ought to have a chance, and very soon. Many competent judges believe they are less fit for self-government to-day than when we took them over. Some believe that every year we stay they become less fit. We should leave—the sooner the better.

Mr. FESS rose and was recognized.

Mr. JONES. I ask unanimous consent that debate upon this paragraph and all amendments thereto be closed in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] asks unanimous consent that the debate upon this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLER. Reserving the right to object, may I inquire if it is the intention to use that 10 minutes on the other side?

Mr. JONES. That matter is in the hands of the Chair. I suppose he will divide it equally between the two sides.

Mr. MILLER. That side has already had 15 minutes and this side 5.

Mr. JONES. Oh, no; the time of the gentleman from Ohio was certainly extended 5 minutes, making at least 10 minutes. Does the gentleman want to discuss this?

Mr. MILLER. I do not know, but I think 10 minutes will be a little short. Suppose the gentleman makes it 15.

Mr. JONES. Very well, let us make it 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that at the end of 15 minutes debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto be closed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, this question was up before, and it went over this country like a forest fire; and when the present Commissioner from the Philippines put himself on record as to whether there was any slavery or involuntary servitude in those islands he did it in a letter that he wrote to the editor of the Boston Herald June 24, 1912. That letter is in print and is before me. In that letter he said:

Do we have slavery and compulsory service in the Philippines or not? If we do not, the bill to abolish it is unnecessary. If we do, it is also unnecessary, because the act passed by Congress creating the present Philippine Government, which serves as our Constitution, already prohibits slavery and compulsory service, and therefore no act of the Philippine Legislature is needed to declare it illegal.

Mark those words—

And therefore no act of the Philippine Legislature is needed to declare it illegal.

Now he comes upon the floor and makes the statement that the present legislature has pronounced it illegal in order to make the constitutional provision here effective. When he claimed that it was not necessary two years ago, he proceeded to say:

If there is slavery and compulsory service in the Philippines, the Governor General, as the chief executive, and the members of the Philippine Commission, who, with the Governor General, compose the executive department of the islands, are all of them guilty in not enforcing and executing the constitution of the archipelago.

And he repeats that upon this floor to-day, when the facts which I will print show that there was slavery in the sections over which the commission had no control and Secretary Worcester had no control, but which were under the Philippine Assembly. When he says that the Philippine Assembly did not act, he says it did not act because it was unnecessary for it to act. That is a confusion of terms, and that calls attention to the proposition that I submitted to my friend from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] a while ago, namely, that the constitutional provision is a dead letter unless the power to enact it into law will act; and if it does act it may repeal the very thing that it has made into law. Then, in another place, the Commissioner from the Philippines [Mr. QUEZON] says:

The passage by the Philippine Commission of the antislavery bill placed the Philippine Assembly in a very awkward position (as it was perhaps intended to do); to concur in the passage of the bill was to admit that there is such a thing as slavery and compulsory service in the Philippines, which is not a fact.

He says:

To reject the bill would be construed as indicating that the members of the assembly were advocates of slavery. The moral courage of our assemblymen was shown when they took the former course—that of truth. The members of the commission denounce the attitude of their colegislators as proof of lack of sympathy for the masses of the people.

Now, Mr. Chairman, he said in this letter that there was no such thing as slavery there. I do not think he denies it now on this floor, from what he just said; but he regrets that a member of this committee raised one of the serious questions pertaining to the Philippine Islands, a subject of our legislation. This information which I will print comes from sources that ought to invoke respect, and I leave it to say whether it is just Dean Worcester or whether it comes from officials throughout the islands, including Filipinos as well as Americans. [Applause.]

I here wish to insert a report made by Dean C. Worcester, secretary of the interior, submitted June 30, 1913.

APPENDIX.

NO. 8. AN ACT DEFINING THE CRIMES OF SLAVE HOLDING AND SLAVE HUNTING, AND PRESCRIBING THE PUNISHMENT THEREFOR.

[As amended and approved by the Philippine Commission November 2, 1903.]

By authority of the Philippine Commission, be it enacted by the Legislative Council of the Moro Province, That every person who buys, holds, sells, or otherwise disposes of any person as a slave, or who directly or indirectly causes any person to be held in involuntary servitude, except as provided by law, is guilty of slave holding, and upon conviction shall be imprisoned not more than 20 years and be fined not more than ₱10,000 Philippine currency.

SEC. 2. Every person who buys, captures, abducts, or receives any person with intent to sell or otherwise dispose of such person as a slave, or to cause such person to enter into involuntary servitude, or who knowingly aids or abets the recapture or detention of any person escaped from slavery for the purpose of returning such person to a condition of slavery or involuntary servitude, or who knowingly owns or is employed upon or has any interest in any vessel used or employed in the transportation of any person for the purpose of causing such person to enter into slavery or involuntary servitude in the Moro Province or elsewhere is guilty of slave hunting, and upon conviction shall be imprisoned for not more than 20 years and be fined not more than ₱10,000 Philippine currency.

SEC. 3. Any vessel employed with the knowledge and consent of the owner in the transportation of any person from or into the Moro Province, or within the limits of the same, for the purpose of disposing of such person as a slave or of causing such person to enter into involuntary servitude in the Moro Province or elsewhere, and any property, shelter, subsistence, arms, animals, or equipments employed with the knowledge and consent of the owner in the trafficking in, hunting, capturing, or recapturing slaves, shall be subject to confiscation, and upon due proof before the proper court and after due sentence shall be sold at public auction. The proceeds of such sale constitute a part of the funds of the Moro Province

SEC. 4. Nothing in this act shall be construed as countenancing or recognizing the legality of slavery or involuntary servitude as heretofore existing in the Moro Province, or as exempting or excusing any person who may have heretofore committed any of the acts defined and punished in this act as slave holding or slave hunting from prosecution and punishment under the laws of the Philippine Islands.

SEC. 5. Subject to annulment or amendment by the Philippine Commission, this act shall take effect on its passage.

Enacted September 24, 1903.

TYPICAL CASES OF VIOLATION OF THE MORO PROVINCE ANTISLAVERY LAW FROM THE COURT RECORDS OF SAID PROVINCE.

On April 19, 1904, the Moro Alan was convicted of having violated the antislavery law by sequestering a Moro girl named Cabala in order to make a slave of her and was sentenced to 12 years' imprisonment. (Criminal case No. 31, district of Zamboanga.) A fine of ₱500 was imposed on this man, while the Moros Milajan and Tangigi were sentenced to 10 years' imprisonment and a fine of ₱100 each.

On September 7, 1904, a Bagobo named Obo was convicted of having violated the antislavery law by purchasing, possessing, and disposing of one Dumancal as a slave. (Criminal case No. 40, district of Davao.)

On November 7, 1904, a Moro man named Batu was convicted of having violated the antislavery law by capturing and carrying away a Moro woman named Lalia with the intention of selling her as a slave, which he later actually did. (Criminal case No. 28, district of Sulu.)

On March 25, 1905, a Moro man named Javing was convicted of having violated the antislavery law by holding as a slave a Moro man named Tutu, his wife, called Patima, and his four children, called Napala, Daulan, Adajali, and Malija. (Criminal case No. 78, district of Zamboanga.)

On March 8, 1905, a Moro man named Valentin was convicted of having violated the antislavery law by holding a girl called Dugunayan as a slave. (Criminal case No. 49, district of Davao.)

On November 22, 1905, a Moro man named Hadjee Asmail was convicted of having violated the antislavery law by taking three Moros and capturing a Moro woman named Incung, who was held, to be sold as a slave. (Criminal case No. 26, district of Sulu.)

On August 9, 1906, a Moro named Ampan was convicted of violating the antislavery law by capturing a Moro man named Tagusú and holding him as a slave. (Criminal case No. 107, district of Lanao.)

On August 8 1906, two Moros named Magumpara and Magaling were convicted of having violated the antislavery law by capturing as slaves Gamba and Tabilaran. (Criminal case No. 106, district of Lanao.)

On August 7, 1906, a Moro man named Campung was convicted of having violated the antislavery law by selling as a slave a Moro woman named Bacudi. (Criminal case No 104, district of Lanao.)

On August 7, 1906, a Moro named Pasagui was convicted of violating the antislavery act by buying a Moro woman named Abacudi as a slave. (Criminal case No. 105, district of Lanao.)

On August 7, 1906, a Moro chief named Sanco was convicted of violating the antislavery act by buying two Moro men named Sampiri and Siryat as slaves. (Criminal case No. 102, district of Lanao.)

On February 12, 1907, a Moro named Bambang was convicted of violating the antislavery act by capturing two Moros named Garuda and Tabilaman in order to sell them as slaves. (Criminal case No. 120, district of Lanao.)

On August 7, 1907, a Moro named Murodan was convicted of violating the antislavery act by buying a woman named Talama as a slave. (Criminal case No. 71, district of Cotabato.)

On August 7, 1907, three Moros named Guimgbangan, Morega, and Gwam were convicted of violating the antislavery act by selling a Moro woman known as Talama, referred to in the previous case, as a slave. (Criminal case No. 72, district of Cotabato.)

On April 17, 1908, a Moro named Atucan was convicted of violating the antislavery act by selling a woman named Duducan as a slave. (Criminal case No. 8, district of Lanao.)

On August 16, 1907, two Moros named Umpara and Bansil were convicted of violating the antislavery act by selling a Moro named Liba as a slave. (Criminal case No. 133, district of Lanao.)

On August 16, 1907, two Moros named Amay and Saumayang were convicted of violating the antislavery act by selling a Moro named Bansil as a slave. (Criminal case No. 134, district of Lanao.)

On August 19, 1907, a Moro named Macalangut was convicted of violating the antislavery act by buying two Moros named Sandat and Alanga, for whom he paid ₱5. (Criminal case No. 138, district of Lanao.)

In numerous other cases conviction was not secured because of the inability to secure witnesses who would testify to facts which were well known, or because of the sudden and complete disappearance of witnesses with knowledge of the facts who were willing to testify.

REPORT OF SENIOR INSPECTOR SORENSON, PHILIPPINE CONSTABULARY, ON SLAVERY IN THE PROVINCE OF ISABELA.

CONSTABULARY OF ISABELA,
OFFICE OF THE SENIOR INSPECTOR,
Ilagan, Isabela, May 2, 1903.

FIRST DISTRICT CHIEF,
PHILIPPINE CONSTABULARY,
Manila.

SIR: In compliance with telegram of April 28, 1903, from the chief of first district Philippine Constabulary, I have the honor to respectfully submit the following report:

Buying and having slaves has evidently been very common in this valley during Spanish occupation. I am satisfied that, to a large extent, the poorer population in the towns and barrios are the descendants of former slaves bought from Igorrotes or Calingas by the richer Spanish or Ibanag landowners.

The two Christian tribes in this valley are the Ilocanos and the Cagayanes or Ibanags. The former are immigrants from Ilocos Sur and Norte, and they have practically only been here for a generation; they come here as laborers for the tobacco companies and eventually stay and settle here. The latter tribe are the original inhabitants of the valley, but are somewhat indolent, and do not care to work for others.

These two tribes are confined to a very narrow strip of land—in fact, only about 20 miles wide—taking in only river bottom land of the Cagayan River and its tributaries, and their only crop is tobacco, which can not profitably be raised by them on the higher land not inundated during the rainy season. They are also afraid of living in isolated places, as families that have done so are killed by the uncivilized tribes whenever opportunity offers.

The non-Christian tribes living in this valley and surrounding foothills and mountains are the Calingas or Gaddanes, Igorrotes, Negritos, Ilongotes, and Catalanganes. Of these the Igorrotes and Calingas are confirmed head-hunters, and consequently always at odds with their neighbors, even if they belong to the same tribe. The Igorrotes, I think, are the larger tribe—at least, they are more plentiful in this Province—and in appearance and manner very much like the ordinary Filipino, and though they consider a G string to be ample covering for anybody, they otherwise are as far advanced as the barrio Filipino; they have bamboo houses, cooking utensils, same as used by the Filipinos, raise rice and garden truck, have horses and carabao, make baskets and earthenware pots, and, in fact, have all the comforts enjoyed by their Christian brothers.

They live in so-called rancherias, very much resembling a barrio, but generally situated in out-of-the-way places. As they covet the possession of heads, for religious or other reasons, and as these heads are never obtained from their own rancho, they naturally do not live on the best of terms with the outer world.

In making raids on other rancherias for head-hunting purposes some prisoners are generally taken, with the idea, I think, of killing them afterwards, or selling them, as the Igorrotes do not keep slaves. In disposing of their slaves they generally do as follows:

A small number of Igorrotes, generally about four or five, will appear in a town with one, two, or three prisoners, as the case may be, and make known to the people that they wish to dispose of them. They will generally be accompanied by an interpreter, who is often a hunter, who is on good terms with the Igorrotes; he will take them around to the most likely houses in town, and no doubt gets a fee for his trouble.

After some dickering and showing the fine points of their wares, a bargain is struck, cash is handed over, and the Igorrotes depart.

The slave is then put to work in the house, and shortly afterwards baptized, is treated well, learning to speak the prevailing dialect, and no doubt thoroughly appreciates the change.

He is, of course, assigned to the meanest and hardest work, as carrying water and the like, but nevertheless well treated for fear that he should run away, and his only compensation is food and what little clothing he needs. His master will generally see that he gets married in due time, and whenever he thinks he can safely do so, he sends him out to his ranch to work there.

If the slave should wake up to the fact that his services ought to be paid for, and would look for other work, he will find that nobody would employ him, as everybody in town knows that he belongs to his master, and a person doing so would incur the enmity of every slave owner. Consequently, the only method of liberating himself is to run away to some distant place, from where his master would not be likely to get "noticias," or where the practice of owning slaves is not prevailing.

My investigation of this matter has been conducted very quietly, as it would look suspicious in the eyes of the native if I should inquire too deep into the prices paid or personally interview the buyers; I have therefore had a young native to furnish me the following list of persons who have bought slaves during the last year.

The slave owner will make himself believe that he is doing a very commendable thing in rescuing an infidel and having him brought up to become a good Christian; true, also, if carried on for some time the non-Christian will become assimilated and a Christian.

I stated in my telegram that the governor, Señor Dichoso, had recently bought three slaves; this I have not been able to verify; on the list given me he is supposed to have bought only one of a lot of three recently sold here; of the remaining two, one went to his father-in-law, Andres Claraval. The third of this lot I have not been able to trace, as I did not like to show too much zeal in the matter as yet.

Igorrotes sold in Ilagan within last year: To the presidente, Pascual Paguirigan, one boy 12 years old for $130. This boy is doing housework.

To Gabriel Maramag, sheriff of the Province, one girl 12 years old for, he believes, $150. This girl is also doing housework.

To Pedro Gangan, consejal, a woman 25 years old and a man 26 years old for $145. They both do housework.

To Desiderio Camarao, a merchant doing business in this valley with house in Aparri, boy and girl about 10 years old for $250. These children are working in house in Aparri.

To Luis Futad, owner of a billiard hall here, a boy 8 years old for $115. This boy is doing housework.

To Blas Padagas, an Ilocano consejal, a boy about 10 years old for $150. This boy does housework.

Blas Padagas also bought another boy at about 10 years of age and sold him afterwards to Irineo Comaseng, manager of cooperative store in Ilagan, for $180. This boy has been sent to Manila, where he now works for Irineo's sister, living somewhere in Santa Cruz, Manila.

To Juan Paggao, a former consejal, and whose son is now consejal, a man 27 years old for $110. This slave died about two weeks after being purchased.

To Señor Dichoso, governor of Isabela, a boy 14 years old. Have not been able to ascertain the price paid.

To Andres Claraval, father-in-law of Señor Dichoso, a woman 26 years old. Also not able to ascertain price in this case.

Jose Patanag, a boy 10 years old for $170. This boy is working on owner's ranch in barrio Lulutan.

While in Aparri, en route for this station, I saw three young Negritos, two boys and one girl; the boys were about 14 years old and the girl slightly younger. Inquiring, I was told that they belonged to a Chino merchant, who had bought them recently. The boys were working in rear of the Chino's house, facing the river, and engaged in filling in and raising the level of the land with soil obtained in or near the river. The girl was working in the cuisine.

As seen from above list, only the very best or richest class of inhabitants keep slaves; naturally the poorer could not afford to buy them; nevertheless, it is apparently a good investment, as the salaries for field hands are about 4 or 5 pesetas a day, or a certain part of the crop.

The people here, especially the officials, are very bitter against the Calingas, who, they declare, ought to be killed wherever met; this is especially so whenever it is discovered that they have killed Christian Filipinos. It is certainly a very bad state of affairs, considering the impossibility of fastening the guilt of these murders on individual Calingas. They roam over such a large territory that it is impossible to know by which band a certain murder has been committed, and there never are any eyewitnesses to these affairs, as they are always perpetrated on hunters, travelers, or families living on isolated ranchos.

The Calinga, though, is not entirely to blame, as he is treated unjustly, and practically has no standing in their courts; besides, these so-called hunters, in doing so, invade the country of the Calingas and whenever opportunity offers will steal their carabao and horses or kill them, claiming that they thought they were wild carabao and horses. The main trouble is that in revenging himself he does not always get the guilty parties. In order to be more conversant with the Calinga question, and to be able to be on speaking terms with them whenever desirable and to gain their confidence, it is necessary that we be supplied with about 20 more good horses. I believe that this Province needs horses more than any on account of this same question. In other Provinces, usually food can be obtained most everywhere, while here it is an impossibility to obtain anything outside of the towns or barrios.

A peculiar fact connected with the selling of slaves is that an Igorrote never sells Calingas as slaves, or vice versa, which no doubt shows that they do not show each other mercy, but that if prisoners are taken they are invariably killed.

A Tagalo by the name of Cosme Ferrer, living in this town, and a hunter at odd times, has acted as go-between in the selling of slaves at various times, and I am assured that if any Filipino should want to invest in a slave this man could arrange to have a lot brought in here for selection.

Very respectfully,

A. O. SORENSON,
Captain and Senior Inspector, Isabela Province.

DECISION OF THE COURT OF FIRST INSTANCE IN THE TOMÁS CABANAG CASE.

In the court of first instance in and for the Province of Nueva Vizcaya, mountain judicial district.

Los Estados Unidos contra Tomás Cabanag. Criminal case No. 32, for detention illegal.

OPINION AND JUDGMENT.

The above-entitled cause, submitted on January 10, 1906, and by the court taken under advisement, presents another and still different phase of the traffic in human beings from any and all others that have been tried and disposed of by the court at this term, viz, the occupation of an agent or factor from the intelligent and educated natives who buy in Nueva Vizcaya to sell at a profit or advance in Isabela. The accused has been ably defended and the evidence is in conflict upon some material points, and it is only by the most careful consideration and observation of the nature, interest, and manner of the witnesses while testifying that the real and true facts as established by such evidence is made clear and apparent.

Without entering into a discussion or explanation of the nature, interest, and manner of witnesses, this court now finds the following facts established by the evidence beyond all reasonable doubt:

Tomás Cabanag, the accused, was and is an intelligent and well-known citizen and resident of Cauayan, in the Province of Isabela, and also has a house in Solano, in the Province of Nueva Vizcaya, where his relatives (sister) live and where he is accustomed to stop on his visits to said pueblo.

On or about the 30th of April, 1905, the accused, being in Solano aforesaid, made and entered into a contract with the Igorrote woman, Antonia Malanta, a so-called Christian Igorrote, from the rancheria of Quiangan, in said Province of Nueva Vizcaya, for the purchase of the Igorrote child, Jimaya, age about 13 years, and a native of the rancheria of Anao, in said Province, agreeing to pay the said Antonia Malanta the sum of ₱100 and with the purpose and object of taking said child, Jimaya, to the Province of Isabela and there selling her into slavery.

This contract for the transfer of the possession of said child was made without any inquiry whatever as to the parentage or guardianship of said child or the right of the said Igorrote Antonia Malanta to have such child in her possession or under her control, for while the said Antonia at first declared that Jimaya was her daughter the subsequent conversation clearly demonstrated that such was not the fact and that such was well known and understood by the said accused.

This contract for the transfer was consummated the following morning, and the money was paid by the accused to Antonia and the child was delivered to the accused and his sister at their house in said pueblo of Solano.

The child, Jimaya, had been forcibly taken from the possession of her grandmother, Oltagon, in the rancheria of Anao by one Buyag, an Igorrote of said rancheria, and against the will and protest of both the child and her grandmother, who, in the absence of the parents of said child, was then exercising a lawful and proper guardianship of the said child, and when so taken and abducted was delivered to Eusebio, brother of Antonia, and by said Buyag and Eusebio delivered to said Antonia for sale. Buyag, a prisoner in jail here for said offense, was produced as a witness by the accused and testified that the child's father was dead and that the child was taken from the possession of Dudduli, the child's mother, from whom he, in company with another Igorrote, bought the child in payment of the debts of the deceased father. This claim is not established by the evidence and is inconsistent with the other evidence, which establishes the fact that the child, Jimaya, was an orphan and when abducted and seized by Buyag was and had been for a considerable time in the house and under the control of the maternal grandmother, Oltagon, and against whom as well as the child force and threats were used at the time of the abduction and seizure as hereinbefore found and set forth.

This feature of the seizure and abduction, the parentage of the child, and the alleged sale as advanced by the accused on his trial in this court, it is clearly shown, were matters of subsequent information, and that he made no inquiries from the woman, Antonia, to ascertain whether the parents were living or the circumstances or conditions under which the child came into her possession or was held by her for sale. The child was held in his possession in Solano, and in a day or two thereafter, upon a false and untrue statement to the child that he was going to take her back to her rancheria, he did as a matter of fact take the child weeping and crying and with such degree of force as was sufficient to intimidate said child and against her will carried her on horseback, accompanied by his sister, to his residence in Cauayan, in the Province of Isabela, and with the object and purpose of selling the child there into human slavery, which object and purpose was effected within two or three days to one Mariano Lopez, where the child was used and employed in the manufacture of cigars, being beaten and intimidated by the wife of the said Mariano Lopez, and from whence she was rescued and returned to Nueva Vizcaya by the constabulary of said Province.

However much may be said in extenuation of the alleged custom among the ignorant Igorrotes of seizing and abducting children for sale as even of the voluntary sale by Igorrotes of their children, there is nothing in all this to palliate or extenuate the conduct of the accused in this case.

The Congress of the United States has declared that human slavery shall not exist in these islands, and while no law, so far as I can discover, has yet been passed either defining slavery in these islands or affixing a punishment for those who engage in this inhuman practice as dealers, buyers, sellers, or derivers, the facts established in this case show conclusively that the child, Jimaya, was by the defendant forcibly and by fraud, deceit, and threats unlawfully deprived of her liberty, and that his object and purpose was an unlawful and illegal one, to wit, the sale of the child for money into human slavery. This constitutes the crime of detención ilegal defined and penalized by article 481 of the Penal Code, and this court finds the defendant guilty as charged in the information.

There are neither extenuating nor aggravating circumstances found in the case.

The court therefore sentences the accused, Tomás Cabanag, to eight years and one day of prisión mayor and to pay the costs of this instance with the accessories of the law.

Done in open court at Bayombong, in the Province of Nueva Vizcaya, P. I., this 16th day of January, 1906.

CHARLES H. BURRITT,
Judge, Mountain Judicial District.

Decision of the Supreme Court of the Philippine Islands in the Tomás Cabanag case.

[No. 3241. Mar. 16, 1907.]

The United States, plaintiff and appellee, v. Tomás Cabanag, defendant and appellant.

1. Illegal detention: The crime of illegal detention implies actual confinement or restraint of the person.

2. Coercion: Violence through force or intimidation is a necessary element of the crime of coacción.

3. Minors: The mere custody and disposal by a stranger of a minor over 7 years of age, with or without the consent of the parent or guardian, is not in itself a crime.

4. Slavery: The practice of certain tribes of the Igorrotes, so far as proved in this case, termed by them the buying and selling of children, does not necessarily constitute slavery or involuntary servitude. There is at present no law punishing slaveholding as a crime.

5. Id.; Involuntary servitude; Constitutional provisions: The constitutional provision of the Philippine bill that "neither slavery nor involuntary servitude * * * shall exist in these islands," while operating to nullify any agreement in contravention of it, requires supletory legislation to give it effect criminally.

Appeal from a judgment of the court of first instance of Nueva Vizcaya.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

J. F. Boomer for appellant.

Attorney General Araneta for appellee.

TRACEY, J.: The accused, an Igorrote, was convicted in the court of first instance of Nueva Vizcaya of the crime of unlawful detention, under article 481 of the Penal Code, which punishes "any private person who shall lock up or detain another or in any way deprive him of his liberty."

An Igorrote orphan girl called Gamaya, 13 years of age, was taken from the possession of her grandmother, Ultagon, in the rancheria of Anao, in the Province of Nueva Vizcaya, by one Buyag, also an Igorrote; whether this was done with or against the will of the grandmother is not altogether clear in the evidence. We accept the version least favorable to the accused—that of the child—who testified that in the daytime Buyag came to the house and took her away, although the grandmother objected, saying, "Do not take off that little girl," but not speaking when she went away. The man brought her to his house, about a half mile distant, where she was not confined, but, on the contrary, was allowed to go back alone to her grandmother, with whom she would spend a little while, returning the same day. She testified that, on last leaving, the grandmother was angry and did not wish her to go, but did not prevent her. According to her recollection she remained with Buyag, in the vicinity of her grandmother's residence, some two or three months.

Buyag testified that more than two years before, in order to help the family after the father's death and for the purpose of keeping the child at home, he had bought her for 3 pigs, 25 hens, 2 measures of rice, and a cloak, worth 2 pigs, from her mother, with whom she remained until the third year, when (her mother presumably having died) she was brought away by one Eusebio, at the instance of himself and another Igorrote named Yog Yog, who had furnished part of the purchase price. Together they instructed Eusebio to sell her for a carabao and ₱50. Eusebio, together with his sister, Antonia, brought her to Quiangan, in the Province of Nueva Vizcaya, and sold her to the accused, Tomás Cabanag, for ₱100.

In respect to this last sale, the stories of Tomás, Antonia, and the girl substantially agree. Cabanag had previously been instructed to buy a girl by one Mariano Lopez, of Cauayan, to whom, after a few days, Gamaya was delivered in return for the price, which appears to have been ₱200. In his hands she remained for about two months, until she was taken away by an officer of constabulary. Afterwards this prosecution was instituted. Although Gamaya made objection to leaving the house of Cabanag, she appears to have gone without actual constraint, and at no time in any of these places was she physically restrained of her liberty; she was not under lock or key or guard, went into the street to play, returned at will, and was not punished or ill used in any way, but was employed about the household tasks; in short, she appears to have been treated by Mariano Lopez as a household servant and to have been well cared for while in the custody of the accused.

It is proved in the case that it is an Igorrote custom to dispose of children to pay the debts of their fathers, the transaction in the native language being termed a sale, and the defendant appears to have engaged in the business of buying in Nueva Vizcaya children to sell in the lowlands of Isabela.

In his sentence the judge below said:

"However much may be said in extenuation of the alleged custom among the ignorant Igorrotes of seizing and abducting children for sale and even in selling their own children voluntarily, there is nothing in all this to palliate or extenuate the conduct of the accused in this case.

"The Congress of the United States has declared that human slavery shall not exist in these islands, and while no law, so far as I can discover, has yet been passed either defining slavery in these islands or fixing a punishment for those who engage in this inhuman practice as dealers, buyers, sellers, or derivers, the facts established in this case show conclusively that the child Gamaya was by the defendant forcibly and by fraud, deceit, and threats unlawfully deprived of her liberty, and that his object and purpose was an unlawful and illegal one, to wit, the sale of the child for money into human slavery. This constitutes the crime of detención ilegal, defined and penalized by article 481 of the Penal Code, and this court finds the defendant guilty as charged in the information.

"There are neither extenuating nor aggravating circumstances found in the case.

"The court therefore sentences the accused, Tomás Cabanag, to eight years and one day of prisión mayor and to pay the costs of this instance with the accessories of the law."

This sentence can not be sustained. There can be no unlawful detention under article 481 of the Penal Code without confinement or restraint of person, such as did not exist in the present case. (U. S. v. Herrera, Mar. 28, 1904, 3 Phil. Rep., 515.)

Under the complaint for this crime it is possible to convict for coacción upon proof of the requisites of that offense (U. S. v. Quevengco, 2 Phil. Rep., 412), but among those requisites is that of violence through force or intimidation, even under the liberal rule of our jurisprudence (U. S. v. Quevengco, supra; U. S. v. Vega, 2 Phil. Rep., 167; U. S. v. Ventosa, 6 Phil. Rep., 385, 4 Off. Gaz., 573); consequently the charge of coacción against the accused can not be sustained upon the evidence.

The Penal Code, chapters 2 and 3, title 12, articles 484 to 490, provides punishment for those who carry off children under 7 years of age or those who devote children under 16 years of age to certain hazardous occupations; but none of these articles can apply to the case before us, except article 486, which punishes him who induces a child over 7 years of age to abandon the house of its parent or guardian. Under this article it is possible that, on full proof of the facts, Buyag might be held, but not the accused. It was not the design of the law to prevent parents or grandparents from devoting their children to customary work, nor from receiving compensation for such work in wages or otherwise. Such agreements binding out minors are sanctioned in most countries, usually, however, subject to stipulations for their welfare expressly prescribed by statute. In the absence of proof of what the agreement of the parties or the custom of the people called for in respect of the use, treatment, and care of the child, the term of her service, and her final disposition, and particularly in respect of the maintenance of her relations with her grandmother and the prospect of an ultimate return to her, it is not possible to hold that the arrangement was a criminal or even an illicit one. The name applied to it by the custom of the Igorrotes is not enough to establish that in truth and in effect it was a sale or anything more than a contract for services. While there is much in this practice to condemn, we do not feel it to be our province to strain the law in order to bring this local custom of this mountain people to an end. This condition may present matter for the consideration of the legislature, but not for action by the criminal courts. Not even the abhorrent species of traffic apparently carried on by the accused justifies a sentence not authorized by law.

The judge below quotes the bill of rights of the Philippines contained in the act of Congress of July 1, 1902, declaring that "neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist in said islands." This constitutional provision is self-acting whenever the nature of a case permits, and any law or contract providing for the servitude of a person against his will is forbidden and is void. For two obvious reasons, however, it fails to reach the facts before us:

First. The employment or custody of a minor with the consent or sufferance of the parents or guardian, although against the child's own will, can not be considered involuntary servitude.

Second. We are dealing not with a civil remedy but with a criminal charge, in relation to which the bill of rights defines no crime and provides no punishment. Its effects can not be carried into the realm of criminal law without an act of the legislature.

It is not unnatural that existing penal laws furnish no punishment for involuntary servitude as a specific crime. In the kingdoms of the Spanish Peninsula, even in remote times, slavery appears to have taken but a surface root and to have been speedily cast out, the institution not having been known therein for centuries. It is only in relation to Spain's possessions in the American Indies that we find regulations in respect to slavery. In general, they do not apply in their terms to the Philippine Islands, where the ownership of man by his fellow man, wherever it existed, steadily disappeared as Christianity advanced. Among the savage tribes in remote parts such customs as flourished were not the subject of legislation, but were left to be dealt with by religious and civilizing influences. Such of the Spanish laws as touched the subject were ever humane and radical. In defining slavery, law 1, title 21, of the fourth Partida calls it "a thing against the law of nature"; and rule 2, title 34, of the seventh Partida says: "It is a thing which all men naturally abhor." These were the sentiments of the thirteenth century.

To sum up this case, there is no proof of slavery or even of involuntary servitude, inasmuch as it has not been clearly shown that the child has been disposed of against the will of her grandmother or has been taken altogether out of her control. If the facts in this respect be interpreted otherwise, there is no law applicable here, either of the United States or of the archipelago, punishing slavery as a crime. The child was not physically confined or restrained so as to sustain a conviction for illegal detention, nor are the acts of the accused brought within any of the provisions of the law for the punishment of offenses against minors; consequently the conviction in this case must be reversed, in accordance with the recommendation of the attorney general, with costs de oficio, and the prisoner is acquitted.

After the expiration of 10 days let judgment be entered in accordance herewith, and 10 days thereafter let the case be remanded to the court from whence it came for proper action. So ordered.

Arellano, C. J., Torres, Mapa, Carson, and Willard, J. J., concur.

Defendant acquitted.

ADDITIONAL CASES OF SLAVERY IN ZAMBALES.

[Reported by the Philippine Constabulary.]

Mr. Manuel Millares, San Marcelino, Zambales. One Negrito girl, 10 years of age, named Valeriana. Bought by Mr. Millares from a Negrito father named Eslao, of Mabayto, sitio near San Marcelino, for 30 manojos (bundles) of palay (unhusked rice) per annum. Eslao owes Mr. Millares ₱10, debt contracted two years ago. This debt is not canceled by the payment in palay. The girl has been in the possession of Mr. Millares for three months.

Miss Aureau Magsaysay, San Marcelino, Zambales. Two Negrito girls, of 10 and 12 years, named Donata and Mariana, respectively. Bought by Miss Magsaysay in 1908 from their uncle, named Mariano Bacsamana, of Maguining, sitio of San Marcelino, for rice and clothes for the uncle; amount could not be learned, but the Negrito has received them three times since delivering the children. No money appears to have entered into the transaction.

Carmen Magsaysay, San Antonio, Zambales. One Negrito girl named Rosalina, about 10 years of age. Receives clothes and food in return for services as servant. No parents. Aunt and uncle, named Niquiroc and Sucuban, live in sitio of Marasa, near Botolan, and receive clothes and food when visiting at the house of Carmen Magsaysay.

Mrs. Magdalena de Guzman, Castillejos, Zambales. One Negrito boy of 8 years, named Antonio de Guzman. Bought by Mrs. de Guzman from uncle of boy, Pampalacuan, of Santa Fe, Marcelino, for ₱5 and 5 yards of cloth in 1908. Uncle owed ₱5 to Mrs. de Guzman since 1902 and settled the account by receiving the cloth. When the uncle visits Mrs. de Guzman, he receives food. Boy has no parents.

Mrs. Carlosa Perez, Paliuag, Zambales. One Negrito boy, named Hugo, aged 16. Bought from the boy's aunt, named Petra, by Mr. Patricio Lesaca, now of Botolan, Zambales, for ₱100, about eight years ago; Mr. Lesaca first paid to the aunt ₱35 and subsequently, at different intervals, cloth amounting to ₱65. About two years have elapsed since the last cloth was given to the aunt. Mrs. Perez states that she believes Mr. Lesaca will give the Negrito woman more cloth, if she requests it. The boy has no parents.

ADDITIONAL CASES OF SLAVERY IN THE PROVINCE OF TARLAC.

[Reported by a Filipino Constabulary officer. Note the constantly reiterated claim that these Negritos were given to their owners, baptized, and adopted, or treated as members of the family.]

Tomas Sival, a boy of 5 years. He was presented by his parents in 1912 to Agatan Sival, of Bamban, Tarlac, who had him baptized. He is cared for as an adopted son of Señor Sival, and receives no wage.

Maria, a girl of 8 years. She was presented by her mother, Roberta, and her stepfather, Dumpil, Negritos of the sitio of Mapical, to Leon Sival, of Bamban, Tarlac, in 1907. She is treated as a member of the family and receives no wage.

Maria, a woman of 52 years. Her parents died when she was but a little girl and she was taken care of by a Christian family. In 1896 she entered the service of Catalino Cristobal, of Bamban, Tarlac, to work for her food and clothes. She receives no salary.

Magdalena David, a girl of about 7 years. She was given by her parents to Petronila David, of Bamban, Tarlac, who adopted her as a daughter. She receives no wage.

Lucia de la Cruz, a girl of 15 years. In 1900 her grandfather gave her to Angela de la Cruz, of Bamban, Tarlac, to be adopted. She is furnished food and clothes but no wage. She is godchild of Angela de la Cruz.

Angela Sival, a girl of 13 years. She was presented in 1911 by her parents, names unknown, to Agatan Sival. She is fed and clothed, but receives no wage.

Tuning, a woman of 50 years. She has lived since 1898 with Paulino Vergara, of Bamban, Tarlac, to whom she was sold for ₱25 by one Angelo Megia. She is given her food and clothes and some money occasionally, but receives no regular wage.

Jose, boy, age 7 years. His parents died and his sister, Maria Sival, brought him to the house of Leon Sival at Bamban, Tarlac. He is taken care of by Leon Sival. He is too young to work for wage.

Amado David, a boy of 6 years. He was presented in 1911 by one Ancelma Austria to Geronimo David, both of O'Donnell, Capas, Tarlac, who had him baptized and adopted him. Does not receive regular wage, but he is fed and clothed. No parents or relatives.

Tali, a girl of 15 years of age. She was presented in 1908 by her mother to Pascual Yamson, of O'Donnell, Capas, Tarlac, to be adopted. She receives no regular wage, but food and clothes only.

Pedro David, a man of 28 years. He was presented in 1890 by his father, Francisco, to Catalino Miranda, of O'Donnell, Capas, Tarlac, to be adopted and was baptized. He is fed and clothed as a member of the family, but receives no wage. He has no parents or relatives.

Geraldo David, a man of 25 years. He was presented in 1890 by his father, Francisco, to Catalino Miranda, of O'Donnell, Capas, Tarlac, to be adopted and was baptized. He is fed and clothed as a member of the family, but receives no wage. He has no parents or relatives.

Margarita, a woman of 20 years. Her parents died when she was a little girl and she was brought up by Filipino families. She entered in the service of Saturino Lomboy, of Bamban, Tarlac, in 1905, as servant. She is fed and given her clothes, but receives no regular wage.

Alberto San Miguel, a boy of 6 years. He is godson of Alberto San Miguel, of Bamban, Tarlac, to whom he was presented by his father, Ruglo, and mother, Clara, in 1911 to be baptized and brought up. He is treated as a member of the family and receives no wage.

Diqui, a boy of 16 years. He was presented in 1901 by his uncle Mariano Salazar to one Flaviano, of Bamban, Tarlac, as servant, and receives his food and clothes, but no regular wage.

Enriqueta Miles, a girl of 6 years. She was given by her mother, Maxima, to Mr. Clarence Miles, of Capas, Tarlac, who had her baptized, giving her his name. She is an adopted daughter and receives no wage.

Catalino Pascual, a Negrita girl of 10 years. She was presented in 1908 by her mother to Isabel de Pascual, of O'Donnell, Capas, Tarlac, to be cared for, and was baptized. Receives food and clothing, but no wages.

Urullo, a boy of 12 years. He was given in 1910 by his mother, Magdalena, to Vicente Frias, teacher of Negrito school at Bueno, to study under him. He receives regular wage of 1 oyon of palay per year.

Alejandro Miranda, a man of 34 years. He was bought in 1882 from unknown Negritos of Pinatubu Mountains by Catalino Miranda for ₱30 and was baptized. He receives no regular wage, but gets food and clothing.

Balundoy, a boy of 16 years of age. He was given in 1910 by his father to Juan Supan, of O'Donnell, Capas, Tarlac, as a servant, and receives regular wages of ₱9 per year.

Margarita, a Negrita girl of 15 years. She was presented in March of 1908 by her mother, Romana, to Protacio Santos, of Camiling, Tarlac. She receives ₱1 per month.

Taran, a man of 30 years. He was presented in 1885 by his cousin, Emiterio Galang, to Pedro Nuega, of Moriones, Tarlac, to be adopted. He is a servant and when able to farm was made a tenant. His wage as a servant was 10 capungos of palay per year, and when made a tenant his regular wage is 2 oyones, about ₱24 worth, of palay per year.

Milio, a boy of 8 years. He was presented in 1911 by his mother to Gregorio Tabun, of Moriones, Tarlac, to be adopted and used as a servant. He receives no regular wage, but is fed and clothed.

Petronila, a woman of 35 years. She was found in 1881 loitering near Sula, Tarlac, by Francisco de los Santos, whom she followed and who gave her to Timoteo Suba, of Moriones, Tarlac, with whom she has lived ever since. She works as a servant and is given her food and clothing, but no regular wage.

ADDITIONAL CASES OF SLAVERY IN MANILA (SOME OF THESE NEGRITOS HAVE NOW OBVIOUSLY CEASED TO BE SLAVES.—D. C. W.).

[Reported by the chief of police.]

Luis Zarate, age 6 years, mestizo Negrito. It appears that his father is a Filipino and his mother a Negrita. According to the statement of his present employer, this Negrito was presented to her personally while the boy was yet 2 years old. The name of his present employer is Margarita Guidote, 814 Interior, Calle San Miguel. It is suspected that this Negrito was bought, because of the fact that his employer did not wish to tell the name of the person who gave this boy to her. He receives no wages.

Constancio Sandico, alias Babilito Sandico, age 17 years, genuine Negrito, born in Patling, Tarlac. He has never known his parents. He was in the possession of one Eulalio de Guzman since childhood, and at the age of 3 years was turned over to one Francisco Sandico, 527 Calle Velasquez, with whom he is still living as cochero. He receives no wages.

Manuel Guido, 22 years of age; genuine Negrito, born in Botolan, Zambales. He has never known his parents. Since childhood he was in the possession of one D. Benito Guido, of Botolan, Zambales, who then brought him to Manila at the age of 5 years. This Negrito was presented to the brother of his master, Justo Guido, with whom he is still living as one of the family. Residence, 915 Calle Singalong. He is now a tobacco worker in the Germinal Factory, receives wages, and has ceased to be a slave.

Dorotea Sibog, a Negrita woman 22 years of age; born in Floridablanca, Pampanga. She has never known her parents. At the age of 6 years she was brought to Manila by an insurgent officer and presented to one Benedicto Niedao, 175 Calle Lipa, Sampaloc, with whom she is still living as a servant without pay.

Angela Vega, a Negrita mestiza, 26 years of age, her father being a Negrito and her mother a Visayan. She was born in Albay, where her mother still lives. Her mother told her that a "captain de guardia civil" took her from her mother. She was presented to a Spaniard named Ventura Vega, in Albay. When her master came to Manila he took her with him. She stayed with him until five months prior to the date when she was interviewed, at which time she left him to look for another job with wages.

Casimira Puno, a Negrita woman, 22 years of age. She was born in Palma, Pampanga. She has never known her parents. From the age of 3 to 15 she lived with Eugenio Puno, and then ran away because of ill treatment. She came to Manila alone to seek employment. She worked for one Quicay for four months, then for Luis Zamora for a year. She now lives with Ciriaca Basa as a servant without pay at 305 Calle Peñalosa.

Carman Toledo, a Negrita woman 30 years of age; born in Floridablanca, Pampanga. She came to Manila at the age of 6 years in company with her former "employer," Eulalia Toledo. She now lives with one Elvisa Wolfert as a servant at 302 Calle Lorenzo Chanco, Tondo, Manila. She receives no wages. Mrs. Wolfert took her from a charitable institution.

Vicente Gutierrez, a Negrito man 30 years of age. He has never known who or where his parents or relatives are. At the age of 7 or 8 years he came to Manila in company with a Spaniard. He is at present living with one Mr. Hanna, as a coachman, at 1353 Calle Anloague. He receives no wages, but gets board, lodging, and clothing.

Eusebia Marcelo, a Negrita mestiza girl 14 years of age. She was born in Romblon, Tablas Island, her father being a Negrito and her mother a Visayan. With the consent of her parents she was taken to Manila when 10 years of age by her "employer," Marcelo Lopez, with whom she still lives as a servant at 239 Calle Cabildo, Intramuros, Manila. She receives board, lodging, and clothing but no wages.

ADDITIONAL CASES OF THE ENSLAVING OF IFUGAOS.

[Reported by Lieut. Gov. Jeff D. Gallman.]

About (Ifugaos can give only approximate dates) 1899 a woman 20 years of age, from Mampolla, named Manay, who had been turned over to Bacngango in settlement of a debt, was sold to people of Jocbong, Ifugao, for ₱80.

About 1899 a woman called Gayang, of Jigyon, 20 years of age, was purchased by one Bandao of the same rancheria and was sold in Nueva Vizcaya to an unknown Christian for 3 carabaos.

About 1898 a woman of Bambang called Cuyappi, some 18 years of age, was sold to Don Jacinto Logan, of Solano, Nueva Vizcaya, for ₱100. She continued as Don Jacinto's slave until her death.

About 1899 a 15-year-old girl called Dinaon, of Lingay, Ifugao, was sold to Dalmacio Fernandez, of Pangasinan, who then lived at Solano, Nueva Vizcaya, for ₱100.

About 1900 a 16-year-old girl named Imbajáy, of Cayapa, Lingay, Ifugao, was sold by Mangognope, of Jalong, Lingay, to Maynayno, of Mayoyao, for ₱8. The latter turned her over to Mangjit, of Bunjian, who took her to Isabela and sold her for ₱80. The girl later escaped from her Christian master and now lives in Damag, Ifugao.

In 1899 a girl called Tayaban, 15 years of age, of Dangtalan, Ifugao, was carried by one Pumijic to Dinangan, Mayoyao, Ifugao, for sale. A man named Baynan took her to Isabela and sold her for ₱100.

About 1899 Camjit, of Ajin, Ifugao, sold a woman of some 28 years of age to Tayaban, of Curog, Ifugao, for ₱30. The latter resold her to an unknown Christian of Nueva Vizcaya for two carabaos.

About 1900 Don Sebastian Panganiban, of Solano, Nueva Vizcaya, bought from Balog, of Piuong, Ifugao, a 16-year-old girl named Indungdung for ₱100.

About 1902 Licco, of Curog, took a 15 or 16 year old girl named Oltagon to Isabela and there sold her to an unknown Christian for ₱80. He had paid ₱40 for her. His companion on the trip to Isabela was Liangna, of Bonuitan, Ifugao.

About 1899 a woman named Intanap was sold by Dunnuan, of Cabulo, Magcoc, Ifugao, to Buyao for ₱8. The latter took her to Pingad, Lepanto, and there sold her for ₱80.

About 1903 a 10-year-old girl named Uyame was sold by Gamboc, of Panike, Japao, Ifugao, to a man in Mayoyao for ₱80.

About 1900 a boy named Muntamoc, of Boco, Japao, Ifugao, was in the power of Gulji of Japao, as a slave. He was about 14 years of age. Guiljt sold him to Aliguyon of Bangauan, Ajin District, for ₱60. The latter sold him to Lupal, of Pindungan, Kiangan, for a carabao, and the latter took him to Isabela and there sold him for ₱80.

About 1903, one Pagal-la, a boy of about 17 years of age, of Daligan, Lingay, Ifugao, was sold in Isabela by Malingan for two carabaos. A man named Bayao was the companion of Malingan on the trip to sell this boy.

About 1899 a 25-year-old woman named Bugan, of Cababuyan, was captured by Buyugan and was kept at his house as a slave until the relatives of the woman paid ₱80 for her release.

About 1900 one Pumijic, of the rancheria of Jicot, was captured by Bin-nuj-ji, of Daligan, Lingay, Ifugao, who brought the boy, who was about 10 years of age, to Pindungan, Kiangan, and turned him over to one Gui-na-lut, who took him to Isabela and sold him to Christians for ₱80.

About 1900 a woman called Indungdung, of Namulditan, Ifugao, some 22 years of age, was purchased for ₱60 by Bayung-Abung, of the same rancheria, and turned over to Bulajac, who intended to sell her but was unable to find a purchaser.

About 1900 Inuyao, a boy of Nabalilian, Namulditan, Ifugao, the son of Indongdeng, was purchased by Bayungabung and Ngayajan for ₱40. He was taken to Banaao, Ifugao, and there sold to Silipan Ifugaos for ₱80.

About 1899 a 25-year-old man named Imbangao, of Bangtinon, Curog, was bought by Guim-Mal, of Mampolla, Ifugao, for ₱50, and was resold later in Mayoyao, Ifugao, for ₱80.

About 1900 a 10-year-old boy, Ajuday, of Cababuyan, Ifugao, was purchased by Balinon for ₱30 and resold to Umuniad, of Cutug, Bayombong, Nueva Vizcaya, for ₱100. The latter then sold the boy to Christians of Isabela.

About 1899 a boy of Anao, Ifugao, some 10 years of age, was purchased by Catongyan, of the same place, for ₱30 and later sold to a Christian of Solano, Nueva Vizcaya, for ₱60.

About 1899 an 8-year-old girl named Intanap, daughter of Kiladan, of Nungulunan, was purchased by Cabecilla Dacljon, of Japao, Ifugao, for four hogs, a little palay, some chickens, and some bubud (a fermented drink made from rice.—D. C. W.). This man kept the child in his possession for some months, then sold her to one De los Santos, of Solano, Nueva Vizcaya, for ₱120. She was taken to Solano by Bunol, of Paniki, Japao, Ifugao. Bunol negotiated the sale and received ₱10 for his trouble.

About 1898 a 7-year-old girl called Bugan, of Tabag, Japao, Ifugao, daughter of Bayangog, of the same place, was bought by Daclijon and Bunadon, of Duyung, Japao, for four hogs, some chickens, and a few unimportant articles. Bunol, of Paniki, Japao, Ifugao, took the contract to sell the child to Christians of Nueva Vizcaya. With a companion named Wilan, he took the child to Bagabag and sold her to Don Domingo Busa for ₱120. The two agents received ₱10 each for their trouble, and ₱100 was turned over to Daclijon and Bunadon, who divided the money equally.

About 1899 an 8-year-old boy named Batangog, son of Cobagob, of Lubuung, Banaue, was bought by Nabokiag, of Paniki, Japao District, for four hogs and a number of chickens. Two agents named Bunol and Ananayu brought the child to Kiangan and sold him to Paticual, of Pindungan, for ₱100, receiving ₱10 each for their trouble.

Abount 1898 a small boy named Pidlo, of Dayandi, Japao District, was sold by his own father to Yagyag, a wealthy man of Japao District. When the boy had reached the age of about 9 years he was sent to Loo, Benguet, where he was sold for four carabaos. Yagyag paid the father of the boy four hogs, some palay, and a few chickens.

About 1899 a boy named Baguiuan, of Dayandi, Japao, was sold by his father, Yuya, to Duyapat, of Japao, for four hogs, some chickens, palay, and a few jars of bubud. The boy was taken to Loo, Benguet, by Angayan and Pugnuon, of Japao District, and sold there for four carabaos.

About 1899 a 9-year-old boy named Kimmuliap, son of Nangili, of Dayandi, Japao, was sold by his father to Acol of the same rancheria for four hogs, some chickens, palay, and bubud. The boy was later taken to Cervantes by Jabbiling, of Japao, and there sold to a Filipino of Kabayan, or Baguio, for 2 Igorot blankets, 2 bubud jars, and a small amount of cloth.

A boy called Capnigping, about 9 years old, of Dayandi, Japao District, was sold by his father to Atolba for some palay, bubud, etc. Later Atolba sold the boy to one Pio, of Baguinge, Kiangan, for a Remington rifle and 10 cartridges. Pio resold the child to a Christian of Nueva Vizcaya.

About 1898, one Nganjena, a boy about 12 years old, son of Ingulon, of Japao District, was stolen by Mundiguin, of Bucyauan, Japao District, and sold to Joggang, of Pindungan, Kiangan, for ₱60. He was later sold to Filipinos in Isabela for ₱100.

About 1898 an 11-year-old boy named Bumangjat, son of Napadauan, of Tabeg, Japao, was sold by his father to Bunnol, of Paniki, Japao, for four hogs, some chickens, etc. Bunnol later sold the boy in Mayoyao for four carabaos.

About 1900 Dango, a boy of some 14 years, son of Jodayan, of Obnag, was purchased by Taguiling, of Cababuyan, for ₱60, and sold to Antonio and Guinalut, of Piuong, for the same sum. The boy was later again sold to a Filipino of Isabela Province.

During 1899 a boy called Batangol, of Cambulo, Ifugao, was taken to Isabela by Binot, of Mayoyao, and Ganachan, of Dammag, and there sold to a Christian Filipino for ₱100.

During 1899 a small girl called Dulimay, of Cambulo, was sold by Binot, of Mayoyao, to a Christian of Aj-jinda, Isabela, for ₱100.

About 1899 a 12 or 13 year old girl of Cababuyan named Intugay was sold by Balogan and Ngongoy, of Cababuyan, to Layangan, of Mayoyao, for ₱80. The latter intended to take the child to Isabela and sell her to Filipinos, but was prevented by the death of the child.

ADDITIONAL CASES OF SLAVERY IN IFUGAO.

[Reported by Lieut. W. E. Dosser, Philippine Constabulary.]

PHILIPPINE CONSTABULARY,
CONSTABULARY OF MOUNTAIN PROVINCE, FIFTH COMPANY,
Mayoyao, Mountain Province, April 6, 1910.

The ADJUTANT,
District of Northern Luzon, San Fernando, Union.

SIR: In reply to communication No. 4027–I, dated March 15, 1910, I have the honor to submit the following report of slave dealing known to me:

All the information obtainable regarding this subject was taken down at the time complaint was made. Cabecilla Eyabon, of Mayoyao, who has had more to do with these dealings than anyone else known to the undersigned, was called up, but nothing more than was already known could be obtained, with the exception of the name of one man in Echague, who is known to be, or has been, a slave dealer.

When these sales were made no questions were asked regarding the name of the buyer, as it was quite immaterial to the Ifugao what the man's name was so long as he received the money.

The only reason these slave-dealing complaints come in is due to the fact that the man who makes the deal usually fails to come up to the contract made with the owner of the person sold.

No settlements on slave dealings have ever been forced at this station; the only action taken has been to get all the information possible regarding the deal, but only in one instance has the undersigned been able to get the name of the buyer, and this has always been one of the principal questions.

None of these deals have ever been made for any specified period of time, but for all time.

The following are the cases known to the undersigned:

About the year 1904 Duagna, cabecilla, of Tuleed, Mountain Province, brought to Mayoyao a man named Im-ma-tan, whom he wanted to sell in Echague. The man was turned over to Cabecilla Eyabon. He was taken to Echague and sold for ₱65, ₱5 of which went to Eyabon as payment for making the deal; the balance, ₱60, went to Duagna.

About the year 1895 Wang-ag, of Malop-pop, Banaue District, Mountain Province, brought to Mayoyao a woman named Bal-o-wag. Eyabon purchased the woman for ₱70. She was taken to Echague to sell, but on account of her age Eyabon was able to procure only ₱70 for her. The woman is now dead.

About the year 1906 Eyabon received from a man (name unknown) of Ca-na-cin, Banaue District, a small boy named Binniajan, for whom he paid ₱70. The boy was taken to Echague and sold for ₱100. The boy is now dead.

About the year 1897, A-ta-ban, of Tuleed, Mountain Province, brought to Mayoyao a man named Cha-log, whom Eyabon purchased for ₱60. This man was taken to Echague and sold to Antonio Mangadan for the sum of ₱70.

About the year 1897 A-ta-ban, of Tuleed, Mountain Province, brought of In-hu-mang, of Ca-na-cin, Banaue District, a small boy, for whom he was to pay ₱70. Thirty pesos was paid down, but Bango died before the balance was paid. The boy was taken to Echague to sell, but died before the sale was made. In-hu-mang also died shortly after this.

About the year 1906 Duagna, cabecilla, of Tuleed, Mountain Province, proposed marriage to a girl who had emigrated from Cambullo, Mountain Province, to Tuleed, with a relative. The girl was willing, but as soon as Duagna got her in his possession, instead of marrying her, he took her to Echague and sold her to the christianos.

No recent sales have been transacted, at least not to the knowledge of the undersigned. In case there has been a recent deal, it is only a question of a short time until it will be known.

Very respectfully,

W. E. DOSSER,
Commanding Company.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee rose.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MCKELLAR). The Chair would like to inquire what the provision is as to the remaining 10 minutes.

Mr. JONES. There is no agreement; it is in the hands of the Chair.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want to try and get through in two minutes. I wish to say that the statements touching the matter of slavery existing in the Philippine Islands did not originate in 1913. I came first to the Fifty-ninth Congress. I had only been here a few weeks when what is known as the Philippine tariff bill came before the House. The "Taft party" had but recently returned from the Philippine Islands. The gentleman from Connecticut, Mr. Hill, in his place in the House, making a speech on the Philippine tariff bill, stated explicitly and plainly that there was slavery existing in a small territory of the Philippine Islands and that it had been found impossible to prevent it. There was then some taking to task of the party to which the gentleman from Ohio belongs because it had failed to stop it; but that is not what I rose to speak about.

I want to call attention to the legal question involved. Lines 22, 23, and 24 of this bill, page 4, read as follows:

That neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist in said islands.

That is the exact language of the thirteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States. That has been passed upon by the Supreme Court of the United States, and the Supreme Court held this:

Peonage is a status or condition of compulsory service based upon the indebtedness of the peon to the master. The service is enforced unless the debt be paid, and however created it is involuntary servitude within the prohibition of the thirteenth amendment to the Federal Constitution.

While the ordinary relations of individuals to individuals are subject to the control of the States and not to that of the General Government, the thirteenth amendment grants to Congress power to enforce the prohibition against involuntary servitude, including peonage, and to punish persons holding another in peonage; and sections 1990 and 5526, Revised Statutes, are valid legislation under such power and operate directly on every person violating their provisions whether in State or Territory and whether there be or not any municipal ordinance or State law sanctioning such holding.

In this opinion of Clyatt against the United States, reported in volume 197, decided at the October term, 1904, there is a quotation from Justice Bradley's opinion in the civil-rights case in the One hundred and ninth United States, page 320, as follows:

This amendment, as well as the fourteenth, is undoubtedly self-executing, without any ancillary legislation, so far as its terms are applicable to any existing state of circumstances. By its own unaided force and effect it abolished slavery and established universal freedom.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. FESS. We have no legislative enactment as to the fourteenth amendment. Is not the fourteenth amendment a dead letter with us without any legislative enactment?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I was not discussing the fourteenth amendment; I was discussing the thirteenth amendment.

Mr. FESS. But the gentleman's quotation mentioned the fourteenth amendment.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I simply was quoting from Justice Bradley's opinion.

Mr. MILLER rose.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, how much time is there remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Five minutes.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I would like to close the discussion on this amendment myself. I will ask unanimous consent that the general time be extended five minutes, and that the gentleman from Minnesota may have five and I have five.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANTOR. Mr. Chairman, can we have the amendment reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, at the end of line 3, strike out the period and insert a comma and add the following: "or held in satisfaction of the same any involuntary servitude by his creditor."

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, without any disposition or intent to enter into a thorough discussion of slavery and peonage in the Philippine Islands, there are one or two things I would like to state to the committee. The first is that I appreciate the sensitiveness on the part of the Filipino people in facing the charge that slavery and peonage exist in the islands. However, I do not quite appreciate the extreme sensitiveness which they do unquestionably feel. There is peonage in the Philippine Islands, of course; there is slavery, as such purely, in some cases in the Philippine Islands. That is no charge against the general Filipino people. There is peonage in the United States to-day in a great many States, if we can believe the reports of the commission and if we can believe the evidence submitted in courts. That is no charge against the people of the United States.

Mr. QUEZON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. QUEZON. Is not the gentleman's theory that it has been charged against the Filipino people at large, because the assembly did not pass this law, that they were therefore in favor of slavery?

Mr. MILLER. I do not know whether the members were for or against it; I have no way of knowing. The gentleman is advised and has made his statement. That may have been the accusation on the part of some, but certainly I never made it myself.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Is it not a fact that the statement was made by the commissioners that they did not pass the law because that would say that they recognized it?

Mr. QUEZON. I do not want to be misquoted, Mr. Chairman. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. MILLER. If the gentleman will make it brief, for my time is short.

Mr. QUEZON. They did not pass the law because they were told that there was already enough law in the Philippine Islands to punish slavery.

Mr. MILLER. Unquestionably the people of the South, and wherever the institution occurs in the United States, who are engaged in peonage are for it and against any law to prohibit it; but that is no accusation against the people generally.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman does a great injustice to the South when he makes that statement.

Mr. MILLER. If the gentleman will hear me through, I think he will find no fault. If there are any individuals engaged in the business, they are for it; but that is no indictment against the people of the United States, for they are against it.

The institution of slavery as such does exist in the islands, and I am not able to agree with my friend Mr. QUEZON in that respect, although it must be said that where slavery as such exists it is extraordinarily rare in the Christian countries, in the well-settled regions. The whole Moro Nation is builded and founded upon the system of slavery. It is an integral part of their social and industrial life, against which we have been battling, and with some considerable success, from the time that we first started in. That battle is going on, and the institution will be eliminated. Slavery to-day exists in some of the semi-Christian regions contiguous to wild territory. For instance, until recently there has been a public and open and notorious traffic in the buying of Ifugao boys, taking them down into Nueva Vizcaya and absolutely selling them. The Filipino people do not indorse that, but the people who there are engaged in the business do, and, of course, they have been endeavoring to prevent legislation to prohibit it. What is true there is true in many other localities, but please do not misunderstand me when I say that speaking of slavery as such it is restricted to these spots. Peonage does exist to quite a considerable extent throughout the islands, and it is to the entire credit of the Filipino Assembly and to the Filipino people that now they have enacted legislation to abolish it; but it must be borne in mind, Mr. Chairman, that while there has been a law prohibiting this, there has been no penalty; and the judges in the islands tell me—Filipino judges as well as American—that the law against slavery and peonage has been a dead letter practically in most cases because of a lack of penalty. That deficiency has since been corrected.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I am very sorry that this question of slavery and peonage in the Philippine Islands has been injected into this discussion. I can recall many years ago when gentlemen on this floor assailed President McKinley because he had approved what was called the Bates treaty, which recognized all the existing institutions of the Moros, including those of polygamy and slavery. I have heard President McKinley denounced here and elsewhere for having given his assent and approval to that treaty. From that time to the present the question of slavery in the Philippines has been more or less agitated, but the gentleman who has been quoted by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], Mr. Worcester, has done more to inflame the public mind on this subject than all others put together, and I regret that the gentleman from Ohio should have quoted from the writings of one who has for years been engaged in active controversy over this subject with the War Department, the Philippine Assembly, the Filipino people, and all the rest of mankind who did not accept his contention that slavery was practiced in the civilized and Christianized portions of the Philippines, and that there were no adequate laws to prevent it. Mr. Worcester devotes much space to this subject in a book which he has recently published, a book which he wishes to be seriously accepted as a true history of the Philippine Islands and their people. In it he goes so far as to seriously reflect upon everybody who does not agree with him. It is impossible to read what the author of this book says upon the subject of slavery in the Philippines and escape the conviction that he is a biased and most prejudiced witness, and not the impartial historian he professes to be. It is from this book that the gentleman from Ohio has read, and he tells us that he shall insert more of the same stuff in the RECORD. The position which I take in regard to this proposed amendment is precisely that taken by my colleague [Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee]. I hold that slavery and peonage is now prohibited in the organic law of the islands, which is copied in this bill, and which reads as follows:

That neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist in said islands.

This language covers the proposition embodied in the gentleman's amendment.

The Supreme Court of the United States has decided, too, that the thirteenth amendment is self-executing.

The gentleman did not read the decision of the Supreme Court of the Philippine Islands referred to by him. Judge Tracey, of New York, at that time a member of the Supreme Court of the Philippine Islands, wrote the opinion in that case. It was his opinion that the laws of the Philippines were entirely adequate to punish peonage and slavery. Nevertheless, as has been said, the Philippine Legislature at its last session passed additional and also more stringent legislation upon this subject. I have not the time to go into the history of the subject, but it is true, as the gentleman from the Philippine Islands [Mr. QUEZON] has said, that the Philippine Commission for seven long years was the sole legislative body in the Philippines and that Mr. Worcester was a member of it. It is also true that he held the portfolio of secretary of the interior, which department had jurisdiction and control over all the wild or uncivilized tribes. During all that period it would seem that he either did not discover that slavery existed in the islands or that, if he did, he took no steps, either as a legislator or as an executive officer, to suppress it. It was only after the legislature was created that Mr. Worcester proposed to enact laws to suppress slavery. The assembly declined to concur in the Worcester legislation, because its members were not willing to admit that the then existing laws were not wholly adequate. They had been held to be adequate, as I have stated, by the Supreme Court of the Philippines. It is true, as I have also stated, that the last legislature passed additional law upon this subject, but, as gentlemen on that side of the aisle know, the threat was made at the other end of this Capitol Building that unless some such legislation were enacted the members of the Philippine Commission appointed by President Wilson would fail of confirmation. A Senator of the United States was authority for that statement, and so the legislature at its last session, although it did not concede that additional legislation was necessary in order for the courts to stamp out peonage and slavery, passed a measure upon the subject. And I may add that the members of the Philippine Assembly have always been as much opposed to human slavery as Mr. Worcester ever professed to be.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FESS) there were—yeas 19, noes 40.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

That no law granting a title of nobility shall be enacted, and no person holding any office of profit or trust in said islands shall, without the consent of the Congress of the United States, accept any present, emolument, office, or title of any kind whatever from any king, queen, prince, or foreign State.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Is this provision about accepting presents from foreign countries in the language of our Constitution?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, it is in the language of the present organic law of the Philippine Islands.

Mr. MANN. Very well.

The Clerk read as follows:

That excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishment inflicted.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to a paragraph to offer an amendment. I overlooked the reading of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to return to a paragraph which has been passed for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, what is the amendment?

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the Clerk to report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 11, strike out the period after the word "enacted" and insert a semicolon and add the following: "nor shall the law of primogeniture ever be in force in the Philippines."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, if we return to that, how much debate will there be upon it?

Mr. JONES. So far as I am concerned, I have no objection to the amendment. I do not know that any other gentleman has.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to return to a paragraph which has been passed for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, I now offer the amendment which has been reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

That no person shall be imprisoned for debt.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I suppose one should not express surprise that the amendment which I offered awhile ago was not adopted, because evidently the committee does not want any modification of the bill. I express the regret, however, that at least that modification was not made. My good friend, the chairman of the committee, for whom I have a very high regard, has questioned the importance of the report made by Dean Worcester. I do not refer to the two-volume edition that he has written, but I refer to the official report he made on this particular question in the islands. I have gone over that report to ascertain who were cited as witnesses, and I am going to read those now. Those reports came from Army officers, constabulary officers, the chief of police of Manila, together with other officers, such as his deputies; also judges, Catholic priests, the mother superior of a convent, the insular auditor, and many of his deputies, provisional governors, both Filipino and American; provisional treasurers, the director of education in the islands, school-teachers, at least one ethnologist, newspaper men, business men, and women of standing, and so forth. Now, it seems to me if I were in the islands trying to get at these facts I could not go to any sources that would be more unprejudiced for information than these, and I think that the majority of the committee is too sensitive in reference to taking the facts from Dean Worcester. Evidently he knows too much to be pleasant to those who are resisting these modifications that I think ought to be made.

Now, Mr. Chairman, again I want to say that the conflict that we will see on this legislation grows out of the fact that here is a body that gives a constitutional sanction for legislation and there is a body that acts if it wants to or refuses to act if it wants to, and that is inevitable by this legislation; and if we do not affix some enacting clause in what we do, it will be a dead letter unless the people over there see fit to do it. I called attention a moment ago to the fourteenth amendment; that because we refused to pass any law enacting the provisions of the amendment it is, as everybody knows, a perfectly dead letter and means nothing at all, and what is seen here in that relation will be seen in the Philippines, I fear. I think this bill is tending in the right direction. First, we had a military government over there with all the power in the military authorities. Then we created a civil commission and made it first all American and then partly American and finally Filipino, and now the commission has become entirely under the islands in the majority—I mean not entirely in personality, but in control by a Filipino commission. If this bill shall be carried, the commission will become an elective upper house. I am not sure but what it is just what ought to have been done. First, a military step, then a civil commission composed partly of Americans and partly of Filipinos, then a commission under the control of the Filipinos, then this commission ceasing to exist and becoming an elective senate. I think that is right, but here is what I call attention to: Are you not traveling more rapidly than conditions would warrant in the face of the situation that certainly is apparent? We tie our hands absolutely in getting what we think ought to be done over there. That is the only point I have brought out, and I do not want to interfere whatever with the legislation that is going on outside of the preamble. I am opposed to that; I am much opposed to it; but the other provisions of the bill, it seems to me, are very much justified if we do not go too fast, and I hope the chairman of the committee will not impugn my motives or impute to me motives of dissension when I call the attention of the House to these facts that I think the country ought to know about. I think the chairman feels——

Mr. JONES. If the gentleman will permit, I simply want to assure the gentleman that I certainly had no intention of impugning the gentleman's motives, and I disclaim any such idea.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Before taking my seat I shall offer an amendment, by way of substitute, for the paragraph before us. This paragraph—lines 22, 23, and 24, page 4—is an exact copy of the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and presumably, therefore, I suppose is considered beyond criticism. And yet, with all respect for the distinguished men who drew the thirteenth amendment, I have always thought that it is very unfortunately worded and punctuated. That amendment to the Constitution was adopted to prohibit slavery in the United States. But the fact is that, as worded and punctuated, the thirteenth amendment does not prohibit slavery in the United States, but expressly authorizes it as a punishment for crime. That is a good deal to say, but it is plainly the truth. I invite attention to the language and punctuation of the thirteenth amendment as found in the House Manual:

Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

Observe that the commas are after the words "servitude" and "convicted." As thus worded and punctuated, that amendment simply declares that neither slavery nor involuntary servitude shall exist except as a punishment for crime.

The paragraph—lines 22, 23, and 24, page 4—under consideration reads as follows:

That neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist in said islands.

Again observe the comma after "servitude" and after "convicted." The paragraph merely provides that neither slavery nor involuntary servitude shall exist in the islands, except as a punishment for crime, and that, of course, means that either slavery or involuntary servitude may exist there as a punishment for crime.

To carry out the clear intent of Congress the paragraph should be worded in this way:

That slavery shall not exist in said islands; nor shall involuntary servitude exist therein except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted.

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment, and offer as a substitute the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of lines 22, 23, and 24, on page 4, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That slavery shall not exist in said islands; nor shall involuntary servitude exist therein except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted."

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to support the amendment. I ask the chairman and Members on that side if it would not be better and safer to accept the amendment than to retain the language of the bill?

As has been well said by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], the language taken from the United States Constitution is unfortunate to use in this particular case because of existing conditions in the islands. Under this provision as it now stands, there can be actual slavery inflicted as a punishment for crime. This we do not desire and should carefully guard against. We know that even in the United States we have had difficulty in managing the matter. In the islands thousands of the natives, as yet savage and uncivilized, live in close juxtaposition to those intelligent and fully civilized. It will be wise if we shall carefully guard against any temptation to make subject the weaker by the stronger race. It will be a great temptation. Why should we subject them to that temptation? Let us make clear what we desire to do, and that is to absolutely prohibit slavery under any circumstances and against any sort of involuntary servitude unless it shall be as a punishment for crime.

Mr. JONES. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. I yield.

Mr. JONES. The Constitution of the United States evidently makes no distinction between slavery and involuntary servitude. This proposed amendment does make a distinction. Now, I imagine this language has been construed by the courts many, many times. I would like to ask the gentleman who offered the amendment and the gentleman who is advocating it what he understands the difference to be between slavery and involuntary servitude?

Mr. TOWNER. There is a distinction, and I will say to the gentleman it has been expressly and distinctly drawn by the Supreme Court of the United States as well as by other courts. Slavery is, of course, involuntary servitude. But involuntary servitude is not always slavery. Restraint and compulsory labor as a punishment for crime is involuntary servitude. But such a condition is not slavery. In slavery the person held is the absolute property or chattel of another. Slavery is complete subjection. Involuntary servitude is usually limited. So there is a clear distinction, and that distinction ought to be drawn.

Mr. CLINE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. CLINE. Does not the distinction rise out of this difference, if I may use that term, that slavery assumes a title or ownership in the subject by the party owning the slave, while in involuntary servitude it is simply a pledge of the party held in servitude for the extinguishment of an obligation for a certain length of time?

Mr. TOWNER. I think the gentleman is hardly justified in that conception, if it is limited to the distinction stated. Such distinction undoubtedly exists, but it is not the only distinction, and it does not measure the extent of the distinction. Slavery is not at all dependent upon the question of the acquisition of title or the manner of acquiring control over the person. The fact of slavery depends upon the condition existing at the time of the inquiry, and is not dependent upon the manner of subjection, and there is a distinction between the condition that constitutes slavery and that which constitutes involuntary servitude.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I have any special objection to the gentleman's amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

That no law shall be made respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, and that the free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship, without discrimination or preference, shall forever be allowed.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

That H. R. 18459 be amended as follows:
On page 5, line 9, strike out the period, insert a semicolon, and add the following: "and no religious test shall be required for the exercise of civil or political rights. No public money or property shall ever be appropriated, applied, donated, or used, directly or indirectly, for the use, benefit, or support of any sect, church, denomination, or system of religion, or for the use, benefit, or support of any priest, preacher, minister, or other religious teacher or dignitary or sectarian institution as such. Polygamous or plural marriages are forever prohibited."

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say what I am about to say on this subject without interruption, and I would like to ask unanimous consent for 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, we are making such slow progress on this part of the bill, which ordinarily ought not to take up a great deal of time, I would like to know if we can not reach some agreement as to how long the debate on this amendment shall last?

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

Mr. TOWNER. I will say to the gentleman that so far as I know we will take no time on this side. Make it shorter if you desire.

Mr. JONES. Then I will say 15 minutes, Mr. Chairman, and let the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY] have the 15 minutes, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. MANN. You had better make it 5 minutes more. There may be somebody who may wish to talk that length of time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] asks unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph shall be concluded in 20 minutes, of which the gentleman from Oklahoma may have 15 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to express clearly and frankly my purpose in offering this amendment, because what I shall say I feel ought to be said. Before doing so, however, I may be pardoned for saying that no man has less religious prejudices or creed militancy than I have. I could not have any and maintain peace with my relations. I remember that John Murray was the founder of Universalism in America; the Rev. William H. H. Murray, "Adarondac Murray," for whom I was named, was a Presbyterian minister; that my father was a Reformed Methodist evangelist; that my mother belonged to the old school Christian Church, called Campbellites, as did her mother and father; my brother a Baptist, and my wife a Methodist.

While I have a profound regard for Christianity, and I believe in a Divine Providence which guides and guards the destiny of nations and the careers of men, I have never been bound by any creed. I remember also that, being left without parents from the age of 12 years, I was reared by an Alabama farmer by the name of Loper who belonged to what was known as the Primitive, or "Hard Shell," Baptist Church. Their conception of religion, true and undefiled, consisted in this: Tell the truth, pay your debts, take your liquor straight, and vote the Democratic ticket." [Laughter.]

I must confess, Mr. Chairman, I have imbibed much of all the four points of that quadrupled doxy, a doctrine calculated to produce creed stasis, but which has nevertheless created stalwart manhood wherever it has been practiced.

This amendment, varying just a bit from the old original statute written by Thomas Jefferson, and found in the constitution of Virginia of 1830, and which has trickled down since in all the Virginia constitutions, should find lodgment wherever a government of liberty is to be found.

Years ago, when but a boy, in the study of the origin of different constitutional provisions, I came across the following, in section 1 of article 5 of the constitution of the Texas Republic. It reads as follows:

Ministers of the gospel, being by their profession delegated to God and the care of souls, ought not to be diverted from the great duties of their function. Therefore no ministers of the gospel or priests of any denomination whatever shall be eligible to the office of executive of the Republic, nor to a seat in either branch of the Congress of the same.

A short while afterwards I came across a discussion of that clause by Judge R. E. B. Baylor, whose name has been transmitted to posterity in the name of Baylor University, at Waco, Tex. Judge Baylor had been a Baptist minister, and was on the supreme bench of the Texas Republic from 1841 until the admission of Texas into the Union as a State, in 1845. He was a member of the constitutional convention of 1845. In a book, perhaps now out of print, entitled "Bench and Bar of Texas," by James D. Lynch, Judge Baylor is quoted as saying in that convention:

I think the clause a wholesome and wise one. I do not think that any office coming directly from the people ought ever to be filled by the clergy of any denomination. I would as soon see a woman mingling with the populace at large, mounting the rostrum and making stump speeches, as it is generally called, as to see a clergyman engaged in business of this kind. Sir, the good and pious do not wish this thing; none but the ambitious desire it, and they, before all others, ought to be excluded. There are sectarian jealousies and heartburnings enough among the various religious denominations of every country, and by opening this new field to human ambition you will only make the breach between the different sects of Christians wider than it is now. I think, therefore, that the section ought to be retained. A great deal might be said upon the subject. It seems to me, further, that it is calculated to keep clear and well defined the distinction between church and state, so essentially necessary to human liberty and happiness. Sir, priests and kings, the former of every denomination, not the Catholic alone, have conspired in all countries and nations to enslave mankind. It has been a received maxim in Europe that the king should govern the priest and the priest the people. What have our fathers thought upon the subject? In many of the State constitutions the clause has been inserted. It has been thought wise and proper by their framers. A similar feature is found in our present Constitution. In conclusion, I have neither the strength nor the ability to do justice to the subject; I therefore simply say that I hope the clause will be retained by the good sense of this house.

When I read that speech it struck me with considerable force, and it has stayed with me ever since. I do not subscribe to the extreme view taken by Judge Baylor, which doubtless grew out of the restriction placed upon religious liberty prior to the Texas revolution.

History discloses the fact that in the colonization of Texas in 1821 by Stephen F. Austin down to the revolution of 1836 charges by the Mexican priesthood for performing the marital rites were so exorbitant that the colonists adopted a form of marriage by bond to support his future wife for three or five years or for life. We are assured by Z. N. Morrill's work, entitled "Flowers and Fruits of Texas," that this was common, as does Herbert Bancroft, and even Gen. Sam Houston's first marriage form was by a bond to support his wife for three years. Doubtless it was this condition that led Judge Baylor to this extreme view.

I would hold more to the doctrine that no minister or layman, whether Jew or Gentile, Catholic or Protestant, or none of these, should be excluded from public office because of such faith or church standing. [Applause.] Nor, on the other hand, should they be elected because they are such members. Freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of religion—all these are essential to every government of liberty, whatever may be its form.

Yet in the grant of the freedom of speech there is danger of an abuse of that right, but the abuse must be accepted in order to get the larger and the superior right. So also in the grant of the freedom of the press. The press may abuse and slander the most patriotic and honorable public servant, and no doubt every Member here has felt the sting of that abuse. And yet the larger liberty is so essential that we accept the evil consequences flowing therefrom.

Religious liberty may, as it has been sometimes argued, encourage heresy, but we must accept the heresy in order to get that larger liberty. Without that liberty there can be no intelligent solution of the great problem of the beyond. Whatever your view may be or mine, we certainly have the right in all government unrestrained to exercise that view.

Pardon my saying that I hold to that philosophy of creed that would comprehend "living the life," and that no function, individual or organization, can step in and take the place of personal responsibility and personal guilt—a complete free moral agency.

I believe with Sir William Hamilton, the great Scotch mental philosopher, that unless you recognize "free moral agency" and the responsibility of personal guilt you have no basis from which to reason that there is an All Wise Creator at all. However, others believe differently. There are those that believe that an appointed official of the church, and still others that the organization of church itself, may be the intermediator between the guilty individual sinner and the All Wise God whom he is commended to serve; and each of those views are entitled to the same consideration of the State as I am to mine, and liberty each to follow his own course is the only safe and sane way by which the institutions of men may leave every individual with good conscience to commune with God in his own way.

Scarcely no church or creed now extant but what has undergone persecution—persecution by one another. So we can not determine in a legal way which is right and which should become the church of the State. Our pilgrim fathers fled from persecution of the Old World to the bleak shores of New England to escape religious persecution, yet they were here but a short space of time before they began a persecution equally cruel; and the burning of witches at Salem is one of the dark and unpardonable episodes in all our career. Roger Williams, fleeing from another sect, who themselves had been persecuted, went into Rhode Island to found a new Commonwealth; and we are familiar with the early history of Maryland, when the tide in numerical numbers changed and shifted between different creeds, both of whom had been persecuted in Europe. So the separation of church and state is just as essential as the freedom of worship, in order that no partiality shall be shown and that each may flourish or fade in popular opinion before the court of an enlightened popular judgment. This makes all free and guarantees the continuance of each and all.

The liberty of every man to exercise his own views, without partiality shown to either by the State, tends to eradicate the weeds of fanaticism and of prejudice and raises the human race to a higher standard. I had rather believe, Mr. Chairman, in the larger view of the exercise of the right of every individual to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience. [Applause.]

If there be those who contend that a Catholic or Protestant, a Jew or Gentile, or a follower of Confucius or Zoroaster, should not have political as well as civil rights, I do not agree with them. If there be those who claim that because of membership in either of these creeds such membership best entitles them to political rights, I do not agree with them. In other words, Mr. Chairman, we must hold to the doctrine of freedom in forms of worship, freedom of worship, and freedom from worship, together with the corollary that every individual shall have the right to contribute his mite to any creed of his choosing; and on the other hand that he shall be relieved from compulsory contribution, either by tithes or taxes, to any creed whatsoever. This, Mr. Chairman, is my view of a nobler liberty that must be adhered to rigidly in every well-regulated government; and this is the first step in all political, civil, and religious liberty. [Applause.]

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to inform the House, in connection with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY], that the Filipino people believe absolutely and heartily in religious freedom. Immediately after our successful revolution against Spain the Filipino people proceeded at once to frame a constitution for the Republic of the Philippines. The islands had been for 300 years under the rule of Spain, and during that time had had only one church—the Roman Catholic—which was also the State church of Spain. The framers of the constitution of the Philippine Republic were all Catholics; and yet one of the provisions of that constitution was the freedom of worship, the freedom of religion. May I call the attention of the House to this remarkable event which shows that the Filipinos are by temperament a liberty-loving people? The history of the world shows that in no country which has had only one church, and which church was an integral part of its political institutions, has the establishment of religious freedom been effected without bloodshed. Page after page of human history is written with the blood of martyrs of one religion or another. This country of yours was founded by those who would sooner give up their homes than their religion. Cromwell thought himself the instrument of Providence to destroy the church of those who, like him, claimed that Christ was their Savior.

Every country of Europe, many of Latin America and of Asia, are guilty of the crime of religious persecution, but we have seen nothing of the kind in the Philippine Islands. As I said before, during the short life of the Philippine Republic there was religious freedom; and when the United States came and established her Government in the Philippines she brought with her one of the most precious rights of American citizenship—the liberty of the individual to worship God in his own way. And the Filipino people were not only ready to accept this institution, but were glad to have it.

In the annals of American occupation, from that day to this, we record no public disorders on account of religion. To-day the majority of the Filipinos are still Roman Catholics. Few belong to the Aglipayan or native church; few others have become Protestants. Yet they live side by side, they work hand in hand, and they vote according to their political ideas, without regard to their religious convictions. Freedom of religion has been established in the Philippine Islands first upon the initiative of the Filipinos themselves, later upon the decision of the United States; and it is established there, thank God, forever. We realize that it is to the interest of Catholics as much as of Protestants to have religious freedom. I do not therefore object to that part of the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY] which insures the separation between the church and the state. But I deemed it necessary to state that the Philippine Legislature hardly needs this constitutional inhibition. The Protestant Church can rest assured that the people of the Philippines, Catholic though the majority of them be, will receive as fair a treatment from the Philippine Government as the Catholic Church or any other.

As to polygamy, this has not existed among the Christian Filipinos for the last 300 years. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the rule of taxation in said islands shall be uniform.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I suppose it was customary for many years, and may be yet, to put into constitutional provisions the declaration that the rule of taxation should be uniform. Probably that is in the existing law with reference to the Philippines. There is a good deal of controversy about whether it ought to be any longer always followed.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I do not think it is the uniform custom to put into the constitutions of the States the provision that taxation shall be uniform.

Mr. MANN. I will not say that it is the custom. It is in many States, but in some States in recent years I think the tendency has been to get away from the idea of entire uniformity of taxation.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. There is no change from the present organic law.

Mr. MANN. No; I apprehend that it is in the present organic law, which was adopted a good many years ago. As far as I am concerned, I do not profess to be an authority on the subject of taxation, but I have frequently seen cases where it seemed to me that it would be desirable not to enforce uniformity of taxation.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish merely to inquire of the committee whether they have considered in this connection the expediency of the Philippine Legislature levying a graduated income tax? As the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has said, the States are now departing more and more from the old idea that taxation shall be uniform. In Wisconsin, for instance, only four years ago we passed a constitutional amendment that authorized different gradations of taxation, so far as incomes are concerned. The National Government has adopted a similar principle of taxation, under which the taxes are not uniform. I rise to inquire whether that fact has been considered by the committee, so far as the Philippine situation is concerned?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman knows that the present Federal income-tax law applies to the Philippine Islands.

Mr. STAFFORD. My impression was that it was specially excepted.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. No; it is included, but the revenues that are collected go into the Philippine treasury.

Mr. STAFFORD. When that bill was under consideration in the House I remember it was mooted whether it should apply to the Philippines; but, as the gentleman states, the revenues are diverted for the use of the Philippine Islands. But why should we not leave it to the Philippine Legislature to determine whether they should supplement that law by income-tax legislation which would not be uniform? All the States recognize that there should not be uniformity of taxation, so far as incomes are concerned. This phraseology might restrict a graduated income tax, a graduated inheritance tax, and might forbid the legislature from adopting different rates on different classes of property.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not understand that this would prevent the levying of a graduated income tax.

Mr. COOPER. As I understand it, the income tax is uniform, without discrimination as to persons.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Certainly; but not as to amounts.

Mr. COOPER. There is a uniform rate of taxation on incomes of more than a certain amount. The rate of taxation is uniform as between individuals.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Undoubtedly.

Mr. COOPER. It strikes me that one of the things which certainly ought to remain in this bill of rights is the provision that the rule of taxation in the islands shall be uniform. At least it should remain until the people of the islands have learned through experience what it means to tax themselves.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. As I have just said to the gentleman from Wisconsin, there is nothing in this provision, if I understand it correctly, that will prevent the levying by the Philippine Legislature of a graduated income tax. The gentleman will find that in section 11 there is a provision that no export duty shall be levied or collected on exports from the Philippines. They are prohibited from imposing export taxes, and our idea is that they can impose an income tax under this law.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the language of the paragraph in the bill—"the rate of taxation in said islands shall be uniform"—only applies to the income tax, but I take it for granted that there will be other taxes. There will be the taxes required to maintain and conduct the municipalities, taxes on real estate, and taxes on personal property. The conditions surrounding one community would be totally different from that surrounding every other community, and it will not be possible to have uniform taxation for local purposes.

For example, a strictly rural territory would have a rate of taxation levied against land in the rural community which would be very low, because the needs of the community are not very great. Then the taxes to be levied on property of a village where there are no great interests involved would be still lighter than the taxes on property levied in a great city.

Mr. JONES. That is unquestionably the case, and is the case in the islands now. And yet they have the provision in the organic law.

Mr. MADDEN. I think what I am saying is pertinent to the question. In the city of Manila, with all of its great activities, its paved and lighted streets, its system of water supply, and the police system and fire protection to be provided for, the rate of taxation would be very much higher than the rate of taxation in other communities. Will anybody tell me that the rate of taxation can be uniform, except in so far as it applies to the income tax?

Nobody will deny the fact that in every State there are varying rates of taxation, depending on the needs of the community against which the taxes are to be levied.

Take a great city like Chicago. The people there are compelled to pay taxes very much in excess of the people living on the farms 20 miles out of the city. The people of one county have conditions which require them to levy more taxes than the people of another county. Under such conditions uniformity of taxation would be out of the question.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. This does not say that the rate of taxation will be the same; it says the rule of taxation. There is a very material difference there.

Mr. MADDEN. The application of the rule would apply alike to all communities, but it also ought to go to the rate as well as the rule.

Mr. BAILEY. I hardly think so. Your own constitution has precisely the same provision.

Mr. MADDEN. If it only applies to the rule, that is a different matter.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask what the proposition is before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] made a motion to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words just long enough to make the suggestion that the question of uniform taxation was discussed in the Ohio constitutional convention in 1912, at which time a great many of the State constitutions were read. As I recall, New York has not a uniform system, and I do not think Illinois has any.

Mr. MANN. Yes; it has, and is frequently complained of.

Mr. FESS. The discussion turned about that point whether there should be one rate on intangible property and a different rate on real property, or whether there should be one rate on bonds and a different rate on franchises, and the discussion finally led to the adoption of a uniform rule. So in Ohio all property of every class is assessed on uniform rule, which I understand is the provision in this bill. I mention this to indicate that there is not a uniformity throughout the States, some of them having one method and some of them another.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. The gentleman does not understand that by these words, "the rule of taxation shall be uniform," it signifies that in a city of 500,000 people the rate of taxation should be the same as in a country township?

Mr. FESS. I mean that the law passed in Ohio regulating taxation can not make one rate on one kind of property and another rate on a different kind of property.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, when the constitution of North Dakota was adopted, a quarter of a century ago, it contained a provision reading much the same as this, which requires that all taxes shall be uniform. We found afterwards in the operation of a tax law passed by the legislature providing that property should be assessed according to its value on April 1 that all of the elevators in the State cleaned out the wheat in their elevators immediately before April 1, so that after a long period under that law we found that we got absolutely no taxes out of grain in public elevators. So it was finally decided that we would amend the constitution and permit a specific tax on grain. Afterwards the legislature put a tax on grain sufficiently small so that they could not afford to ship it out before that date. In other words, the elevator people stood for the small tax, but when it was imposed according to its value, as was provided under the constitution as originally passed, they paid absolutely nothing. I think our experience in that regard would indicate that the proposal in this bill is a little bit too rigid.

Mr. MADDEN. Somebody would pay taxes on it, because if it was not in Dakota it was some other place. If you could not find it to tax in Dakota, some other place would find it and tax it.

Mr. MILLER. It might get to Illinois, where they required an assessment to be made on the 1st of March, and thus escape taxation there.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman who has just spoken [Mr. MILLER] comes from Duluth and therefore lives in the town where a lot of this wheat was shipped, and I imagine it got down there after the assessor made his rounds. I do not know. I doubt very much whether that wheat was assessed at Duluth. It probably went in the boats and on down to Buffalo. I doubt whether any of that wheat shipped out of North Dakota in the month of March, no matter what its destination, was ever taxed anywhere in the United States.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is it not the fact that the men who own these elevators ship that grain and that the money taken in payment is taxable?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Yes; but their head offices are usually in Minneapolis, or some other State, and the purchase money can not therefore be reached for taxation in our State.

Mr. McKENZIE. In other words, they were tax dodgers?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Yes; precisely. Why enact a provision of this kind in this bill, which will so restrict the powers of the legislature in the Philippines that it will be helpless to cope with the tax dodgers? They constitute a class that ought not to be encouraged.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is a sense in which tax dodging is perhaps excusable. There are millions of poor people in this country who would like to dodge or avoid the payment of the proposed special, stamp, and other additional taxes, which they consider unjustifiable when our Nation is at peace with all the world. Their only hope to avoid it is through us. One way to do so is by practicing economy in the matter of appropriations. The people expect it of us. I have yet to find a single newspaper in our State which does not insist that Congress shall practice the strictest economy. The leading Democratic newspaper of North Dakota, the Stutsman County Democrat, says:

> The country is in no mood to countenance congressional extravagance. Those Democrats who oppose reformed appropriations make a grave mistake from the standpoint of either principle or policy. Economy in public expenditures is a cardinal Democratic doctrine and of especial application at this particular time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

> SEC. 6. That the laws and ordinances now in force in the Philippines shall continue in force and effect, except as altered, amended, or modified herein, until altered, amended, or repealed by the legislative authority herein provided or by act of Congress of the United States.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend section 6 by striking out, in the twelfth line, the words "and ordinances."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Page 6, line 12, strike out the words "and ordinances."

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, the reason I make that motion is this: The word "ordinance" usually applies to a municipal regulation. It rarely has reference to a legislative act.

If gentlemen will look farther down in the same section, they will find the language—until altered, amended, or repealed by the legislative authority herein provided or by act of Congress of the United States.

Of course it is not desired that any of the municipal ordinances now existing in the Philippine Islands shall remain in existence until they have been repealed by legislative action. All that is necessary and all that ought to remain in the section is that the laws now in force in the Philippines shall continue in force and effect until repealed, altered, or amended by legislative authority.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Did not the commission over there enact what we may call laws by the term "ordain" instead of "enact"?

Mr. TOWNER. That may be true, but that would be an additional reason why this amendment should be agreed to.

Mr. MANN. It has usually been considered that where an administrative body is given authority to ordain that certain things should be the law, that that is called an ordinance. I suppose that is what this has reference to. Of course I do not know. While the term "ordinance" as we use it has a municipal significance, still the fact that we so use it is not a sign that that is the only use throughout the world.

Mr. TOWNER. In any event, if that should be true, then there should be a distinction clearly drawn here. I do not know whether laws passed by the commission are called ordinances or not.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman that they are not called ordinances; they are legislative enactments. But I would like to ask him if there are not some ordinances that were decreed by the military government?

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Iowa permit me to answer that question?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. QUEZON. They are called "general orders." The only "ordinance" we have in the Philippine Islands is a municipal ordinance; that is the technical name of it.

Mr. TOWNER. Then undoubtedly the words "and ordinances" ought to be stricken out.

Mr. JONES. I have no objection to that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That the legislative authority herein provided shall have power, when not inconsistent with this act, by due enactment to amend, alter, modify, or repeal any law or ordinance, civil or criminal, continued in force by this act as it may from time to time see fit.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman in charge of the bill, or the gentleman from Iowa, that having stricken out the words "and ordinances" in the section above it should also be stricken out in this section.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I was going to make the motion when the Clerk finished the reading of the section, but I will make it now. I move to strike out the words "or ordinance."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 20, strike out the words "or ordinance."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That all legislative powers heretofore granted to the Philippine Legislature and to the Philippine Commission and hereby conferred on the Philippine Government shall be granted to the Philippine Legislature authorized by this act.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out all the language of that section following the word "that," in line 1, down to and including the words "shall be," in line 4, and to substitute in lieu thereof the language "general legislative power is hereby," so that the section will read:

That general legislative power is hereby granted to the Philippine Legislature authorized by this act.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 1, after the word "that," strike out the following language: "all legislative powers heretofore granted to the Philippine Legislature and to the Philippine Commission and hereby conferred on the Philippine Government shall be," and insert in lieu thereof the words "general legislative power is hereby."

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, the reason I suggest that amendment is this: Under the terms of this section as it was originally written, only the legislative powers are granted that belong to the Philippine Legislature and to the Philippine Commission. The facts regarding that are well known historically. We had in the first place acts of a military governor and subsequently of a civil commission appointed by the President. Subsequent to that acts were passed by the Philippine Legislature, if it might be called such, which consisted of an assembly elected by the people and of a commission appointed by the President. From time to time various legislative powers were conferred upon these bodies. Just what is and what is not embraced in the powers that were granted to them I presume it would be practically impossible for us now to determine. It is clear that great confusion and uncertainty are likely to result when before the validity of an act of the legislature we are creating can be determined it must be ascertained whether the prior assembly or commission, or both, had such power. The language which I am asking to have introduced as a substitute is that which is usually given and approved in the formation of constitutions for States and Territories, when they desire to confer legislative power. In other words, it is now well established under American law what general legislative power is, and this legislature ought to have all general legislative power such as is exercised by States and by Territories.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. I will.

Mr. COOPER. I would like to ask the gentleman this question: If that grants all legislative power to their legislature?

Mr. TOWNER. This language does not say "all." It says "general legislative power," and general legislative power granted to a State will be such as would be strictly within their jurisdiction.

Mr. COOPER. Would that be extending territorial government?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly it would; it would be giving this legislature general legislative power.

Mr. COOPER. Then do I understand that if we grant general legislative power to the Philippine Legislature it will mean the establishment there of a territorial government—that the Philippines will be made a Territory—a part of the United States?

Mr. TOWNER. I do not care to discuss that question.

Mr. COOPER. If they become a Territory of the United States and the Constitution is thus extended over them, the United States never can withdraw from them except compelled by force, as the result of a war. The Supreme Court has so decided.

Mr. TOWNER. But, Mr. Chairman, that matter is not involved in this question at all.

Mr. COOPER. If they are to be made a Territory of the United States, it is directly involved.

Mr. TOWNER. I am not declaring, and this amendment does not declare, anything about its being a Territory.

Mr. COOPER. But you propose to give the legislature general legislative power——

Mr. TOWNER. General legislative power; certainly I do.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. HELM. Further on in the bill there are some provisions retaining certain powers in the Congress of the United States, especially in reference to tariff duties and other provisions affecting the interest of the United States. Now, that is general legislation, and if you confer all legislation on the legislature then you either nullify or you must change those provisions that have been inserted in this bill for the purpose of retaining certain powers in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. TOWNER. Oh, I will say to my friend that is not the case. It is not "all" general legislative power, but it is only general legislative power such as might properly be exercised by a legislature of this kind. I want the Philippine Legislature to have general legislative power and not a restricted, undetermined, questionable power, and it has not anything to do with the relation of the Philippines to this country nor the question as to whether we can or can not exercise governmental power in the islands.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa on the lines I have indicated. The trade relations that are to continue between this Government and the Philippine Government that are provided for in this bill are important; and if we confer all power or general legislative power on the Philippine Legislature, that is inclusive, and it would have the sole and exclusive right to legislate on all subjects. The levying of tariff duties is certainly general legislation. Nobody will say a tariff bill passed by the Congress of the United States is not general legislation as affecting the United States. A tariff bill passed affecting the Philippine Islands is certainly general legislation and is related to the Philippine Islands, and it seems to me it would be an unwise and impolitic thing to pass the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. MANN and Mr. MILLER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this amendment is exhausted.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by perfecting the text by striking out the word "Philippine." Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa. It is not subject to the objection made by the gentleman from Kentucky, because this act will all be construed together, and if the language was "all legislative power is conferred upon the Philippine Legislature," and then in the next section say they should not have power to do a particular thing, the two would be construed together. I am in favor giving the Philippine Legislature broader power than we would give to a Territory of the United States. What are we doing to-day? On one side we are trying to ascertain whether the Philippine people are competent for independence. Never in this world can you ascertain that by treating them like children. The only way that can be ascertained is to put responsibility upon them and see whether they measure up to the responsibility. Now, as far as I am concerned, while I am not in favor of giving the Philippine Islands independence, separating them from the United States, I am in favor of giving them control over their local affairs—exclusive control. Of course we could change the law at any time. I am not in favor of letting the Philippine Government enter into foreign relations. I think the United States should stand for them in directing their foreign affairs, but I believe they ought to have the right to govern themselves locally, and you can not give them that right by putting a lot of restrictions in and saying they are not competent to do this, we are afraid they will do wrong about that, we will not trust them about some other things. We have got to trust them sooner or later. We have got to turn them loose as an independent people or else we have got to make them friends of ours if they remain under the jurisdiction of the Government of the United States, and the only way you can do so is to treat them like men. [Applause.] We do not own all the wisdom of the world ourselves. We sometimes doubt about our own capacity for self-government. I do not know whether they will have self-government without trials and tribulations, though I do not assume that they will. We do not. We constantly have trouble amongst ourselves in the best and most enlightened parts of the United States. Let the Philippine Government take their chance and see whether they can protect themselves in their own government, and when that is determined it will be time enough for us to determine, first, whether they want to be separated from the United States, which I do not think they will then want, and, second, whether if they want it the United States feels at liberty to let them go.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I want to suggest to the gentleman that a careful reading of this section will indicate that it is not its purpose to define what legislative power shall be conferred so much as it is its purpose to state where that legislative power shall rest.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman that I was not making my remarks so much on this section as on other provisions of the bill. The objection I have to the way the section reads is that you have got to determine on what we have granted to the Philippine Legislature and what we have granted to the Philippine Commission; whereas if we say they shall have legislative power then they will have general legislative power except as we otherwise restricted in this organic act.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GARRETT of Texas). The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has expired.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HELM. Is there anything in this section that limits the power that has heretofore been exercised by the legislature? Does it not extend it or enlarge on its power by permitting it to exercise all the powers that are conferred on it by this bill and that were conferred on it by the organic act under which they now are governed, together with powers exercised by the Philippine Commission?

Mr. MANN. It seems to me that where we specifically say that the legislature shall have such powers and go no further, those are all the powers they have.

Mr. HELM. If I understand the gentleman correctly, he wants to give them the fullest measure of power in the matter of legislation?

Mr. MANN. I do.

Mr. HELM. We are undertaking in this section of the bill to give them all the powers that they have had heretofore without restriction, thereby enlarging upon their powers rather than restricting them.

Mr. MANN. The restrictions of the power are in other parts of the bill.

Mr. HELM. There is no restriction in this section.

Mr. MANN. This section gives no greater power to the Philippine Legislature than the Philippine Commission and the present Philippine Legislature have, and if we take steps on that we ought to take steps here to give them broader powers.

Mr. HELM. As I understand, it gives the legislature all the power that is given in this bill, and it gives them all the power that the Philippine Commission has heretofore had, and all the power that the previous legislative bodies in the Philippine Islands have had. So it looks to me like the gentleman is arguing against his own premise.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment by inserting after the word "power" the words "except as herein restricted."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by inserting after the word "power" the words "except as herein restricted," so that the section as amended will read:

"SEC. 8. That general legislative power, except as herein restricted, is hereby granted to the Philippine Legislature authorized by this act."

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I am very heartily in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], and I sincerely hope it will be the wisdom of this committee to accept it, together with the modification which I have proposed. The modification is to meet the objection raised by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] and some of the objections that have come from other Members.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the language of the paragraph as it now stands, to my mind, is clearly improper. Just for a moment see what it does. All legislative powers are granted that heretofore have been granted, to what? To the Philippine Legislature—that is, the assembly—and to the Philippine Commission, and are hereby granted to the Philippine Government. That is, this paragraph grants to the legislature of the islands which we are now creating only such power as heretofore has been granted to the assembly and to the commission, and that are also herein conferred upon the legislature, which is a complete restriction. As the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has here clearly and emphatically stated, if we are to give these people anything like an opportunity to demonstrate their capacity for government, we certainly must give them free rein, as far as possible, in matters of legislation.

Now, if we turn over the page, we find this language in section 12:

That all local legislative powers in the Philippines, except as herein otherwise provided, shall be vested in a legislature.

There is very clearly a conflict between the two. The last does not go even as far as the first. It says "all local legislative." I say now, Mr. Chairman, when that paragraph is reached I propose to strike out the word "local." I think the Philippine Legislature should not be tied to Congress constantly by an apron string. I think the people of the islands should have an opportunity to legislate. Let them draw upon their experience, their knowledge of the affairs of their own people, and act accordingly. We should let them have free and full opportunity to do so. But we have not done so in this paragraph. We have hedged them in, we have curbed them in, we have restricted their legislative activity to within very narrow limits.

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Chairman, I believe that the majority of the Insular Affairs Committee sympathize with the ideas expressed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], although I am not authorized to speak for the majority. Therefore I hope that the amendment will be adopted. The language suggested by the gentleman from Iowa would serve to make it clear that the purpose of this act is to grant the Philippine Legislature all the powers that usually are possessed by national legislative bodies, except those that are specifically prohibited by other sections of this act and those which affect foreign relations. The amendment would serve to avoid constitutional questions that may arise if the section is left as it stands, as to whether or not the Philippine Legislature has any right to enact certain legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from the Philippine Islands has expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, the reason why section 8 was written as it is is that the Philippine Commission, as all those who are familiar with the Philippine Government understand, exercises, or certain of its members do, executive powers as well as legislative powers, and had exclusive legislative powers in certain portions of the islands, and joint powers with the assembly in other parts of the islands. The majority thought it wise, in order to make it absolutely clear that the Philippine Commission was to exercise no legislative powers hereafter, and especially to make clear what power the legislature was to be clothed with, to confer upon it specifically the legislative power conferred upon the commission, as well as that conferred upon the legislature. The organic law provided that "all the legislative power heretofore conferred upon the Philippine Commission in the said islands not inhabited," and so forth, should be conferred upon the legislature created by the organic act. To discover what that power was we must examine President McKinley's letter of April 7 to the then Secretary of War.

I wish to say, however, that if the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] will accept the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], with a slight change in the phraseology, I do not think I will have any objection to his amendment. The amendment to the amendment reads "except as herein restricted." I would change that language so as to make it read "except as herein otherwise provided." I do not think the gentleman will object to this.

Mr. MILLER. That is entirely satisfactory.

Mr. JONES. With that change in the amendment I am perfectly willing to accept the amendment.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. I merely wanted to ask the chairman of the committee if he thinks by adding the word "exclusive" before the word "general" it would clear up the situation?

Mr. JONES. No; I do not.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to modify my amendment, so that it shall read "except as otherwise herein provided."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment by an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by striking out the word "restricted" and having the amendment read "except as otherwise herein provided."

Mr. MILLER. That should be "except as herein otherwise provided." Transpose "herein" and "otherwise."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That all the property and rights which may have been acquired in the Philippine Islands by the United States under the treaty of peace with Spain, signed December 10, 1898, except such land or other property as shall be designated by the President of the United States for military and other reservations of the Government of the United States, and all lands which may have been subsequently acquired by the Government of the Philippine Islands by purchase under the provisions of sections 63 and 64 of the act of Congress approved July 1, 1902, except such as may have heretofore been sold and disposed of in accordance with the provisions of said act of Congress, are hereby placed under the control of the government of said islands to be administered for the benefit of the inhabitants thereof, and the Philippine Legislature shall have power to legislate with respect to all such matters as it may deem advisable; but acts of the Philippine Legislature with reference to land, timber, and mining, hereafter enacted, shall not have the force of law until approved by the President of the United States: Provided, That where lands in the Philippine Islands have been or may be reserved for any public purpose of the United States, and, being no longer required for the purpose for which reserved, have been or may be, by order of the President, placed under the control of the government of said islands to be administered for the benefit of the inhabitants thereof, the order of the President shall be regarded as effectual to give the government of said islands full control and power to administer such lands for the benefit of the inhabitants of said islands.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 7, by inserting after the word "President," in line 25, the words "and the Congress."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the amendment is to bring to the attention of Congress, as well as to that of the President of the United States, such questions as may arise from the disposition of the land by the Philippine Legislature. Lines 19 and 20 of section 9 indicate that the Philippine Legislature would have entire control of the islands and would administer them for the benefit of the inhabitants thereof. It is just possible that a President who is partial to Filipino independence, or one who is entirely opposed to it, would have to do with the questions arising from grants of land, especially in the matter of timber and mining, and that it would be well for Congress to have some notice before questions of this kind are finally determined. It has occurred to me that it is possible that if the Filipino Legislature should, in its judgment, find it wise for "the benefit of the inhabitants of the islands" to dispose of one of the islands—for example, one of the islands not inhabited at all—it might so dispose of it "for the benefit of the inhabitants of the islands" as to involve us in complications with foreign powers. It is just possible that the legislature might decide that it could sell an island.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. MOORE. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that in a subsequent section of the measure the right of Congress to annul any act of the Philippine Legislature is expressly reserved, and to adopt the amendment of the gentleman would render still more cumbersome and still more difficult any legislation in regard to the public lands and the friar lands in the islands. This is one particular matter in which an exception, if the gentleman will pardon me, was made by requiring affirmative action on the part of the President.

Mr. MOORE. I suggest to the gentleman that this paragraph provides—and it is very comprehensive—that "all the property and rights which the United States has in the Philippine Islands" are placed under the control of the government of the islands, which means, if the figures quoted here are correct, $200,000,000 or $300,000,000 worth of property.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. There are about 60,000,000 acres of public land, according to my present recollection, and then the friar lands.

Mr. MOORE. All this and all property and all rights therein——

Mr. JONES. The gentleman understands that under the organic law that is already given to the Philippines. They already own it. This is simply confirming that. The organic law already gives it to them.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman does not yet get my point. This property is to be under the control of the Philippine Legislature. In the wisdom of the legislature, according to the judgment of the legislature, it might seem well to dispose of an island or piece of ground in a way that might not conform to the interests of the United States, or that might involve us in complications with foreign powers. Would it not be well for the Congress to be advised?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the gentleman will permit, in the first place, I think that any President, whether he was for independence or against independence, could be relied upon to protect our foreign affairs; and in view of the fact that the Congress retains the right, in a subsequent section, to annul any law that may be passed there, this would render it much more cumbersome.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] be extended three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania be extended three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE. When the gentleman states that Congress retains the power to annul, to what section does he refer?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not remember the number of the section now, but it is in a subsequent section.

Mr. MOORE. I have not found it.

Mr. JONES. It is in the law, as clear as can be.

Mr. MOORE. Is it in the organic law?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It is in the present organic law, and also in this bill.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman understands that I was dealing with section 9, which specifically provides that it shall be up to the President, and that is all there is to it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If an act affecting the public lands was passed by the Philippine Legislature, and that act was approved by the Governor General, it would not become a law until affirmative action approving it had been taken by the President of the United States. In the opinion of the committee that is a safeguard that is proper. Now, the gentleman's amendment proposes to go a step further, and to require that it shall not only be approved by the President of the United States but that it must be affirmatively acted upon by the Congress of the United States; and the gentleman, knowing the difficulties that we have here in legislating concerning our insular affairs at all, will readily understand that it would be extremely difficult ever to get any legislation passed with relation to the public lands in the Philippines.

Mr. MOORE. I realize that to bring it to Congress would add somewhat to the difficulties of disposing of land.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Every act of the Philippine Legislature must be transmitted to the Congress. It is then referred to the Committee on Insular Affairs of course, and the Congress retains to itself the right to annul any act of the Philippine Legislature.

Mr. MOORE. I think the gentleman will agree that there are certain islands in the archipelago that are practically uninhabited.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I suppose there are some small islands.

Mr. MOORE. And they might be of use to a foreign nation, or to a miner or speculator, or to some one who desired to cut timber, and those islands might be ceded by the Philippine Legislature, if it deemed it wise to do so.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman will find the section that he asked me about a moment ago on page 15. It reads:

All laws enacted by the Philippine Legislature shall be reported to the Congress of the United States, which hereby reserves the power and authority to annul the same.

I will say to the gentleman that I think we have gone as far as we ought to go when we have provided for affirmative action on the part of the President.

Mr. MILLER. May I ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question? Under this bill the Philippine Legislature has full power to legislate respecting the public lands and timber and mines, provided the legislation is approved by the President. That is still subject to be repealed by the Congress of the United States. Now, suppose the Philippine Legislature, with the approval of the President, should grant to an English corporation all the timber rights in the island of Mindanao—I am mentioning this as an extreme suppositious case; suppose that corporation should proceed to go ahead and develop; suppose that three years later the Congress of the United States should repeal the act; how would that affect the title of the English concern?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. After the President had confirmed it?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not think the title would be good. I think the repeal by the Congress of the United States would affect the title. The law is a part of the contract.

Mr. MILLER. Of course, that is an extreme case. I will say that I have had serious doubts as to the legal effect of title in individuals who acquired timber concessions or public-domain concessions. Congress still retains the power to annul, and Congress might annul some general act under which a great number of individuals had acquired title to the land and perhaps had passed it on to innocent purchasers.

Mr. HELM. Do I understand the gentleman is asking what would be the status of the property that had been removed during the time that the act remained in force or the time when it was considered valid?

Mr. MILLER. That is the nature of the inquiry; yes.

Mr. HELM. Of course, if the timber had been taken away and the people who had the concession had gone, they would be all right.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. MOORE. I will not ask for any more time.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a word as to this.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question before he gets through?

Mr. JONES. Yes. Mr. Chairman, the provision as it now stands and which the gentleman from Pennsylvania desires to amend goes very far and just as far as I am willing to go. It goes further than I had wished to go in the beginning. I very reluctantly gave my consent to the provision requiring the approval in advance of the President to all legislation in respect to the sale of public lands, timber, and mining rights. I thought that inasmuch as the bill expressly reserved to Congress the right to annul all laws passed by the legislature, that was sufficient to safeguard the disposition of these valuable public lands. I finally concluded, however, that no harm at least could be done by requiring the approval of the President. I am unwilling to go further than this. To require the approval of Congress would mean that little, if any, of these lands would ever be disposed of. There are some 60,000,000 acres of these public lands, and to require Congress to affirmatively approve every sale of them, no matter how small and insignificant the sale, before the purchaser could obtain his title would put an end to all sales. The same is equally true of the undisposed of friar lands. These lands were purchased with money borrowed by the Philippine Government and they should be disposed of as rapidly as may be legally done.

It is proposed to sell these lands in small tracts to actual settlers. If the amendment of the gentleman is adopted, the government will not be able to dispose of even 20 acres of land to one desiring it for a homestead without first getting the approval of Congress. Gentlemen who are familiar with legislation here know that that would be an absolute inhibition upon the sale of these lands. The gentleman must know that hundreds, yes, thousands, of bills will, if his amendment is adopted, be introduced in Congress asking for approval of sales of land made by the Philippine Government, not one of which in all probability would secure consideration. The gentleman's amendment is therefore, with all respect to him, absolutely impracticable.

Mr. MOORE. I wish to say in the gentleman's time that the very fact that the provision was put in section 9 was notice that the committee had some reason for putting it in. The gentleman has said that he had some hesitancy about letting it go in, but why should we reserve to the President of the United States the scrutiny over mining and timber lands if there had not been some reason for it?

Mr. JONES. For the very reason which the gentleman has stated, namely, that there are millions of acres of timber and other valuable lands in the Philippines which the legislature might inadvisedly or without sufficient consideration dispose of. For this reason it was deemed wise, in the interest of the Filipinos themselves, to require the approval of the President before any of them can be disposed of. But that is as far as I am willing to go. I hesitated about going that far, but realizing the great importance of the matter I consented to do so.

Mr. MOORE. In view of the liberalizing of section 8, why should we have any restriction in section 9 at all?

Mr. JONES. For the very reason the gentleman himself has suggested. He has suggested that the vast interests out there might be unwisely disposed of, and has suggested that even affirmative congressional action should be required before they be disposed of.

Mr. MOORE. May I ask the gentleman why, if the committee wanted to liberalize the powers of the Philippine Legislature as in section 8, it should restrict them in section 9. If it had any conception in regard to these lands or timber transactions that it was justified in putting this in the bill, then we would be justified in still further restricting it by having notice given to Congress. If the gentleman says that the introduction of this restriction was an inadvertence as far as the committee is concerned, and put in with reluctance, why, that is another thing.

Mr. JONES. I did not say it was an inadvertence. I said, on the contrary, that it was put in after careful consideration. I said that in the beginning I thought it was well to give the legislature complete control over the public lands, but others in whose judgment I had confidence did not agree with me, and so after giving the subject further consideration I concluded, as I have said over and over again, that it would be best to require the approval of the President before disposing of these lands. That is quite a different thing to requiring the approval of Congress as the gentleman would do.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I think the provisions of section 9 that are contained on page 7 are in the main wise, and I do not think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] should be adopted. It is perhaps well for a time, out of an abundance of caution, to provide that these laws relating to the land in the Philippine Islands shall not have force and effect until they have been approved by the President, but it would certainly be very unwise to provide that the Congress must affirmatively pass on all of these matters. The result would be that Congress, anxious to dispose of its other business, would be likely to neglect the matters of this distant Territory of ours and that the laws would be hung up for an indefinite length of time.

Furthermore, I doubt if the Members of Congress are sufficiently well acquainted with the conditions in the Philippine Islands to pass intelligently upon the many questions that might arise in regard to these lands. I have had some experience with regard to land laws, and I am frank to say that I should not know what was wise and what was unwise in regard to many land questions that might arise over there. I am glad we are going to give the Filipino people the opportunity to legislate fully and completely in regard to their landed resources. I hope they will be wise in so doing. I trust that the President will carefully scan the legislation that is passed, and I feel hopeful that with this safeguard the legislation will be wise.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman knows that we have just passed section 8 and modified it so that it gives the legislature rather comprehensive powers.

Mr. MONDELL. I realize that, but the fact still remains that Congress has the right and power to repeal any act of the Philippine Legislature.

Mr. MOORE. And in the very next section we restrict their powers.

Mr. MONDELL. I think the gentleman from Virginia has fairly well answered that. It is probable that the land laws will be wise, with the view of having the benefits of the public lands widely enjoyed by all the people of the Philippine Islands, but for fear that they do make a mistake, out of abundant caution this additional provision is inserted that the President affirmatively pass upon all land legislation.

Mr. MOORE. Does the gentleman see any difference between the right of the Philippine Legislature to pass a law relating to public buildings, which would not have to be submitted to the Congress of the United States or the President, and passing a law relating to lands, which must be so submitted?

Mr. MONDELL. I think I do see quite a bit of difference, and yet I am not one of those who are so fearful, as many people are, that the Philippine Legislature will do an unwise thing touching this landed property; I think it is perhaps well to have this general supervision. I hope that it will never be exercised in a negative way, except in a case so clear that there can be no doubt but that the legislature has made a mistake. In a majority of cases I have no doubt that their legislation will be wise, and I think men on the ground know more about what ought to be done than the Congress does. The President will have some advisers familiar with these matters who can advise him as to the legislation that may be enacted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Virginia, the chairman of the committee, a question with reference to the proviso of this section.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the proviso in section 9, on page 8, is as follows:

Provided, That where lands in the Philippine Islands have been or may be reserved for any public purpose of the United States, and, being no longer required for the purpose for which reserved, have been or may be, by order of the President, placed under the control of the government of said islands to be administered for the benefit of the inhabitants thereof, the order of the President shall be regarded as effectual to give the government of said islands full control and power to administer such lands for the benefit of the inhabitants of said islands.

Do I understand that to refer to some general orders of withdrawal for general public purposes, or only to orders of withdrawal relating to what might be called governmental purposes for forts, military establishments, and lighthouses, for instance.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman that the organic law provides that in turning over this public domain to the Philippine Government the President shall reserve such portions of it as, in his judgment, the Government of the United States may need for military or other reservation purposes.

Mr. MONDELL. That is, for governmental purposes?

Mr. JONES. Governmental purposes.

Mr. MONDELL. Forts and lighthouses and matters of that kind?

Mr. JONES. For all military and other reservations needed by the United States. The President of the United States, in the exercise of the power granted him, reserved considerable land here and there in the islands. It turned out later that he had reserved more than the Government needed. In the beginning it was not known just how much would be needed, but out of due precaution it seems the President reserved more than there was any need for. Because this was true, one or more bills have been introduced in this House giving to the President the authority to dispose of these unoccupied lands. This was done at the request of both Secretary of War Dickinson and Secretary Stimson, but no action was ever taken by Congress. The present Secretary of War advised that the subject be taken care of in this bill.

Mr. MONDELL. It seems an entirely proper provision, but this thought occurs to me: Assuming that somewhere on the islands we may hereafter need lands for military or lighthouse purposes or for other governmental purposes, which we have not heretofore reserved, is there any provision in the bill under which a reservation of the lands could be hereafter made? I understand that the Philippine Legislature might by enactment reserve those lands for the uses of the United States, but it is, of course, possible that a condition might occur under which that would not be done. Is there any saving provision in the bill?

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, there is no saving provision of this kind in the bill, and there was no saving provision of the kind in the organic law. If the President of the United States had not reserved a sufficient quantity in the first instance, there was no power given by which he could afterwards do so.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Virginia yield to me?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If I understood the inquiry of the gentleman from Wyoming I think the gentleman from Virginia has not replied to it. I understood the gentleman to ask if there was anything out of the public domain now owned——

Mr. MONDELL. Certain lands have been reserved for governmental public purposes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the gentleman from Wyoming to the language beginning in line 9, on page 7—

Except such land or other property as shall be designated by the President of the United States for military and other reservations of the Government of the United States and all lands which may have been subsequently acquired by the government of the Philippine Islands by purchase under the provisions of sections 63 and 64, etc.

Mr. MONDELL. That saves those that the President may designate at the time this bill takes effect, or thereafter under its provisions, but it would not meet this situation: Assuming that hereafter at some time we might need a location for a lighthouse or a location for military or naval purposes in addition to those already reserved, is there any provision in the bill whereby we could be absolutely certain of securing those lands except as we might secure them through the action of the Philippine Legislature? Conditions might arise under which that might not be easy to obtain.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman's question now is a little broader than it was when he first presented it to me.

Mr. MONDELL. That was what I intended to inquire about.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has again expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES. The President of the United States, when this law goes into effect, will of course have the right to reserve any lands that he thinks necessary for military or other purposes.

Mr. MONDELL. That is, in addition to those that have not heretofore——

Mr. JONES. That have already been reserved. But there happens to be certain parts of the lands that have already been reserved that are not at all necessary for any governmental purpose.

Mr. MONDELL. I understand that; and they are to be returned.

Mr. JONES. These pieces of land are in many instances small and scattered, and so located as be of no value to the United States. In some instances, it is very desirable that they be sold to natives who own the adjoining land. The authority to dispose of this land is given to the President. It must be given to somebody. The War Department has desired for years that it be given to the President.

Mr. MONDELL. I hope the gentleman does not misunderstand me. I think the provisions of the proviso are proper and wise, so far as they go; but my query was, assuming that in the future we might desire lands for these public purposes—if it were at home, if it were anywhere in the United States, and these lands were public lands, the President would reserve them—but do we retain any power over the Philippine lands under this bill under which the President could do the same thing there——

Mr. JONES. No——

Mr. MONDELL (continuing). Or would we be compelled to go to the Philippine Legislature to get these lands for public purposes?

Mr. JONES. When the President shall have reserved all land necessary for military and other reservations of the United States the remainder will go to the Filipino people. If thereafter the United States desires to secure more of these lands, the authority must come from the Philippine Legislature.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will allow me, this is my thought: It seems to me it would be very much better to have a provision in the bill reserving the right on behalf of the President of the United States, just as we do on our public lands here, to reserve public lands in the Philippines for public purposes. I think that such a provision would be wise from two distinct standpoints. First, if there ever came a time when we would need public lands for governmental purposes, there would be no question but what we could obtain them; and, second, if there were such a provision, then the President would feel entirely free to restore land not now needed and not likely to be needed in the future, with the knowledge that if they remain public lands he could secure them later. Without any provision under which later he may secure these lands, there is a temptation to hold large acreages in reservation.

Mr. JONES. I understand the gentleman's position exactly, but it was not thought necessary when the organic law was passed—a law prepared, as I understand, by Mr. Secretary ROOT and Mr. Taft—that any provision of the sort indicated by the gentleman was necessary. The provision in this bill follows the language of the organic law.

Mr. MONDELL. My query grows somewhat out of the experience we have had at home. If lands are reserved for public purposes and their restoration might result in their passing into such control that they could not hereafter be secured again, the temptation is to retain them in even larger areas than necessary.

Mr. JONES. I understand.

Mr. MONDELL. With the idea that some time they may be used, and so out of an abundance of caution areas will be retained that really ought to be restored to general use.

Mr. JONES. I can only say to the gentleman that I believe the policy set forth in the organic law was a wise policy. I do not believe we will ever need for the United States any more land than has already been reserved. I am not, therefore, so much concerned about getting more land for the United States as I am over getting rid of some we now have but do not need.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I regret that I can not agree to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, which I think perhaps was a very natural one to offer—that if these lands are to be approved by the President they ought to be approved by Congress. The approval by Congress is practically impossible as a legislative proposition, but the President appoints the Governor General of the Philippine Islands. He has a veto power upon bills passed by the Philippine Legislature. I believe it is true the legislature can pass bills over his veto by a two-thirds vote. Now, we are not dealing with lands which belong to the United States in the sense that lands in the United States belong to us. The lands in the Philippine Islands, in our opinion, belong to the Filipinos, to any Philippine Government which is created, however it be created. I do not see any reason why the Philippine Legislature should not have the power by a two-thirds vote to pass any bill it chooses to upon the subject of lands or mines or timber. If we are going to give to the Philippine people a government at all, why not give them a government without too many apron strings tied to it. We never can ascertain what they will do about these things until they have the power and the responsibility; but my judgment is that always wherever a legislative body has an extra veto upon its power it takes that much less care of the work that it does. We feel confident in the House here frequently that mistakes which we make will be corrected by the Senate, or that mistakes which both the House and the Senate make will be corrected by the President. Now, it is proposed to add an additional veto in reference to the Philippine people. Let them have the power over their land, their timber, their mines. They are not ours. That is a matter purely of local government. The people to whom these things belong ought to have the legislative power. We do not give such power to the legislature of our Territories because we do not treat the land in a Territory as belonging to the Territory, but as belonging to the United States, and we do not treat these lands as belonging to the United States, although the United States may have to do with them. I shall offer an amendment to strike out the provision which requires the approval of the President. The President appoints the Governor General. Let the Governor General exercise his veto power, and it is not possible by this bill to take away the power of Congress over the Philippine Islands by future legislation so long as they are under our flag.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. For my part I think that these provisions in this bill in regard to the land, timber, and mineral resources are very wholesome indeed. It has been more than 130 years since our Government was established, and we are not all wise yet. It is within the memory of almost every man present that in the last few years conditions in Alaska have not been unlike the conditions in the Philippine Islands. With all the wisdom at the command of Congress, we came well-nigh losing some of the most valuable and extensive resources in Alaska that this Government possesses. I regret extremely that in my own beloved State, that has one of the largest coal deposits of most any State in the Union, that all of that coal land at one time was owned by the State, and for a mere trifle of $1.25 an acre passed from the control and ownership of the State, without any reservation whatever and without any mineral royalty reserved to the State. Why, if an infinitesimal royalty had been reserved, there would not be a cent of State tax in the State of Kentucky to-day. A small royalty per ton would have given us a magnificent public school system, vocational schools, maintained our State university, enabled the State to construct and maintain a splendid system of roads. And it is lamentable that somebody did not look far enough into the future to safeguard and provide for these advantages.

Now, the information that I have gleaned in regard to the Philippine Islands is to the effect that they have immense quantities of most valuable timber, minerals, and rich lands that have not yet been touched. Nobody knows the extent of them. And we hope this young government that is now starting out and getting upon its feet will prove a success; but in the light that has guided our pathway in the several States we can hardly hope that they will succeed beyond the measure of success that has attended the development of most of the States in this Union. And I believe that for the time being it is a very wholesome and a very wise course to retain this provision in the bill.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HELM. With pleasure.

Mr. MILLER. If the provision requiring the approval of the President before it becomes a law were not in the bill, the President would still have the right to veto it after it was passed by the legislature?

Mr. HELM. Certainly.

Mr. MILLER. Does the gentleman think the situation created by this exception is very much better than the regular rule for the preservation of the resources?

Mr. HELM. But the gentleman has been here long enough to know that something has got to happen; somebody has got to turn something up; somebody has got to focus the attention of Congress or the President, or of those in authority, on a particular act that is being done—an unwise concession, grant, or privilege. Somebody has got to be on the ground and on guard. We all know how frequently these things happen.

Now, it is a little beside the question, but the only misgiving I have in connection with this proposition is that we are imposing great responsibilities on a people who are in their legislative swaddling clothes. We who have had some little experience around this Capitol know how hard it is, in the first place, to detect an insidious lobby, and, in the second place, we know how hard it is to expose it and to expel it after it has been exposed. Now, just how successful this Philippine Legislature is going to be along this line of resistance I do not know. The lobbyists and grafters are going to be as busy as bird dogs, because they are going to say, "This is an easy thing." "These Filipino people are not wise and they are not onto the job." The best thing to do is to leave this section of the bill just as it has been drawn.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman speaks of lobbies. There is just a suggestion of that in paragraph 9. It did not come from me in offering this amendment, but it is suggested by this reservation about timber and mining land. I now ask the gentleman if, in putting this in the bill, the committee thought the Philippine Legislature ought to be protected against itself?

Mr. HELM. I expect the Congress of the United States ought to have been protected against the Guggenheims in Alaska. There are times when we need as much protection as the Philippine Legislature will.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman would seem to answer yes to the question?

Mr. HELM. We are not absolutely invulnerable and above a little criticism and comment along certain lines ourselves.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. MOORE. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kentucky may have five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HELM. I have said all I care to say, but if the gentleman wants to ask a question——

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I am going to ask, in view of the fact that the gentleman from Illinois has indicated his purpose to offer another amendment to this section, that all debate on the pending amendment close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that all debate be closed in five minutes on this amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE. Does the gentleman from Ketnucky take the same view that I have heard others express on this floor, that the land in the Philippine Islands is the property of the Filipinos and subject to disposal by their legislature?

Mr. HELM. One of the purposes of this bill is to cede to the Philippine Government the public lands mentioned in the bill.

Mr. MOORE. It does not say so in terms in this section.

Mr. HELM. The word "cede" is not used, but I think a word of like import is used.

Mr. MOORE. It places any rights in the property which the United States may have acquired in these islands under the "control of the government of said islands, to be administered for the benefit of the inhabitants thereof." Does the gentleman interpret that as meaning that the United States in passing this law waives all right and title to these lands?

Mr. HELM. Speaking for myself, I have no doubt it was an attempted cession on the part of this Government of the land to the Philippine Government—the public lands. It is already owned by the Philippine people.

Mr. MOORE. That is to say, though we have made settlement with Spain and paid actual cash for whatever lands and rights we possess in the islands, by this bill we waive all right and title to the lands?

Mr. HELM. It is going to be very hard for this Government ever to right the wrong that, in my opinion, it committed when it waged war on the Filipinos.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] permit me to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] that this is just a repetition of the present law? The organic law, the law passed 12 years ago, framed by Secretary Root and Gov. Taft, did exactly what this bill does—it turned all these lands over to the Filipino people. This bill does not give them a foot of land that does not now belong to them.

Mr. MOORE. If the gentleman will permit me, so long as he has ventured this statement, I will say to him that I have heard one or two gentlemen take varying views of this question. One says we own this land in fee. Others say this property belongs to the Filipinos.

Mr. JONES. Who says we own it in fee?

Mr. MOORE. I think the gentleman from Minnesota said so.

Mr. JONES. I did not understand him to say that the people of the United States owned it.

Mr. MOORE. I understood some gentleman to say that. I recall that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] said there was a right in fee to the United States in this land.

Mr. JONES. At this time?

Mr. MOORE. Yes.

Mr. JONES. I did not hear the gentleman from Minnesota say that.

Mr. MOORE. I have heard it stated on the other side in the discussion. I would like the gentleman himself to state whether it is his understanding, like that of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM], that in passing this bill we waive whatever claim the United States has to title in these lands?

Mr. JONES. That is absolutely my understanding. We have already done it, and this simply reaffirms what we have already done, except as to such land as the President is given the authority to reserve for military and other purposes.

Mr. MILLER. I would like to ask a question of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM].

Mr. HELM. Very well.

Mr. MILLER. This bill continues in force and effect the present laws enacted by the Philippine Legislature and the commission. The gentleman is aware of the fact that at present there are laws providing for the acquisition of homesteads on the public domain in the Philippine Islands and the acquisition of timber concessions on the public domain?

Mr. HELM. I should think that this bill enacted, following such law as the gentleman refers to, would be self-operating and would repeal them. I believe that the enactment of this bill, being inconsistent with the law the gentleman speaks of, would supersede the present laws.

Mr. MILLER. I do not assume that it will be inconsistent. There are laws providing for the acquisition of the public domain by homesteaders and timbermen. This does not enact a law. This bill says that if the Philippine Legislature should enact a law or repeal an old law it has first to have the sanction of the President.

Mr. HELM. I was referring particularly to that feature of the bill relating to timber and mining and lands.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has again expired. All time has expired on this amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the amendment.

Mr. JONES. All time has expired.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out all after the word "advisable," in line 22, page 7, down to and including the word "States," in line 1 of page 8.

Mr. Chairman, this provision is that the acts of the Philippine Legislature, in reference to lands, timber and mining, hereafter enacted shall not go into effect until they are approved by the President. Approved by the President when? It might be a year of 20 years after those acts were passed.

Now, the act fully safeguards in other respects the passage of any bill by the Philippine Legislature, because it gives to the Governor General the right of veto, and then if the Filipino Legislature in both houses passes the bill by a two-thirds vote over the Governor General's veto, it gives to the President an absolute veto. The Philippine Legislature can pass no bill on any subject which the President can not absolutely stop. He can direct the Governor General, who is his appointee, to veto the bill in the first instance. Then if the bill is passed over the Governor General's veto by the legislature, the President has the absolute veto, because it can not go into effect until it meets his approval—until he has approved it.

Now, that is safeguard enough. But here is a provision to the effect that no act of the Philippine Legislature relating to certain subjects shall go into effect until the President shall have approved it. There is no requirement as to the time when the President shall have approved it. No one can tell anything about it. If they pass any act relating to mines or forestry or timber or lands, the bill has to be transmitted. Although it has met with the approval of the Governor General, the President's appointee, the bill will have to be transmitted to the United States and approved by the President. He may have no objection to it. If he has any objection, he can easily stop it under the other provisions of the bill.

I think it is an unnecessary reflection upon the Philippine Legislature for us to assume at the outset that they do not know enough about their own lands and their own timber and their own minerals to legislate properly without first receiving the approval of the President of the United States, although he still has the power of veto.

Now, I am not in favor of giving an "Indian gift" to the Philippine Islands in the way of government. I am in favor of testing them, and either showing that they do not know how to manage a government—and I think they do—in which case all thought of self-government for the time being will have to be changed, or showing that they are equal to independence. What I want to do is to make them friends of ours. What would happen if Canada could not dispose of her lands or if Australia could not dispose of her lands? Where would the patriotic sentiments of those countries be if every time they enacted a land law or mining law or a timber law they had to send it over to be approved by the King of England? And yet we are talking about giving greater liberty to these islands in the end than Canada or Australia enjoys. No one would think for a moment that the Canadians would be loyal, as they are, or that the Australians would be loyal, as they are, to England, if they did not have the power themselves and the responsibility of disposing of those things which they own.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the conditions touching Canada and Australia in their relations to England are quite different from the conditions with respect to the relations between the Philippine Islands and the United States. England is an imperial Government—a monarchy. Canada and Australia were colonized by English-speaking people—people of the blood, spirit, and race of England. As I said the other day, the people of the Philippine Islands are not of our blood, not of our spirit, and not of our race.

I shall not vote for the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], notwithstanding my earnest desire at the earliest possible moment to give to those people absolute control over their governmental affairs; and not only that, but absolute independence and the withdrawal of all sovereignty on the part of the United States.

Favoring, as I do, liberal self-government in the Philippines, the reason I shall not vote for the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois is that it has been the thought of the committee that in view of the fact that we are retaining sovereignty for the present there might be danger of certain land laws being passed by the Philippine Legislature, not in bad faith on its part, which might affect our foreign relations. It might easily be possible for the Legislature of the Philippine Islands in the best of faith to pass legislation which seemed to it wise, and yet which might, if it should be permitted to become law, involve our own country in international difficulties. That is the main idea upon which this proposition has been placed in the bill, requiring the affirmative action of the President before these laws shall become effective.

It has been suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that the Governor General of the Philippines is the President's appointee. That is true. The gentleman from Illinois said the President could instruct the Governor General to veto a measure. Well, perhaps the President of the United States might know nothing of the measure. He is not advised as to every bill that is introduced in the Philippine Legislature. He is not advised, until after it has been approved, as to any act that passes the assembly and is approved by the Governor General. Then, again, it is not exactly correct to say that the Governor General in the service is always the appointee of the particular President serving. If I remember correctly, the Governor General appointed by President Taft held until August or September of last year. At all events he held office many months after the beginning of the present administration before President Wilson made the appointment of Gov. Harrison. There might be differences in ideas as to policy. The Governor General would not be compelled to veto the bill simply because the President thought it ought to be vetoed, even if it were possible and practicable for the President to make such a suggestion.

Mr. MANN. The President could remove the Governor General over night.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Oh, that may be, but this is dealing with property rights which have been ceded gratuitously by the Federal Government——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JONES. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Tennessee be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Tennessee be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I thank the gentleman. As I say, we are dealing with property rights, which have been ceded gratuitously by the Government of the United States for the benefit of the people of the Philippine Islands. It has been thought wise to move conservatively. I do not agree with the gentleman from Illinois that this provision in the bill so binds and controls the Filipino people as that there will be difficulty on their part in legislating for themselves, and that it will not give to them full and fair opportunity to legislate upon the matter of their public lands. It certainly does give them that opportunity. All that it does is to maintain a conservative policy, and makes assurance doubly sure that errors will not be made.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, so far as my judgment goes, I am very much opposed to the proposed amendment. We in this country have had a good deal of experience with the matter of land laws. There is quite a good deal of difference of opinion expressed here on the floor from time to time as to who is responsible for the mistakes or wrongdoings, or whatever it may be called, in connection with our land laws in the West, but we all agree that the policy has been wrong. Sometimes we blame one person, and then, again, we blame somebody else. Sometimes we use the word "fraud" in referring to the procedure, and sometimes we say "mistake." But as to its being erroneous and improper, we all agree. Now, in the Philippine Islands the government is just about to begin its operations, and these lands are to be disposed of. I think for the present it is not too much to ask that these enactments as they pass the Philippine Legislature be sent here for the approval of the President. The President can then refer a bill to the proper Secretary, and the long experience of the United States Government in handling these matters will be brought to bear, and it can result only in benefit to the islands and in good to all concerned. Great fundamental statutes are to be passed establishing courses of procedure to be followed in the future, and every effort ought to be made to start right.

Mr. HELM. Is it not a fact that even at the present time our own efforts at conservation are rather crude and immature?

Mr. BRYAN. In some respects, perhaps so; but I would rather not mention the subject of conservation. Perhaps we would get a rise out of a number of people if we should do that. But then come our foreign relations, as suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], and I believe they are delicate enough to demand great care. Evidently the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] was speaking earnestly when he said that large grants might be made, that islands might be ceded, or something of that kind. It is not sufficient to say that the President can order it canceled or vetoed, because bills are oftentimes passed in the very last hours of a legislative session. No warning is given. It would be necessary to cable all the details across the Pacific or else send the bill by mail, which takes 30 days. It would take a long time for the President to know what was in the bill, and it would be too late for him to cable to the Governor General to veto it. So I think the bill ought to come over here after it has been acted upon, and the President ought to sign it before it becomes a law. Later on we may repeal these provisions and give them a wider latitude in government, but for the present I believe in defeating the proposed amendment.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think our own land laws ought to make us extremely proud that we know so much more about the subject than any other people do?

Mr. BRYAN. The way we managed them until Theodore Roosevelt took hold of it and changed the policy was a disgrace to this Nation. As soon as Theodore Roosevelt took the handling of the laws they were handled well.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman speaks from conversations he has had and what he has read. I was here in the Roosevelt administration and prior to that, and without reflection on either one of the administrations, I will say that I never could see any great difference in the handling of the land laws before or after. I never felt extremely proud about the way we do it, but if there is any one thing that we can set ourselves up as superior to the Filipinos in it is that.

Mr. BRYAN. Does not the gentleman from Illinois recall the time when the gentleman from Wyoming was at the head of the Committee on the Public Lands and he could do anything, and the other day, while we were considering the conservation bills, he could do nothing? [Laughter.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois, although I intend to vote for it. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee, Mr. JONES, for whom I entertain a very high regard, when he expects these people to walk alone? The gentleman and I were here when the appropriation of $20,000,000 was made. I do not know whether my friend voted for it or not; I know that the gentleman from Georgia, Judge BARTLETT, did not. I want to ask my friend when does he expect that the American Congress will be able to take its hand from the hand of these children and permit them to step alone?

Mr. JONES. In answer to the gentleman's question, I will say that they will be able to walk alone when we give them the opportunity to do so. I do not think they will ever be able to walk alone as long as we do not permit them to make the effort.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not see how the gentleman could answer me in any other way. Then why pass this bill; why not give them a chance? If you always lead the child along the street, he will always be dependent; he will never walk alone unless you take your hand away. Let them act for themselves. I am not going to speak directly to this section. Let us make no mistake; let the Filipino people understand that it is not the intention of the American people at this time to give them independence. I am ready to vote immediately for it when satisfied that these people are capable of self-government. I almost regret—no; I will not vote for this measure, as the gentleman from Tennessee seems to anticipate me. The query in my mind is this, What is the best thing to do for them? I wish the hour for separation was at hand. I understood the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] to say that it was wrong to make war on the Filipino people; that it was wrong for the American Government to have an armed dispute with the Filipinos. Did I understand the gentleman correctly?

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman give me time to answer the question?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; because I think the gentleman will do better with the five minutes than I.

Mr. HELM. The thing that has always staggered me in this matter was that the Filipinos helped the Americans to drive out the Spaniards, and as soon as we got the Spaniards driven out we then turned round and undertook to drive the Filipinos out. We must have promised or held out some inducement to the Filipino to get his assistance in getting rid of the Spaniards, and why should we, after getting rid of the Spaniards, turn round and make war on him? That is the thing I have never fully understood.

Mr. BUTLER. Let me refer the gentleman to the statement frequently made by Admiral Dewey, who was in command of the forces at Manila. If he will talk with the Admiral I think he will understand, as well as the rest of us, the occasion for the use of force.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. The gentleman, as I understood, said he was willing to vote for immediate independence as soon as he could be satisfied that they were entitled to it. When can the gentleman be satisfied that they are entitled to it?

Mr. BUTLER. Not while I live in this world. [Laughter and applause.] I am perfectly candid in this answer. I am not going to play any sort of trick on the Filipino or anybody else. I do not expect to see the day that I would be willing to vote to absolutely turn the Filipino loose to be swallowed up by some vulture nation. I believe in taking care of them. I conceive it to be our duty.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. BUTLER. What, Mr. Chairman, who kept my time? [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN], in discussing this matter a moment ago, went far afield, and referred to my action on land legislation. I have had a good deal to do with land legislation since I came to Congress 18 years ago, and if there is any one thing I am thankful about it is that in all the scandal that there has been about land laws and land legislation no part of it has had anything to do with any law that I have proposed or promoted in this House. [Applause.] I call on the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] to point to a law, great or small, important or unimportant, that I had any part in passing, or that I proposed to this House, that became a law, that has ever been essentially modified, or with regard to the operations of which there has been any considerable or general criticism by anybody anywhere.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. I have understood that the gentleman's bill for leasing land in Alaska was denounced; that is, was very seriously criticized by the conservationists generally as entirely out of place, and was defeated.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, yes, they did; and then the so-called conservationists proceeded to pass an Alaskan bill here the other day. I will leave it to any man on earth who knows about land legislation, who can have the two measures placed before him without knowing where either of them came from, and if he will not say that the bill that I proposed three years ago was better as a piece of legislation in the interest of development and of the public than that which we passed recently I will resign and go home. I am willing to do that. It protected the interests of the American people infinitely better than the bill that we passed the other day. It did not pass, because it was brought up under suspension of the rules, with 45 minutes debate and no opportunity to amend, and just at that particular time the Ballinger-Pinchot controversy was on, and you could not have passed the Lord's prayer through the House if it could in any way be connected with that controversy. It did not pass, because there were gentlemen who said that we ought to get 50 cents a ton royalty on the coal in Alaska, and we passed a bill the other day under which all Alaskan coal may be leased for 2 cents a ton. I ask everyone interested in the matter to read the provisions of the two bills.

Mr. Chairman, in addition to not having been connected with land legislation that has been seriously criticized, I have had the good fortune to have had a good deal to do with much land legislation that has been useful and helpful and that is to-day a credit to the Congress of the United States, as, for instance, the reclamation law which I reported to this House, the enlarged homestead law, which was criticized until we passed it, the three-year homestead law, and other legislation that was criticized by certain people until it passed and became a law. It is true some of it was criticized in advance of its enactment, as all land legislation is. I had the honor of introducing the bill which put an end to the wicked and fraudulent lieu-land law transactions.

But, Mr. Chairman, I did not rise to discuss those matters. The gentleman made a reference that necessitated my bringing them in. I should not have offered the amendment that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has offered, but I shall support it. I was willing to accept the provision he seeks to strike out as being one of those things which we sometimes provide out of excess of caution. Of course there is this danger about it: Men who have had to do with land legislation understand that the nearer you are to the land, the nearer to the land and its conditions is the legislating body that acts upon it, the wiser in the main and in the long run will be the legislation that is passed. There is, of course, danger that legislation that is wise and proper may be held up owing to the influence of unwise or overcautious presidential advisors.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired on this amendment. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 8, after the word "States," in line 1, insert the following:
"Provided, That the President shall approve or disapprove such an act within six months from and after its enactment and submission for his approval, and if not disapproved within such time it shall become a law, the same as if it had been approved."

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I sincerely trust that it will be the wisdom of the committee to accept this amendment. Very plainly, unless it or something like it is accepted, a serious situation will result.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman that I would just as soon have three months as six months.

Mr. MILLER. I thought of three months at first, but the distance from the Philippines here might make it advisable that the President should have as long a period of time as six months.

Mr. McKELLAR. When does the time begin to run, from the enactment or from a submission to the President?

Mr. MILLER. From the submission to the President.

Mr. JONES. I suggest three months——

Mr. MILLER. I am willing to accept that as an amendment.

Mr. JONES. For the reason that he could cable if he disapproved it. We do not want to hold this up forever.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment by striking out the word "six" and inserting the word "three."

Mr. JONES. Then do you have at the end, "Provided further"?

Mr. MILLER. That will come next.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest to the gentleman from Minnesota, if he will pardon the suggestion, that I believe that his amendment needs redrafting. I believe it tautological, although I am not certain, but I know it needs "Provided further," and I venture to suggest to the gentleman from Minnesota that he let this section be passed with his amendment pending, and if he will redraft it I think that he can improve the language.

Mr. MILLER. I am perfectly willing to do so.

Mr. JONES. With the right to return to it, I heartily concur in that suggestion.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to pass this amendment without prejudice.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. LEVY). The gentlemar from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to pass this amendment without prejudice. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment. After the word "as," in line 10, page 7, strike out the remainder of the line and all that which follows down to and including the word "States," in line 12, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "has been acquired for military or naval purposes of the United States," so that it will read "except such land or property as has been acquired for military or naval purposes of the United States."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 10, after the word "as," strike out the words "shall be designated by the President of the United States for military and other reservations of the Government of the United States," and insert in lieu thereof the words "has been acquired for military or naval purposes of the United States."

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, just a few words in reference to the amendment. I am inclined to believe the amendment might be made a better one if in the place of "acquired" there were substituted the words, "set apart for," and that later on there should be included in this language a provision in reference to lands that may have been set aside and now used or to be used for civil purposes of the United States. Now, I wish it distinctly understood that it is not the intent of this amendment to encroach in any respect upon any of the public domain or timberlands belonging to the Filipino people and intrusted to their legislature, but there are certain reservations in the Philippine Islands that have been used for military purposes, certain naval stations on which large sums of money have been expended by the United States, and I do not think these ought to be turned over to the Philippine Legislature, but ought to be retained by the United States Government. I do not think it ought to be in the province of the President himself by an Executive order to turn them over to the Philippine Government. It seems to me that property of this kind belonging to the United States ought not to be separated from the United States except by the one power that is authorized to alienate the property of the United States, and that is the Congress.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MILLER. I will.

Mr. MANN. Under the language of the bill—may I ask, Is this a copy from the existing law?

Mr. QUEZON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Under the language of the bill as it stands it excepts only such land or other property as shall be designated by the President of the United States for military or other reservations. Grammatically, of course, that refers to the future and not to the past, though I take it the intention was to cover existing reservations. That, of course, ought to be corrected.

Mr. JONES. The idea of the gentleman is that it should be "has been" instead of "shall"?

Mr. MANN. "Has been or shall be." Under this provision would the President have the power at any time, if this law is passed, to set aside any portion of the public domain over there which has not been disposed of for military or other reservations? I take it he would have.

Mr. JONES. I think he would have.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, unquestionably the President under this paragraph, unless it is changed, would have the power to alienate from the United States every foot of land and every item of property that we have in the Philippine Islands. That would include every reservation, every naval station, even Corregidor Island, which we have made a great fortress.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman is talking about another provision in this bill and not this one. There is another provision in the law which authorizes the President to turn over to the Philippine Government land now used as reservation, but it is not this provision.

Mr. MILLER. I understand that, but I had in mind coupling that provision with the one in this paragraph.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota just what the purpose of it is?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not understand the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. MILLER. The purpose of the amendment is that the property which has been designated heretofore and is now used for military and naval purposes shall not be turned over to the Philippine Government under the control of the Philippine Legislature without an act of Congress.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is in another section.

Mr. MANN. That is in the last proviso to this section, and not in this part of it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is, the amendment is not offered at the right place.

Mr. MILLER. Yes; I think it ought to be offered at both places. The proviso at the end enlarges on the language in the earlier part of the bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The language which the gentleman seeks to strike out is that language which authorizes the President now, which is the existing law, to designate public lands for military purposes. If the gentleman strikes that out, how would we get the lands that are necessary for military purposes, if it might be deemed necessary at some time?

Mr. MILLER. As I understand it, all the land we will ever want for military purposes we now have and hold as such, and the amendment which I propose is to prevent that being disposed of and alienated and handed over to the Philippine Legislature except by an act of Congress. The language of the paragraph as it stands is:

That all the property of the United States in the Philippine Islands is hereby turned over to the Philippine Islands and the legislature thereof excepting such as shall be designated by the President of the United States for military and other reservations.

Now, I propose that the President shall not have the power to say which of the military reservations that we have now we shall retain and which we shall hand over to the Philippine Islands. If some of the lands are not needed by us—and I know there are some—some that we do not need—they should be turned over by a congressional act rather than by an Executive order.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I could understand perfectly the gentleman's amendment if it went to the proviso part of the bill.

Mr. MILLER. I intend to offer it also to the proviso.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. Before the gentleman offers his amendment I am going to ask unanimous consent to amend line 10 by striking out the words "shall be" and inserting in place thereof the words "has been or."

Mr. MANN. Why not make it "has been or shall be"?

Mr. JONES. That would cover it. After the word "as" insert the words "has been or." If that amendment is made, then the gentleman will not want to amend this provision?

Mr. MILLER. I will not. It will answer all the purposes I had in mind.

Mr. JONES. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move that on line 10, page 7, after the word "as," the words "has been or" be added.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 10, after the word "as," insert the words "has been or."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman withhold that for a second?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman withhold that point until 5 o'clock?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment I offered a few moments ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the words "by order of the President," in line 5, page 8, and in lieu thereof substituting "by act of Congress."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 8, line 5, strike out the words "by order of the President" and insert in lieu thereof "by act of Congress."

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I sincerely trust that the majority members of the committee will agree to this amendment. We have had a great deal of controversy back and forth respecting it, and my present recollection is that we were not very far apart, and very likely, upon reflection, the majority of the members will agree with me to make that change.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The only lands that are contemplated to be reserved here are lands for military purposes?

Mr. MILLER. Practically all.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman from Minnesota think that the Commander in Chief of the Army is better capacitated to select lands for military purposes than is all this body of 435 men, very few of whom ever saw the Philippine Islands, and who, after all, would have nothing except the advice of Army or Navy officers to act upon?

Mr. MILLER. Of course the gentleman very well knows that the Commander in Chief of the American Army would not make the selection. The recommendation would be made in this way: The recommendation would come from the people in the islands, people representing the Government of the United States, and upon their recommendation the President would act.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman knows a recommendation would be made by Army or Navy military advisers?

Mr. MILLER. Yes; Army or Navy military advisers; and it is upon that information that Congress would act.

But, Mr. Chairman, it has never been a principle of law or a principle of our practice that the President of the United States should by Executive order be able to alienate property belonging to the United States.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Would he alienate it?

Mr. MILLER. We are giving him authority to do that, and I think it is contrary to good judgment. As I said a moment ago, if this remains in the bill, the present President would not do it. I have vastly too much confidence in him to expect that he would do that. But we do not know who is going to be President of the United States in the future. Some President might be there who, if so disposed, could by a stroke of his pen alienate every military reservation, every fortification, every military improvement, every naval improvement we have in the Philippine Islands. I do not think it is safe to put too much power in the hands of one man.

Mr. McKELLAR. Suppose the President ever did that, does the gentleman suppose it would be altogether bad?

Mr. MILLER. I suppose it would be the most fatal step that has ever been taken in half a century of American history. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I stated before, the President of the United States could, by a stroke of his pen, give away Corregidor, Caballo, El Frailey, Carabao, and all the fortifications there. He could give away the Dewey Dock at Olongapo. He could give away the naval station there. We never would consent to the idea that he had that power respecting any similar places in the United States, and why should we turn that power over to him relative to our property in the Philippine Islands? I do not think all the wisdom in the world is centered in any one man. I think the wisdom of Congress, on the whole, in the long run, as gathered by Members of Congress throughout the United States, is better than the wisdom of any one man; and I think we could more safely repose the future history and course of the military establishment, such as we have in the Philippine Islands, in Congress rather than surrender it to the President.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GOULDEN. Does the gentleman think the President would take so important a step as that without consultation with his Cabinet and, perhaps, with leaders in Congress?

Mr. MILLER. I do not think a wise man would.

Mr. GOULDEN. Have we had an unwise man in the presidential chair?

Mr. MILLER. We have had men in the President's office who might do just that sort of thing.

Mr. GOULDEN. I can not agree with the gentleman on that.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, as I stated in reply to the question of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] in regard to this proviso, it was inserted in the bill at the request of the War Department. I also stated then, and I wish to repeat now, that for a number of years the War Department has been seeking to secure this legislation. The Insular Affairs Committee has been requested by the War Department more than once to report out a bill authorizing the President to do just what is proposed shall be done in the proviso to this section of the bill.

The purpose of this legislation is simply to give the President of the United States the right to dispose of some small, undesirable pieces of land of little value and for which the United States Government has no use and is not occupying. Neither the President nor anyone else now has authority to dispose of this, as I have said, useless land, so far as the United States is concerned. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] proposes, instead of giving this authority to the President, who, he says, should not be clothed with so much power, since he could, if he were so minded, dispose of all of our fortifications, naval stations, and other military reservations in the islands, but that it should be lodged in the hands of Congress. The trouble about that is that some of these pieces of land are not worth 5 pesos, and it would be necessary to get an act through Congress to dispose of them if Mr. MILLER's amendment were adopted. We know little or nothing as to the location of these pieces of land, absolutely nothing as to their metes and bounds. It would be well-nigh impossible for Congress to enact the legislation necessary to dispose of this land, and I can not understand how there can be opposition to a proposition such as is embodied in this proviso, one that both the last Republican and the present Democratic administration have asked Congress to pass. I am sure that no one can seriously entertain for one moment the idea that any President of the United States would ever so misuse and abuse the authority here given to dispose of the island of Corregidor, along with its fortifications, which have cost the United States millions of dollars. Such an idea as that is too preposterous for serious consideration. I am perfectly willing to trust the President of the United States and the Secretary of War to dispose of the land contemplated in this section. It would be done through the Secretary of War. We gave to the President the power to reserve the land. Why should we not give to him the power to dispose of such parts of it as are not and never will be needed by the United States?

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JONES. I will.

Mr. MILLER. The gentleman well knows that if we should leave it to the heads of departments, they would like us to pass a general law that would enable them to do all the detailed work of their departments. But does not the gentleman think the purpose he has in mind, which is a very commendable one, namely, to restore these little odds and ends of land to the Filipino people, which we do not need and which, of course, we ought to restore, could be just as well accomplished by having the President send a message to Congress with a list of those lands, containing a little description of them and a statement as to what they are? We can pass it by unanimous consent.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman knows, as was stated by his and my colleague on the Committee on Insular Affairs, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], the other day, that we have now on the calendar a bill with a unanimous report from our committee, a thousand times more important than the subject of his amendment, to which there is absolutely no objection, but for which it is impossible to get consideration. I refer to the Porto Rican bill. The gentleman knows as a practical legislator that it is almost impossible to secure congressional action upon minor matters, such as the one under discussion. If we wait for Congress to pass special legislation disposing of these small parcels of land they will never be disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FLOOD of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 18459) to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ALASKAN COAL BILL.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report on the bill H. R. 14233, the Alaskan coal bill, for printing in the RECORD under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 14233) to provide for the leasing of coal lands in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 1178).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14233) to provide for the leasing of coal lands in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate insert the following:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to survey the lands of the United States in the Territory of Alaska known to be valuable for their deposits of coal, preference to be given first in favor of surveying lands within those areas commonly known as the Bering River, Matanuska, and Nenana coal fields, and thereafter to such areas or coal fields as lie tributary to established settlements or existing or proposed rail or water transportation lines: Provided, That such surveys shall be executed in accordance with existing laws and rules and regulations governing the survey of public lands. There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $100,000 for the purpose of making the surveys herein provided for, to continue available until expended: Provided, That any surveys heretofore made under the authority or by the approval of the Department of the Interior may be adopted and used for the purposes of this act.

"SEC. 2. That the President of the United States shall designate and reserve from use, location, sale, lease, or disposition not exceeding 5,120 acres of coal-bearing land in the Bering River field and not exceeding 7,680 acres of coal-bearing land in the Matanuska field, and not to exceed one-half of the other coal lands in Alaska: Provided, That the coal deposits in such reserved areas may be mined under the direction of the President when, in his opinion, the mining of such coal in such reserved areas, under the direction of the President, becomes necessary, by reason of an insufficient supply of coal at a reasonable price for the requirements of Government works, construction and operation of Government railroads, for the Navy, for national protection, or for relief from monopoly or oppressive conditions.

"SEC. 3. That the unreserved coal lands and coal deposits shall be divided by the Secretary of the Interior into leasing blocks or tracts of 40 acres each, or multiples thereof, and in such form as in the opinion of the Secretary will permit the most economical mining of the coal in such blocks, but in no case exceeding 2,560 acres in any one leasing block or tract; and thereafter the Secretary shall offer such blocks or tracts and the coal, lignite, and associated minerals therein for leasing, and may award leases thereof through advertisement, competitive bidding, or such other methods as he may by general regulations adopt, to any person above the age of 21 years who is a citizen of the United States, or to any association of such persons, or to any corporation organized under the laws of the United States or of any State or Territory thereof: Provided, That a majority of the stock of such corporation shall at all times be owned and held by citizens of the United States: And provided further, That no railroad or common carrier shall be permitted to take or acquire through lease or permit under this act any coal or coal lands in excess of such area or quantity as may be required and used solely for its own use, and such limitation of use shall be expressed in all leases or permits issued to railroads or common carriers hereunder: And provided further, That any person, association, or corporation qualified to become a lessee under this act and owning any pending claim under the public-land laws to any coal lands in Alaska may, within one year from the passage of this act, enter into an arrangement with the Secretary of the Interior by which such claim shall be fully relinquished to the United States; and if in the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior the circumstances connected with such claim justify so doing, the moneys paid by the claimant or claimants to the United States on account of such claim shall, by direction of the Secretary of the Interior, be returned and paid over to such person, association, or corporation as a consideration for such relinquishment.

"All claims of existing rights to any of such lands in which final proof has been submitted and which are now pending before the Commissioner of the General Land Office or the Secretary of the Interior for decision shall be adjudicated within one year from the passage of this act.

"SEC. 4. That a person, association, or corporation holding a lease of coal lands under this act may, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior and through the same procedure and upon the same terms and conditions as in the case of an original lease under this act, secure a further or new lease covering additional lands contiguous to those embraced in the original lease, but in no event shall the total area embraced in such original and new leases exceed in the aggregate 2,560 acres.

"That upon satisfactory showing by any lessee to the Secretary of the Interior that all of the workable deposits of coal within a tract covered by his or its lease will be exhausted, worked out, or removed within three years thereafter, the Secretary of the Interior may, within his discretion, lease to such lessee an additional tract of land or coal deposits, which, including the coal area remaining in the original lease, shall not exceed 2,560 acres, through the same procedure and under the same competitive conditions as in case of an original lease.

"SEC. 5. That, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, lessees holding under leases small blocks or areas may consolidate their said leases or holdings so as to include in a single holding not to exceed 2,560 acres of contiguous lands.

"SEC. 6. That each lease shall be for such leasing block or tract of land as may be offered or applied for, not exceeding in area 2,560 acres of land, to be described by the subdivisions of the survey, and no person, association, or corporation, except as hereinafter provided, shall be permitted to take or hold any interest as a stockholder or otherwise in more than one such lease under this act, and any interest held in violation of this proviso shall be forfeited to the United States by appropriate proceedings instituted by the Attorney General for that purpose in any court of competent jurisdiction, except that any such ownership and interest hereby forbidden which may be acquired by descent, will, judgment, or decree may be held for one year, and not longer, after its acquisition.

"SEC. 7. That any person who shall purchase, acquire, or hold any interest in two or more such leases, except as herein provided, or who shall knowingly purchase, acquire, or hold any stock in a corporation having an interest in two or more such leases, or who shall knowingly sell or transfer to one disqualified to purchase, or except as in this act specifically provided, disqualified to acquire, any such interest, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than three years and by a fine not exceeding $1,000: Provided, That any such ownership and interest hereby forbidden which may be acquired by descent, will, judgment, or decree may be held two years after its acquisition and not longer, and in case of minority or other disability such time as the court may decree.

"SEC. 8. That any director, trustee, officer, or agent of any corporation holding any interest in such a lease who shall, on behalf of such corporation, act in the purchase of any interest in another lease, or who shall knowingly act on behalf of such corporation in the sale or transfer of any such interest in any lease held by such corporation to any corporation or individual holding any interest in any such a lease, except as herein provided, shall be guilty of a felony and shall be subject to imprisonment for a term of not exceeding three years and a fine of not exceeding $1,000.

"SEC. 8a. If any of the lands or deposits leased under the provisions of this act shall be subleased, trusteed, possessed, or controlled by any device permanently, temporarily, directly, indirectly, tacitly, or in any manner whatsoever, so that they form part of or are in any wise controlled by any combination in the form of an unlawful trust, with consent of lessee, or form the subject of any contract or conspiracy in restraint of trade in the mining or selling of coal, entered into by the lessee, or of any holding of such lands by any individual, partnership, association, corporation, or control, in excess of two thousand five hundred and sixty acres in the Territory of Alaska, the lease thereof shall be forfeited by appropriate court proceedings.

"SEC. 9. That for the privilege of mining and extracting and disposing of the coal in the lands covered by his lease the lessee shall pay to the United States such royalties as may be specified in the lease, which shall not be less than 2 cents per ton, due and payable at the end of each month succeeding that of the shipment of the coal from the mine, and an annual rental, payable at the beginning of each year, on the lands covered by such lease, at the rate of 25 cents per acre for the first year thereafter, 50 cents per acre for the second, third, fourth, and fifth years, and $1 per acre for each and every year thereafter during the continuance of the lease, except that such rental for any year shall be credited against the royalties as they accrue for that year. Leases may be for periods of not more than 50 years each, subject to renewal, on such terms and conditions as may be authorized by law at the time of such renewal.

"SEC. 10. That in order to provide for the supply of strictly local and domestic needs for fuel the Secretary of the Interior may, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe in advance, issue to any applicant qualified under section 3 of this act a limited license or permit granting the right to prospect for, mine, and dispose of coal belonging to the United States on specified tracts, not to exceed 10 acres to any one person or association of persons, in any one coal field for a period of not exceeding 10 years, on such conditions not inconsistent with this act as in his opinion will safeguard the public interest, without payment of royalty for the coal mined or for the land occupied: Provided, That the acquisition or holding of a lease under the preceding sections of this act shall be no bar to the acquisition, holding, or operating under the limited license in this section permitted. And the holding of such a license shall be no bar to the acquisition or holding of such a lease or interest therein.

"SEC. 11. That any lease, entry, location, occupation, or use permitted under this act shall reserve to the Government of the United States the right to grant or use such easements in, over, through, or upon the land leased, entered, located, occupied, or used as may be necessary or appropriate to the working of the same or other coal lands by or under authority of the Government, and for other purposes: Provided, That said Secretary, in his discretion, in making any lease under this act, may reserve to the United States the right to lease, sell, or otherwise dispose of the surface of the lands embraced within such lease under existing law or laws hereafter enacted in so far as said surface is not necessary for use by the lessee in extracting and removing the deposits of coal therein. If such reservation is made, it shall be so determined before the offering of such lease.

"That the said Secretary during the life of the lease is authorized to issue such permits for easements herein provided to be reserved, and to permit the use of such other public lands in the Territory of Alaska as may be necessary for the construction and maintenance of coal washeries or other works incident to the mining or treatment of coal, which lands may be occupied and used jointly or severally by lessees or permittees, as may be determined by said Secretary.

"SEC. 12. That no lease issued under authority of this act shall be assigned or sublet except with the consent of the Secretary of the Interior. Each lease shall contain provisions for the purpose of insuring the exercise of reasonable diligence, skill, and care in the operation of said property, and for the safety and welfare of the miners and for the prevention of undue waste, including a restriction of the workday to not exceeding eight hours in any one day for underground workers except in cases of emergency; provisions securing the workers complete freedom of purchase, requiring the payment of wages at least twice a month in lawful money of the United States, and providing proper rules and regulations to secure fair and just weighing or measurement of the coal mined by each miner, and such other provisions as are needed for the protection of the interests of the United States, for the prevention of monopoly, and for the safeguarding of the public welfare.

"SEC. 13. That the possession of any lessee of the land or coal deposits leased under this act for all purposes involving adverse claims to the leased property shall be deemed the possession of the United States, and for such purposes the lessee shall occupy the same relation to the property leased as if operated directly by the United States.

"SEC. 14. That any such lease may be forfeited and canceled by appropriate proceeding in a court of competent jurisdiction whenever the lessee fails to comply with any provision of the lease or of general regulations promulgated under this act: Provided, That the possession of any lessee of any lands covered by his lease and the operation of the mines and other works thereon or the title of the product thereof shall not be interfered with by the Secretary of the Interior except after an appropriate proceeding in the district court of Alaska instituted for the purpose of securing a forfeiture or termination of such lease, and such forfeiture or termination shall take effect only from the date of entry of final judgment declaring such forfeiture or termination: Provided further, That such court proceedings must be instituted within 90 days after notice to the lessee of the facts constituting such cause of action, or the same shall be forever barred.

"SEC. 15. That on and after the approval of this act no lands in Alaska containing deposits of coal withdrawn from entry or sale shall be disposed of or acquired in any manner except as provided in this act: Provided, That the passage of this act shall not affect any proceeding now pending in the Department of the Interior, and any such proceeding may be carried to a final determination in said department notwithstanding the passage hereof: Provided further, That no lease shall be made, under the provisions hereof, of any land, a claim for which is pending in the Department of the Interior at the date of the passage of this act, until and unless such claim is finally disposed of by the department adversely to the claimant.

"SEC. 16. That all statements, representations, or reports required, unless otherwise specified, by the Secretary of the Interior under this act shall be upon oath and in such form and upon such blanks as the Secretary of the Interior may require.

"SEC. 17. That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to prescribe the necessary and proper rules and regulations and to do any and all things necessary to carry out and accomplish the purposes of this act.

"SEC. 18. That all acts and parts of acts in conflict herewith are hereby repealed."

And the Senate agree to the same.

STATEMENT.

The House bill H. R. 14233 as it passed the House on September 5, 1914, and went to the Senate was not considered for amendments in the Senate Public Lands Committee, but the committee instead reported to the Senate an entirely new bill, which was substituted for the House bill and which, with various amendments, was adopted in the Senate, passing that body on September 24, 1914.

Your conferees, from precedent, used the Senate substitute bill as a basis for work in conference and have brought the original House and Senate bills into harmony by certain modifications to the Senate substitute, within the limits of conferences, the provisions of which embody the essential features of the bills. These two bills, for the purpose of comparison with the bill as it emerged from conference and which is printed at length in the conference report, are herein set forth:

[H. R. 14233, Sixty-third Congress, second session.]

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

September 5 (calendar day, September 9), 1914.

An act to provide for the leasing of coal lands in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes.

"Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to survey the lands of the United States in the Territory of Alaska known to be valuable for their deposits of coal, and to lease such lands or the deposits of coal contained therein, as hereafter provided, preference to be given first in favor of surveying lands within those areas commonly known as the Bering River, Matanuska, and Nenana coal fields, and thereafter to such areas or coal fields as lie tributary to established settlements or existing or proposed rail or water transportation lines: Provided, That such surveys shall be executed in accordance with existing laws and rules and regulations governing the survey of the public lands: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior may, as herein provided, with a view to facilitating development and without awaiting said surveys, make such awards of leases in the coal fields in Alaska as he may deem advisable and under such regulations as he may prescribe; the locations of such leases shall be distinctly marked upon the ground under his direction, so that their boundaries can be readily traced.

"SEC. 2. That the President of the United States shall designate and reserve from use, location, sale, lease, or other disposition not exceeding 5,120 acres of coal-bearing land in the Bering River field and not exceeding 7,680 acres of coal-bearing land in the Matanuska field, and in addition the President may, in his discretion, designate and reserve from use, location, sale, lease, or other disposition not exceeding 5,120 acres of coal-bearing lands in each of the other coal fields in the Territory of Alaska: Provided, That the deposits in said reserved areas may be mined under the direction of the President when, in his opinion, the coal is required for Government works or in the construction and operation of Government railroads, or is required by the Navy, or is necessary for national protection or for relief from oppressive conditions brought about through a monopoly of coal.

"SEC. 3. That the unreserved coal lands and coal deposits shall be divided by the Secretary of the Interior into leasing blocks or tracts of 40 acres each, or multiples thereof, and in such form as, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior, will permit the most economical mining of the coal in such blocks, but in no case exceeding 2,560 acres in any one leasing block or tract; and thereafter the Secretary of the Interior shall, in his discretion, from time to time, upon the request of any qualified applicant or on his own motion, offer such lands or deposits of coal for leasing, and award leases thereof through advertisement, by competitive bidding, or, in case of lignite or low-grade coals, such other methods as he may by general regulations adopt, to any person above the age of 21 years who is a citizen of the United States, or to any association of such persons, or to any corporation or municipality organized under the laws of the United States or of any State or Territory thereof: Provided, That no railroad or other common carrier shall be permitted to take or acquire through lease or permit under this act any coal or coal lands in excess of such area or quantity as may be required and used solely for its own use, and such limitation of use shall be expressed in all leases or permits issued to railroads or common carriers hereunder. That such a railroad or common carrier may be permitted to take, under the foregoing provisions, not to exceed one lease upon and for each 200 miles of its line in actual operation. The term 'railroad' or 'common carrier' as used in this act shall include any company or corporation owning or operating a railroad, whether under a contract, agreement, or lease, and any company or corporation subsidiary or auxiliary thereto, whether directly or indirectly connected with such railroad or common carrier: Provided further, That each applicant for lease under this act shall execute a good and sufficient bond, to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior, in such reasonable sum as may be fixed by him, to insure good faith in the fulfillment of the terms and conditions of the bid, the lease, and of this act: And provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior shall not, during any calendar year, lease to exceed 10 per cent of the total area of unreserved coal lands in Alaska.

"The possession of any lessee of the land or coal deposits leased under this act, for all purposes involving adverse claims to the leased property, shall be deemed the possession of the United States, and for such purposes the lessee shall occupy the same relation to the property leased as if operated directly by the United States.

"SEC. 4. That a person, association, or corporation holding a lease of lands or coal deposits under this act may, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, upon a finding by him that it will be for the advantage of the lessee and the United States, secure a modification of his or its original lease by including additional lands or coal deposits contiguous to those embraced in such lease, but in no event shall the total area embraced in such modified lease exceed in the aggregate two thousand five hundred and sixty acres.

"That upon satisfactory showing by any lessee to the Secretary of the Interior that all of the workable deposits of coal within a tract covered by his or its lease will be exhausted, worked out, or removed within three years thereafter, the Secretary of the Interior may, within his discretion, lease to such lessee an additional tract of land or coal deposits, which, including the coal area remaining in the original lease, shall not exceed two thousand five hundred and sixty acres, through the same procedure and under the same competitive conditions as in case of an original lease.

"SEC. 5. That no person, association, or corporation, except as herein provided, shall be permitted to take or hold any interest as a stockholder or otherwise in more than one lease under this act; and any interest held in violation of this section shall be forfeited to the United States by appropriate proceedings instituted by the Attorney General for that purpose in any court of competent jurisdiction: Provided, That any such ownership or interest hereby forbidden which may be acquired by descent, will, judgment, or decree may be held for two years after its acquisition and not longer.

"SEC. 6. That no person, association, or corporation holding a lease under the provisions of this act shall hold any interest, direct or indirect, in any agency, corporate or otherwise, engaged in the resale of coal purchased from such lessee, or enter into any agreement, arrangement, or other device to enhance the price or to limit the output of coal, and any violation of the provisions of this section shall be ground for the forfeiture of the lease or interest held.

"That any person who shall purchase, acquire, or hold any interest in two or more such leases, except as herein provided, or who shall knowingly purchase, acquire, or hold any stock in a corporation having an interest in two or more such leases, or who shall knowingly sell or transfer to one disqualified to purchase, or, except as in this act specifically provided, disqualified to acquire, any such interest, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than three years and by a fine not exceeding $1,000: Provided, That any such ownership and interest hereby forbidden which may be acquired by descent, will, judgment, or decree may be held two years after its acquisition and not longer, and in case of minority or other disability such time as the court may decree.

"That any director, trustee, officer, or agent of any corporation holding any interest in such a lease who, on behalf of such corporation, shall knowingly participate in the purchase of any interest in another lease, or in the sale or transfer of any such interest in any lease held by such corporation to any corporation or individual holding any interest in any other lease under this act, except as herein provided, shall be guilty of a felony, and shall be subject to imprisonment for a term of not exceeding three years and a fine of not exceeding $1,000.

"SEC. 7. That for the privilege of mining and extracting and disposing of the coal in the lands covered by his lease the lessee shall pay to the United States such royalties as may be specified in the lease, which shall be not less than 2 cents per ton of 2,000 pounds, due and payable at the end of each month succeeding that of the extraction of the coal from the mine, and an annual rental, payable at the date of such lease and annually thereafter, on the lands or coal deposits covered by such lease, at such rate as may be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior prior to offering the lease, which shall be not less than 25 cents per acre for the first year, not less than 50 cents per acre for the second, third, fourth, and fifth years, respectively, and not less than $1 per acre for each and every year thereafter during the continuance of the lease, except that such rental for any year shall be credited against the royalties as they accrue for that year. Leases shall be for indeterminate periods upon condition of continued operation of the mine or mines, except when operations shall be interrupted by strikes, the elements, or casualties not attributable to the lessee, and upon the further condition that at the end of each 20-year period succeeding the date of the lease such readjustment of terms and conditions may be made as the Secretary of the Interior may determine unless otherwise provided by law at the time of the expiration of such periods.

"SEC. 8. That in order to provide for the supply of strictly local and domestic needs for fuel, the Secretary of the Interior may, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe in advance, issue to any applicant qualified to obtain a lease under section 3 of this act a limited license or permit granting the right to prospect for, mine, and dispose of coal belonging to the United States on specified tracts, not to exceed 10 acres in any one coal field, for a period of not exceeding 10 years on such conditions, not inconsistent with this act, as in his opinion will safeguard the public interest, without payment of royalty for the coal mined or for the land occupied: Provided, That not more than one such limited license or permit shall be issued to any single applicant hereunder: Provided further, That the acquisition or holding of a lease under the preceding sections of this act shall be no bar to the acquisition of such tract or operation of such mine under said limited license.

"SEC. 9. That any lease, permit, occupation, or use permitted under this act shall reserve to the Secretary of the Interior the right to permit, for joint or several use, such easements, including roads, rights of way, sites for coal washeries, coke ovens, tunnels in, over, through, or upon the lands leased, occupied, or used, as may be necessary or appropriate to the working of the same or other coal lands and treatment and shipment of the products thereof by or under authority of the Government, its lessees or permittees, and for other public purposes: Provided, That said Secretary, in his discretion, in making any lease under this act, may reserve to the United States the right to lease, sell, or otherwise dispose of the surface of the lands embraced within such lease, under existing law or laws hereafter enacted, in so far as said surface is not necessary for use by the lessee in extracting and removing the deposits of coal therein: Provided further, That if such reservation is made it shall be so determined before the offering of such lease.

"That the said Secretary during the life of the lease is authorized to issue such permits for easements herein provided to be reserved, and to permit the use of such other public lands in the Territory of Alaska, as may be necessary for the construction and maintenance of coal washeries or other works incident to the mining or treatment of coal, which lands may be occupied and used jointly or severally by lessees or permittes, as may be determined by said Secretary.

"SEC. 10. That no lease issued under authority of this act shall be assigned or sublet except with the consent of the Secretary of the Interior. Each lease shall contain provisions for insuring the exercise of reasonable diligence, skill, and care in the operation of said property; a provision that such rules for the safety and welfare of the miners and for the prevention of waste as may be prescribed from time to time by the said Secretary shall be observed, including a restriction of not exceeding eight hours' actual labor in any one day for underground workers except in cases of emergency, provisions securing the workmen complete freedom of purchase, requiring the payment of wages at least twice each month in lawful money of the United States, and providing proper rules and regulations to insure the fair and just weighing or measurement of the coal mined by each miner, and such other provisions as he may deem necessary for the protection of the interests of the United States, for the prevention of monopoly, and for the safeguarding of the public welfare.

"SEC. 11. That any such lease may be forfeited and canceled by an appropriate proceeding in a court of competent jurisdiction whenever the lessee fails to comply with any provision of this act, of the lease, or of general regulations promulgated under this act and in force at the date of the lease; and the lease may provide for resort to appropriate methods for the settlement of disputes or for remedies for breach of specified conditions thereof.

"SEC. 12. That all statements, representations, or reports required by the Secretary of the Interior under this act shall be upon oath unless otherwise specified, and in such form and upon such blanks as the Secretary of the Interior may require, and any person making any false statement, representation, or report under oath shall be subject to punishment as for perjury.

"SEC. 13. That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to prescribe necessary and proper rules and regulations and to do any and all things necessary to carry out and accomplish the purposes of this act.

"SEC. 14. All moneys received under the provisions of this act shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts, in accordance with section 3 of the Alaska railway act, approved March 12, 1914.

"SEC. 15. That on and after the approval of this act no lands in Alaska containing deposits of coal shall be disposed of or acquired in any manner except as provided in this act: Provided, That the passage of this act shall not affect any proceeding now pending in the Department of the Interior, and any such proceeding may be carried to a final determination in said department notwithstanding the passage hereof.

"SEC. 16. The Secretary of the Interior shall annually make report to Congress of all leases awarded under the provisions of this act in reasonable detail and also of all leases then outstanding and the amounts collected for the prior fiscal year on account of each lease.

"Passed the House of Representatives September 5, 1914.

"Attest:

"SOUTH TRIMBLE, Clerk."

[H. R. 14233, Sixty-third Congress, second session.]

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

September 28, 1914.

An act to provide for the leasing of coal lands in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes.

"Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to survey the lands of the United States in the Territory of Alaska known to be valuable for their deposits of coal, preference to be given first in favor of surveying lands within those areas commonly known as the Bering River, Matanuska, and Nenana coal fields, and thereafter to such areas or coal fields as lie tributary to established settlements or existing or proposed rail or water transportation lines: Provided, That such surveys shall be executed in accordance with existing laws and rules and regulations governing the survey of public lands. There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $100,000 for the purpose of making the surveys herein provided for, to continue available until expended: Provided, That any surveys heretofore made under the authority or by the approval of the Department of the Interior may be adopted and used for the purposes of this act.

"SEC. 2. That after the execution of the surveys provided for in this act the President of the United States shall designate and reserve from use, location, sale, lease, or disposition not exceeding 5,120 acres of coal-bearing land in the Bering River field and not exceeding 7,680 acres of coal-bearing land in the Matanuska field, and not to exceed one-half of the other coal lands in Alaska: Provided, That the coal deposits in such reserved areas may be mined under the direction of the President when, in his opinion, the mining of such coal in such reserved areas, under the direction of the President, becomes necessary, by reason of an insufficient supply of coal at a reasonable price for the requirements of Government works, construction and operation of Government railroads, for the Navy, for national protection, and for relief from monopoly or oppressive conditions.

"SEC. 3. That the unreserved coal lands and coal deposits shall be divided by the Secretary of the Interior into leasing blocks or tracts of 40 acres each, or multiples thereof, and in such form as in the opinion of the Secretary will permit the most economical mining of the coal in such blocks, but in no case exceeding 2,560 acres in any one leasing block or tract; and thereafter, subject to any prior valid existing rights, which said rights may be perfected under the laws in force at the time the same were initiated, and under the rules, regulations, and practices of the Land Department relative to the acquisition of such rights, as interpreted and applied by the department at the time of the initiation of such rights, the Secretary shall offer such blocks or tracts and the coal, lignite, and associated minerals therein for leasing, and shall award leases thereof through advertisement, competitive bidding, or such other methods as he may by general regulations adopt, to any person above the age of 21 years who is a citizen of the United States, or to any association of such persons, or to any corporation organized under the laws of the United States or of any State or Territory thereof: Provided, That a majority of the stock of such corporation shall at all times be owned and held by citizens of the United States: Provided, That no more than one of said blocks shall be included in any lease: And provided further, That no railroad or common carrier shall be permitted to take or acquire through lease or permit under this act any coal or coal lands in excess of such area or quantity as may be required and used solely for its own use, and such limitation of use shall be expressed in all leases or permits issued to railroads or common carriers hereunder: And provided further, That any person, association, or corporation qualified to become a lessee under this act and owning any pending claim under the public-land laws to any coal lands in Alaska may, within one year from the passage of this act, enter into an arrangement with the Secretary of the Interior by which such claim shall be fully relinquished to the United States; and if in the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior the circumstances connected with such claim justify so doing, the moneys paid by the claimant or claimants to the United States on account of such claim may, by direction of the Secretary of the Interior, be returned and paid over to such person, association, or corporation as a consideration for such relinquishment, or in lieu of such repayment the Secretary of the Interior may execute and deliver to said person, association, or corporation, in preference to any other lessee, a lease under this act of the land so claimed or any part thereof within the limitations of area and location fixed by this section, and the said moneys may be credited upon the royalties to become due under such lease: Provided, That if the land so claimed be within a reservation made in pursuance of section 2 of this act other coal lands in Alaska of substantially equal value may be substituted in said lease for the lands so relinquished.

"All claims of such existing rights to any of such lands in which final proof has been submitted and which are now pending before the Commissioner of the General Land Office or the Secretary of the Interior for decision shall be adjudicated within one year from the passage of this act.

"SEC. 4. That a person, association, or corporation holding a lease of coal lands under this act may, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior and through the same procedure and upon the same terms and conditions as in the case of an original lease under this act, secure a further or new lease covering additional lands contiguous to those embraced in the original lease, but in no event shall the total area embraced in such original and new leases exceed in the aggregate 2,560 acres.

"SEC. 5. That, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, lessees holding under leases small blocks or areas may consolidate their said leases or holdings so as to include in a single holding not to exceed 2,560 acres of contiguous lands.

"SEC. 6. That each lease shall be for such block or tract of land as may be applied for, not exceeding in area 2,560 acres of land, to be described by the subdivisions of the survey, and no person, association, or corporation, except as hereinafter provided, shall be permitted to take or hold any interest as a stockholder or otherwise in more than one such lease under this act, and any interest held in violation of this proviso shall be forfeited to the United States by appropriate proceedings instituted by the Attorney General for that purpose in any court of competent jurisdiction, except that any such ownership and interest hereby forbidden which may be acquired by descent, will, judgment, or decree may be held for one year, and not longer, after its acquisition.

"SEC. 7. That any person who shall purchase, acquire, or hold any interest in two or more such leases, and any person who shall knowingly sell or transfer to one disqualified to purchase, or, except as in this act specifically provided, acquire any such interest, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than three years and by a fine not exceeding $1,000. For all the purposes of this act stock in a corporation owning or holding such a lease shall be deemed an interest in the same.

"SEC. 8. That any director, trustee, officer, or agent of any corporation holding any interest in such a lease who shall, on behalf of such corporation, act in the purchase of any interest in another lease, or who shall knowingly act on behalf of such corporation in the sale or transfer of any such interest in any lease held by such corporation to any corporation or individual holding any interest in any such a lease, except as herein provided, shall be guilty of a felony and shall be subject to imprisonment for a term of not exceeding three years and a fine of not exceeding $1,000.

"SEC. 8a. If any of the lands or deposits leased under the provisions of this act shall be subleased, trusteed, possessed, or controlled by any device permanently, temporarily, directly, indirectly, tacitly, or in any manner whatsoever, so that they form part of or are in anywise controlled by any combination in the form of an unlawful trust, with consent of lessee, or form the subject of any contract or conspiracy in restraint of trade in the mining or selling of coal, entered into by the lessee, or of any holding of such lands by any individual, partnership, association, corporation, or control, in excess of 2,560 acres in the Territory of Alaska, the lease thereof shall be forfeited by appropriate court proceedings.

"SEC. 9. That for the privilege of mining and extracting and disposing of the coal in the lands covered by his lease the lessee shall pay to the United States such royalties as may be specified in the lease, which shall not be less than 2 cents nor more than 5 cents per ton, due and payable at the end of each month succeeding that of the shipment of the coal from the mine, and an annual rental, payable at the beginning of each year, on the lands covered by such lease, at the rate of 25 cents per acre for the first year thereafter; 50 cents per acre for the second, third, fourth, and fifth years; and $1 per acre for each and every year thereafter during the continuance of the lease, except that such rental for any year shall be credited against the royalties as they accrue for that year. Leases may be for periods of not more than 50 years each, subject to renewal, on such terms and conditions as may be authorized by law at the time of such renewal. All net profits from operation of Government mines, and all royalties and rentals under leases as herein provided, shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States in a separate and distinct fund to be applied to the reimbursement of the Government of the United States on account of any expenditures made in the construction of railroads in Alaska, and the excess shall be deposited in the fund known as The Alaska Fund, established by the act of Congress of January 27, 1905, to be expended as provided in said last-mentioned act.

"SEC. 10. That in order to provide for the supply of strictly local and domestic needs for fuel the Secretary of the Interior may, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe in advance, issue to any applicant qualified under section 3 of this act a limited license or permit granting the right to prospect for, mine, and dispose of coal belonging to the United States on specified tracts not to exceed 10 acres to any one person or association of persons in any one coal field for a period of not exceeding 10 years, on such conditions not inconsistent with this act as in his opinion will safeguard the public interest, without payment of royalty for the coal mined or for the land occupied: Provided, That the acquisition or holding of a lease under the preceding sections of this act shall be no bar to the acquisition, holding, or operating under the limited license in this section permitted. And the holding of such a license shall be no bar to the acquisition or holding of such a lease or interest therein.

"SEC. 11. That any lease, entry, location, occupation, or use permitted under this act shall reserve to the Government of the United States the right to grant or use such easements in, over, through, or upon the land leased, entered, located, occupied, or used as may be necessary or appropriate to the working of the same or other coal lands by or under authority of the Government and for other purposes: Provided, That said Secretary, in his discretion, in making any lease under this act, may reserve to the United States the right to lease, sell, or otherwise dispose of the surface of the lands embraced within such lease under existing law or laws hereafter enacted in so far as said surface is not necessary for use by the lessee in extracting and removing the deposits of coal therein. If such reservation is made, it shall be so determined before the offering of such lease.

"That the said Secretary during the life of the lease is authorized to issue such permits for easements herein provided to be reserved and to permit the use of such other public lands in the Territory of Alaska as may be necessary for the construction and maintenance of coal washeries or other works incident to the mining or treatment of coal, which lands may be occupied and used jointly or severally by lessees or permittees, as may be determined by said Secretary.

"SEC. 12. That no lease issued under authority of this act shall be assigned except with the consent of the Secretary of the Interior. Each lease shall contain provisions for the purpose of insuring the exercise of reasonable diligence, skill, and care in the operation of said property, and for the safety and welfare of the miners and for the prevention of undue waste, including a restriction of the workday to not exceeding eight hours in any one day for underground workers except in cases of emergency; provisions securing the workers complete freedom of purchase, requiring the payment of wages at least twice a month in lawful money of the United States, and providing proper rules and regulations to secure fair and just weighing or measurement of the coal mined by each miner, and such other provisions as are needed for the protection of the interests of the United States.

"SEC. 13. That the possession of any lessee of the land or coal deposits leased under this act for all purposes involving adverse claims to the leased property shall be deemed the possession of the United States, and for such purposes the lessee shall occupy the same relation to the property leased as if operated directly by the United States.

"SEC. 14. That any such lease may be forfeited and canceled by appropriate proceeding in a court of competent jurisdiction whenever the lessee fails to comply with any provision of the lease or of general regulations promulgated under this act; and the lease may provide for the enforcement of other appropriate remedies for breach of specified conditions thereof.

"SEC. 15. That the jurisdiction of the district court of Alaska shall extend to and over any forfeiture or cancellation proceedings instituted under the provisions of section 9 of this act and to any and all controversies which may arise between the United States and any lessee or other person, association, or corporation growing out of any disputed controversies or proceedings arising under this act or under leases issued hereunder. All causes against the United States brought under the provisions of this act shall be tried in the same manner and under the same rules as controversies between citizens.

"SEC. 16. That all statements, representations, or reports required, unless otherwise specified, by the Secretary of the Interior under this act shall be upon oath and in such form and upon such blanks as the Secretary of the Interior may require, and any person making false oath, representation, or report shall be subject to punishment as for perjury.

"SEC. 17. That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to prescribe the necessary and proper rules and regulations and to do any and all things necessary to carry out and accomplish the purposes of this act.

"SEC. 18. That all acts and parts of acts in conflict herewith, also section 16 of an act passed and approved August 13, 1914, entitled 'An act extending the period of payment for reclamation projects, and other purposes,' which section reads as follows: 'Sec. 16. That from and after July 1, 1915, expenditures shall not be made for carrying out the purposes of the reclamation law except out of appropriations made annually by Congress therefor, and the Secretary of the Interior shall, for the fiscal year 1916, and annually thereafter, in the regular Book of Estimates, submit to Congress estimates of the amount of money necessary to be expended for carrying out any or all of the purposes authorized by the reclamation law, including the extension and completion of existing projects and units thereof and the construction of new projects. The annual appropriations made hereunder by Congress for such purposes shall be paid out of the reclamation fund provided for by the reclamation law,' are hereby repealed.

"Passed the House of Representatives September 5, 1914.

"Attest:

"SOUTH TRIMBLE, Clerk.

"Passed the Senate with an amendment September 24 (calendar day, September 26), 1914.

"Attest:

"JAMES M. BAKER, Secretary."

The Senate substitute bill was used as the basis from which the agreed bill emerged. The references hereafter made by page, section, and line will refer to the Senate substitute bill as it passed the Senate.

The amended bill as agreed to in conference provides for the appropriation of $100,000 for the purpose of making the surveys necessary to intelligently proceed with the leasing. It was ascertained by your conferees that the current appropriation for surveys in the West was made prior to the passage of this bill and did not have in contemplation the necessary work and surveys that would be called for in this bill; hence the appropriation was retained. It was also brought to the attention of the conferees that the current appropriation for the surveying of public lands contained a limitation that it was to be used first on lands occupied by actual settlers. It is patent that the survey of coal lands in Alaska could not be brought within this limitation; hence the appropriation of $100,000.

The Senate substitute bill contained a provision on page 13, lines 8 and 9 of section 2, that the President could not make the reservation of Government coal areas until after the lands had been surveyed. This was thought to be inadvisable, due to the fact that the appropriate reserves for Government use should be made before any other steps were taken and that the surveys could later be made to conform to them.

It was also within the knowledge of your conferees that certain preliminary surveys had heretofore been made by the deputy United States mineral surveyors, which would make it feasible and advisable to make these surveys first. It was also within the knowledge of your conferees that a great deal of time will be required to finally complete the surveys, due to the topography of the country and climatic conditions there, which render surveying possible only during certain portions of the year.

In section 3, page 14, line 6, beginning with the word "subject," and ending with the word "rights" in line 11, it was thought advisable to eliminate that language, the thought of your conferees being that that would render the future Alaskan coal lessees subject to suits and collateral attacks by the claimants even after their rights had been adjudicated. It was the further thought of your conferees that such a provision would serve as a stumblingblock and a hindrance to the terms, tenor, and purposes of the legislation.

In section 3, page 14, line 13, the word "shall" was changed to "may," so that instead of making it mandatory on the Secretary to award leases to those who should not have them, it was left to his discretion, in order that the public interest might be subserved and no ill-advised leases made.

In section 3, page 14, lines 22 and 23, the proviso beginning with the word "Provided" in line 22 and ending with the word "lease" in line 23 was stricken out as being in conflict with section 5 of the Senate substituted bill.

Later, in section 3, page 15, line 17, beginning with the word "or," the balance of that section was stricken out. The language stricken out, in the estimation of your conferees, had for its purpose, first, the granting to the Alaskan coal claimants a preference right to lease the lands they had sought to acquire title to, and, second, authorized them to make lieu selections for lands they failed to secure through their efforts to acquire patents. It was steadfastly the opinion of your conferees that this being a coal-leasing bill, it should not seek to adjudicate the rights of the Alaskan coal claimants that are now pending in the department.

The language found on page 16, lines 3 to 7, inclusive, requires by legislative direction that the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall adjudicate the claims that are now pending before the department within one year from and after the passage of this act. This was thought to be advisable for the reason that many of these claims have been pending for eight years or more, and it was the belief of your conferees that a final termination of them should be made and that one year would be ample time within which to accomplish it.

Page 16, section 5, line 18, after the word "Interior," your conferees inserted the language "under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe." This was thought necessary to make the section workable.

Page 17, section 7 of the Senate substitute was stricken out and the second paragraph of section 6 of the House bill was inserted in its stead.

On page 18, section 9, line 23, your conferees struck out the following words: "nor more than 5 cents." This, in effect, struck out the maximum price per ton royalty that the Secretary of the Interior could secure for the mining and removal of the coal under the Alaskan leases. This was thought to be advisable for many reasons, the chief one of which was that Congress had recently appropriated $35,000,000 to construct railroads in Alaska and that section 3 of that act provided that the proceeds from the sale of all public lands, minerals, timber, etc., in Alaska should go into the Treasury to reimburse the Federal Government for that expenditure. It was therefore thought advisable and eminently proper to strike out the maximum, so that the Secretary of the Interior would have an opportunity, acting for the Government, to secure a royalty on the coal so leased commensurate with justice and in an effort to reimburse the Federal Government for the Alaskan railway appropriations recently made.

Page 19, line 10, beginning with the word "all," strike out the remainder of that paragraph. This was deemed advisable by your conferees, so that there might be no change in section 3 of the Alaskan railway act, which provides that all the proceeds from Alaska shall go into the Treasury to reimburse the Government for the Alaskan railway expenditure.

Page 21, section 12, at the end of line 25, the section was amplified to make it in keeping with the bill as it passed the House.

Page 22, section 15, lines 14 to 24, inclusive, was stricken out of the bill, and in lieu thereof section 15 of the House bill, with amendments, was incorporated in its stead. The thought of your conferees on this substitution was that the paragraph as passed by the Senate made it possible for the Alaskan coal claimants to take their matters out of the Interior Department, where they have always reposed, and have a new trial ab initio in the district courts of Alaska. It was again thought advisable to strike out this section, because it clearly authorized the claimants to sue the Federal Government, which was thought inadvisable from every viewpoint and without precedent. The result of this substitution is that the Alaskan coal claimants are neither aided nor retarded in their efforts to acquire patent for the land covered by their claims. It was the thought of your conferees that the land should not be leased from under them until they could have a final hearing, but that this legislation ought not to make any provision which would either help or harm them, but, on the contrary, they should be left in statue quo to pursue their remedies in the same department that had jurisdiction over the matter at the time the claims were initiated. Your conferees think this is the only proper rule to lay down for these cases, and if they have any claims against the Federal Government they should be worked out through the Interior Department rather than through Congress.

Page 23, section 18, was stricken from the bill. It sought to repeal a section of the law relating to irrigation, and it was the thought of your conferees that it had no proper place in this legislation and was therefore eliminated.

It is the thought of your conferees, first, that the bill as it emerged from conference retains the substantial features of the House bill; second, that it is workable and that the Secretary of the Interior can proceed to lease the lands that have heretofore been tied up for eight long years; third, that the competitive plan adopted will enable the Secretary to derive revenues that may be applied upon the Alaskan railway appropriation; fourth, that the bill does not forfeit or sacrifice any rights of the Federal Government to the Alaskan coal claimants; fifth, that it does not do the Alaskan coal claimants wrong or injustice; sixth, that the Alaskan coal claimants are left in statue quo; seventh, that ample reserves are authorized to be made by the Secretary of the Interior for a fuel supply for the Army and Navy; eighth, that the appropriation carried by the bill is necessary and justified in the face of the emergency that exists in Alaska; and, ninth, that the legislation has left full discretion within the Secretary of the Interior to protect the public interest and at the same time make the opening of Alaska possible and the legislation workable.

SCOTT FERRIS,
JAMES M. GRAHAM,
IRVINE L. LENROOT,
Managers on the part of the House.

FOLDING SPEECHES.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 633 (H. Rept. 1180).

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper is authorized to employ additional labor for folding speeches, at the rate of not exceeding $1 per thousand, and the sum of $1,000 is authorized to be expended from the contingent fund for that purpose.

With the following amendment recommended by the committee:

In line 3 strike out the figures "$1,000" and insert "$1,500."

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, we have at the present time to be folded about 1,700,000 speeches for Members of the House. We have on hand about $700 to do that work. It is probable that there will be 500,000 more speeches ordered before the end of the session. If this resolution passes, it will simply provide for folding the speeches now ordered and those that will be ordered.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. I am not an economist, but why do not the Members pay for folding their own speeches?

Mr. LLOYD. It has never been the practice.

Mr. BUTLER. It seems that we are going to spend a lot of money sending out speeches of Members.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not nearly as much as was expended for sending out bad speeches by the Republican Members.

Mr. BUTLER. You never spent any for sending out any of mine.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman never sent out any bad speeches.

Mr. MANN. None of the Republicans ever sent out any bad speeches.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment to the resolution.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

CLERICAL SERVICES FOR COMMITTEE ON ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 608 (H. Rept. 1179).

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, to E. L. Smith, $60; Edward C. Hauer, $42; Helen Parker, $24; and Lizzie Bassett, $6, for clerical services rendered to the Committee on Enrolled Bills during the second session of the Sixty-third Congress.

Mr. MANN. When were these services rendered?

Mr. LLOYD. At different times during the session.

Mr. MANN. By what authority?

Mr. LLOYD. No specific authority.

Mr. MANN. The law forbids the employment of anybody without authority. They have violated the law, and instead of paying them why not prosecute them?

Mr. LLOYD. Oh, they have in good faith performed the services.

Mr. MANN. The Committee on Enrolled Bills is not authorized to employ this service, and, as a matter of fact, it does not perform the service.

Mr. LLOYD. The chairman of the committee, rather than come to the House and ask for assistance, has simply ordered these small sums to be paid from time to time when extra services are needed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will permit me, this is an unauthorized employment. I shall not oppose the resolution, but if anybody else attempts to employ services around the House without authority of the House in advance, no such resolution as this will go through. If every chairman of a committee assumed the right to employ what he decided was necessary for his committee and afterwards came in with a resolution to pay it, it would break the House.

Mr. MANN. When was this resolution introduced?

Mr. LLOYD. It was introduced on the 27th of August last.

Mr. MANN. I thought I had seen the resolution some time ago. The Committee on Enrolled Bills at that time was not pressed. They employed some one, without any authority of law and in violation of the express law, and then they come in here and want the House to pay it. I want to say that the work in comparing engrossed or enrolled bills is not done by the Committee on Enrolled Bills. That is done by the engrossing clerks of the House, and notwithstanding the Committee on Enrolled Bills, there have been many errors after it has left the hands of the engrossing clerks.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the Committee on Enrolled Bills says that this work has been performed by these people.

Mr. MANN. I have a high regard for the chairman of the Committee on Enrolled Bills, Mr. ASHBROOK. I do not know whether he was here at that particular time or whether it was when he was detained from the House. I do not suppose he knows. Some clerk of the committee manages it.

Mr. LLOYD. I think that is unfair to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHBROOK].

Mr. MANN. I would not say a thing that is unfair, because the gentleman from Ohio is very attentive to the work of his committee.

Mr. LLOYD. I am very glad the gentleman has made that statement, because I have found that to be true.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, would it not be advisable at this time, since this criticism has come up, for the chairman of the Committee on Accounts to advise the chairman of the Committee on Enrolled Bills that services of this character hereafter will not be paid?

Mr. LLOYD. The chairman will most assuredly do that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, so that there will be no misunderstanding, I will give notice now that no such resolution as this will pass in the future.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LLOYD) there were—ayes 25, noes 19.

So the resolution was agreed to.

ALASKAN COAL LANDS.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes on a matter that I think the House ought to know about.

Mr. MANN. If the House wants to hear about it I think there ought to be a larger attendance.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I never have in my service either here or in my State made any reply to any newspaper article, and the article that I shall reply to now is not in any sense in criticism of myself; but I think, in fairness to one of the conferees on the Alaska coal-leasing bill, I should make a short statement. There appears in this evening's edition of the Washington Times a statement purporting to come from the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. I do not know whether it did or not. Perhaps it did; but, if so, it undoubtedly was made before the conference report on the Alaskan coal bill was agreed to. As the House knows, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] was one of the conferees, and in the conference we had the differences that usually arise in conference committees; but those differences were finally adjusted, and we agreed to the conference report, and that conference report is thoroughly satisfactory to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], to myself, and to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM]. I think in justice to the House and in justice to Mr. LENROOT I should say that I am sure the interview must have been granted some three or four days ago, when the conferees were not as well agreed as they are now. He agreed to every item in it before he left here, as did the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM]. If he had not left the city, I would not have taken this one minute to make this explanation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I may supplement the statement of the gentleman in view of the absence of my colleague who has been called home by the serious illness of his daughter. Yesterday afternoon just prior to his departure I inquired of him whether the conference report was to his satisfaction and he said it was completely so, that it had his entire approval.

Mr. FERRIS. I thank the gentleman. My statement is made neither for the purpose of criticizing the newspaper or Mr. LENROOT. I have no doubt that the interview was given two or three days ago when we were having quite a squabble over the bill. The matter is all right now. The bill is in good shape. I am sure Mr. LENROOT would indorse every word I have said. No doubt the paper was ignorant of the agreement, so they may well be said to be without criticism.

I thank the House for the courtesy of the few moments occupied.

COTTON.

Mr. VAUGHAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein an editorial appearing in the Washington Post of to-day on the cotton situation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing an editorial from the Washington Post on the cotton situation. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 14 minutes p. m.), in accordance with the order heretofore made, the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, October 7, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. CARY: A bill (H. R. 19140) to authorize and direct the payment of pensions monthly; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, petition of Charles Leich & Co., of Evansville, Ind., and the National Wholesale Druggists' Association, in session at Indianapolis, Ind., favoring the Harrison antinarcotic bill; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of Local No. 51, Iron Molders' Union, Charles C. Ray, secretary, of Evansville, Ind., favoring a bill prohibiting the use of the stop watch in making time study of the movements of any Government employee; to the Committee on Labor.

By Mr. McCLELLAN: Petition of A. D. Rose, of Kingston, N. Y., against legislation prohibiting purchase at post office of stamped address envelopes; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. MAPES: Protest of the Grand Rapids Overland Co., of Grand Rapids; the Studebaker Corporation of America, of Detroit; and 33 other automobile manufacturing companies of the State of Michigan, against the proposed special tax upon automobiles; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, protest of the Citizens' Telephone Co. of Grand Rapids, Mich., against the imposition of a special tax of 1 cent on telephone messages; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. O'SHAUNESSY: Petition of the National Liberal Immigration League, relative to House bill 18220, as to citizens of other countries living in the United States taking part in European war; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

Also, petition of the N. Barstow Co., of Providence, R. I., protesting against the bill to prohibit sale of return envelopes; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. RAKER: Petition of 18 citizens of Calaveras County, Cal., favoring national prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

Also, memorial of the United States Licensed Shipmasters, Marine Engineers, and Mates of Ocean Steamers of the Port of San Francisco, protesting against suspension of the navigation laws of the United States; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, memorial of the Piedmont Parlor, Native Daughters of the Golden West, favoring the passage of the Hamill bill, relative to retirement of civil-service employees; to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

By Mr. REILLY of Connecticut: Petition of the English & Messick Co. and C. Codles & Co., of New Haven, Conn., and the Locomobile Co., of Bridgeport, Conn., protesting against tax on automobile manufacturers; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. SLOAN: Petition of William Peters, of Thayer, Nebr., against national prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, October 7, 1914.

The Chaplain. Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thy care for all Thy creatures is manifest unto us in all the works of Thy hands. The voice of nature about us proclaims God's grace and love for all that He has made. We are sure in the light of all we have learned that not a sparrow falls without Thy notice. Thou hast kept us in the hollow of Thy hand. Thou hast shielded us from every enemy. Thou hast guided us in the paths of peace and of prosperity and of happiness. Thou art opening Thy hands and supplying our every need. We make humble acknowledgment for Thy goodness to us. We pray that this day we may give expression to our sense of gratitude by lives consecrated to Thy service. Bless every Member of the Senate and all who are in authority, that Thy will may be done with us as a nation, and that Thou mayest use us even now as an evangel of peace among the nations of the earth. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Monday, September 28, 1914, when, on request of Mr. OVERMAN and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

COTTON INDUSTRY OF NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, in a colloquy on the floor of the Senate a few days ago the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] read a letter containing an expression to the effect that the cotton industry of North Carolina was prostrated. I demanded the name of the writer. The Senator said it was a personal letter and declined to give me the name, but he asked me if I knew Gen. Julian S. Carr. I replied that I did. He said that I had a similar letter from Gen. Carr, and probably I could find it in my files. The Senator also asked me if I knew Hon. J. A. Long, one of the prominent citizens of my State, and said if I would examine my files I would find a letter from him. I replied that I had no recollection of having received a letter from anyone on that subject. He asked me if I would look at my files and see if I had not received a letter from Julian S. Carr and also from J. A. Long, the substance of which was that the cotton industry of North Carolina was prostrated in July.

I am sorry that the Senator from Michigan is not now here, but I wish to say that I have examined the files of my office and I have found no such letter. Then I telegraphed to each of these prominent citizens of North Carolina. I telegraphed to Gen. Carr as follows:

OCTOBER 5, 1914.

To Gen. J. S. CARR,
Durham, N. C.:

It has been charged upon the floor of the Senate that you wrote me a letter charging that the revision of the tariff prostrated the cotton industry in North Carolina. Did you ever write me such a letter?

I also sent a similar telegram to Hon. J. A. Long. The reply of Gen. Julian S. Carr is as follows:

DURHAM, N. C., October 5, 1914.

Hon. LEE S. OVERMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

No, my dear Senator; I did not.

JULIAN S. CARR.

I also have received another telegram from Gen. Carr, as follows:

DURHAM, N. C., October 5, 1914.

Senator LEE S. OVERMAN,
Washington, D. C.:

I am the one cotton manufacturer in the South that gave out an interview indorsing the administration and the Democratic Party for keeping the party pledge to reduce the tariff downward and highly praised the administration for living up to the party's platform pledges to reduce the tariff, and the interview was largely copied by the press and commended.

JULIAN S. CARR.

I received the following telegram in reply from Hon. J. A. Long:

ROXBORO, N. C.

Senator LEE S. OVERMAN,
Washington, D. C.:

Replying to your inquiry whether or not I wrote you in regard to depression in cotton-mill business caused by revision of tariff, I wish to say I did not.

J. A. LONG.

Now, I wish to read an editorial from the Greensboro Daily News, one of the leading papers of North Carolina. It is an independent paper. I will read only one extract, but will ask that the whole editorial may go in:

The truth is the cotton mills of the South are in the finest shape that they have known in several years, the impression of Senator SMITH [of Michigan] to the contrary notwithstanding. Many of them have come to the conclusion that cotton has about reached the bottom and are beginning to purchase, and their number is increasing daily. The statement as to the Parker mills is true, but even their action is but a forecast of the revival of industry that can not be postponed many days longer.

The editorial referred to is as follows:

[From the Greensboro Daily News, Monday, October 5, 1914.]

FORTUNATELY, IT IS TRUE.

A friend of the Daily News, inclosing a clipping concerning the Parker chain of cotton mills in South Carolina preparing to run day and night to fill orders on hand, remarks, "It sounds good, if it is true." The comment is eloquent of how deeply the war scare has penetrated the minds of the business men of the South. The news is true, what there is of it; but as a matter of fact it tells only half the story. The cotton-mill men are not in business for their health. It is to their interest to buy cotton at the lowest possible price. We do not think that there has been any organized effort to bear the market by the cotton spinners, but it can be asserted with perfect safety that the spinners were not the most enthusiastic of those who have been trying to lift the market back to normal. They would be more or less than human had they taken the lead.

The truth is the cotton mills of the South are in the finest shape that they have known in several years, the impression of Senator SMITH to the contrary notwithstanding. Many of them have come to the conclusion that cotton has about reached the botton and are beginning to purchase, and their number is increasing daily. The statement as to the Parker mills is true, but even their action is but a forecast of the revival of industry that can not be postponed many days longer.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have a letter from the leading cotton section of North Carolina, written by Mr. Sherrill, who is the editor of the Concord Daily Tribune, inclosing me a copy of an editorial from that paper, which I will also ask to have printed in the RECORD without reading. I will read Mr. Sherrill's letter:

CONCORD, N. C., October 5, 1914.

Hon. LEE S. OVERMAN,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I inclose editorial clipping from my paper to-day. The mills in this city are all running on full time. The Cannon Mills have all paid 10 per cent dividends, without interruption, with the exception of the Gibson mill, which pays 6 per cent. It is understood that the Gibson mill is in much better shape now than it has ever been. It is a common report that it has laid by a good surplus.

The Young-Hartsell mill is making money for the first time in 10 years since it was organized. There is not a mill in this city that is not in excellent condition.

I thought possibly this information would be of some value to you at this juncture.

Yours, very truly, J. B. SHERRILL.

The editorial referred to is as follows:

[From the Concord (N. C.) Daily Tribune, October 5, 1914.]

Senator WILLIAM ALDEN SMITH, of Michigan, prompted, it is said, by some Durham Republicans, in attacking the Wilson administration in a speech Saturday in the Senate, brandished a letter from "a friend in North Carolina," in which it was said that the cotton mills in the State had been "hit pretty hard" by the Simmons-Underwood tariff. Senator OVERMAN promptly demanded the name of Senator SMITH'S informant, but the latter would not give it. Senator OVERMAN denied vigorously that the cotton-mill industry in the State had undergone a slump. He stated that he lived in a mill section of the State, and that on a recent visit home he found them in fine shape. He said that he had $500 worth of stock in one mill, and that a 6 per cent dividend was paid this year. The cotton mills in Concord are running on full time, some of them at night. At least one of them is enjoying the most prosperous season it has ever had since its organization. Senator SMITH will have to make another tack.

HOUR OF ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate adjourn at the hour of 1 o'clock p. m. to-day until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. THORNTON. I present the memorial of J. M. Brown, of Keatchie, La., protesting against the letting out of rural routes by contract, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the memorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

KEATCHIE, LA., October 1, 1914.

Hon. J. R. THORNTON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I see through the newspapers that Mr. Burleson intends to let the rural routes out by contract, as the star routes are. I want to enter my protest against this; being a patron of a rural route I am in a position to know the amount of labor, expense, and hardships that attaches to delivering the mails on a rural route.

I think it is unjust and unfair to let these routes out by contract at starvation wages. I think the rural carriers are the poorest-paid men in the Government service for the amount of labor exacted.

I hope you will use your influence with the Postmaster General to prevent this. I hope I will not be trespassing on your patience in asking you to have this letter inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as my earnest protest against contract rural carriers.

With best wishes,
Very truly, yours, J. M. BROWN.

Mr. THOMPSON. I present a memorial remonstrating against the proposed increase in the cost of mileage books to 2¼ cents a mile, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the memorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RICE-STIX DRY GOODS CO.,
Wichita, Kans., October 3, 1914.

Hon. W. H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I wish to file a protest with the Interstate Commerce Commission through you, our representative in Washington, against the unjustified attempt of the railroads to increase the cost of mileage books to 2¼ cents a mile. If this increase is permitted, the burden will fall almost entirely on the shoulders of the commercial traveler, because it is only the commercial traveler who uses the mileage books. The price has been 2 cents a mile on mileage books for 35 years, and if there is a necessity of raising rates why not put it on the local tickets of people who only travel once a year instead of adding the burden to the men who are creating the business for the mills, factories, and railroads all over the country?

What the country needs is more business and not added handicap on the men who are trying to produce more business. We are not asking anything that is not fair and just, but believe we are entitled to consideration in this matter, and the influence of 500,000 traveling men will undoubtedly be felt in this matter.

Thanking you in advance for your assistance in the stopping of this action, I am,

Yours, very truly, W. L. SMART,
Wichita, Kans., 1115 North Waco Avenue.

Mr. GRONNA. I received this morning three telegrams with reference to the bill now before the Senate Finance Committee regarding a revenue tax, two being from my State and a third one from the Board of Trade of Peoria, Ill. They are all brief, and I ask that they may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the telegrams were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BISMARCK, N. DAK., October 6, 1914.

Senator GRONNA,
Washington, D. C.:

As dealers and users of automobiles we wish to protest against the special war tax on automobiles. Such a measure means an enormous loss to the entire industry, and we beg of you to use every possible effort in opposing the measure.

LAHR MOTOR SALES CO.

FARGO, N. DAK., October 6, 1914.

Senator A. J. GRONNA,
Washington, D. C.:

We wish to enter protest against proposed bill for taxing automobile manufacturers and owners now before Congress.

NORTH DAKOTA AUTOMOBILE DEALERS' ORGANIZATION.

PEORIA, ILL., October 6, 1914.

Hon. A. J. GRONNA,
Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The members of the Peoria Board of Trade, through its directors, in a special meeting to-day, wish to protest against the clause in the revenue bill which imposes a tax on products sold on boards of trade. The Peoria Board of Trade does an exclusive cash business, and this tax will be upon patrons who ship grain from Illinois, Iowa, Missouri, North Dakota, and South Dakota to this market. This is class legislation and discriminatory in its provision.

PEORIA BOARD OF TRADE,
N. R. MOORE, President.
JOHN R. LOFGREN, Secretary.

Mr. JONES. I have a telegram from William Peterson, president of the Tacoma Life Underwriters' Association, of Tacoma, Wash., protesting against the proposed life insurance tax.

I have also a telegram from the Motor Car Dealers' Association of Seattle; one from the Hawkins Motor Car Co., of Spokane; one from the Yakima Auto Dealers' Association, of Yakima; the Yakima Auto & Supply Co., the Washington Auto Co., the Scorn Motor Co., and the Bell-Wyman Implement Co., of North Yakima, all remonstrating against the proposed war tax on manufacturers of gasoline and motor vehicle outfits. I ask that they be referred to the Committee on Finance, or probably it would be better to refer them to the Democratic caucus.

There being no objection, the telegrams were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TACOMA, WASH., October 3, 1914.

Hon. WESLEY L. JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

As a body of insurance men associated for the purpose of safeguarding the interests of the insuring public we desire to protest against proposed tax on life insurance, which is already heavily taxed. This tax would fall principally on the thrifty laboring class, whose life insurance is their families' protection.

WM. PETERSON,
President Tacoma Life Underwriters' Association.

SEATTLE, WASH., October 6, 1914.

Senator WESLEY L. JONES,
Washington, D. C.:

The members of this association register earnest protest against proposed horsepower tax on motor vehicles. We believe such a tax is one on a necessary commodity, as motor vehicles are to-day as necessary as the telephone. Its effect will be to curtail sales and decrease business in this territory. It will be especially hurtful on account of the fact that ranchers, lumbermen, and farmers are the largest users of motor vehicles. As representing this city and territory, would ask you to oppose this feature and use your influence to eliminate the proposed tax.

THE MOTOR CAR DEALERS' ASSOCIATION OF SEATTLE.

SPOKANE, WASH., October 6, 1914.

Senator W. L. JONES,
Washington, D. C.:

We consider proposed Government tax on horsepower on all motor vehicles decidedly unfair, and ask that you oppose vigorously. Virtually class legislation, therefore unconstitutional. If they must hang it on the motor-car industry, would suggest 1 cent gallon on gasoline.

HAWKINS MOTOR CAR CO.

NORTH YAKIMA, WASH., October 6, 1914.

Senator W. L. JONES,
Washington, D. C.:

We hereby protest against the prohibitive special war tax of $1 paid by manufacturers and 25 cents paid by owners. We consider the same un-American, confiscatory, and class legislation of the worst kind. We ask you to vote and use your influence against the measure.

YAKIMA AUTO DEALERS' ASSOCIATION.
YAKIMA AUTO & SUPPLY CO.
WASHINGTON AUTO CO.
SCORN MOTOR CO.
BELL-WYMAN IMPLEMENT CO.

Mr. PENROSE. I desire to state in this connection that I have received many thousands of telegrams against nearly every feature of the pending revenue bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I desire the Senate to know that I have received a formal protest from 7,000 workmen employed in the Studebaker Motor Car Co., of Detroit, and a unanimous protest from the workmen in the Cadillac Motor Co., of Detroit, against the plan which seems to have been devised—and I hope is to be abandoned—to place a special horsepower tax on the construction and production of automobiles in order to meet a needless deficiency in the revenues of the Government. I ask to have it printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DETROIT, MICH., October 6, 1914.

Hon. WILLIAM ALDEN SMITH,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: We, the undersigned, on behalf of the 7,000 employees of the Studebaker Corporation, desire to enter our protest against the proposed special tax on automobiles. We believe that such a tax will work great harm on the entire automobile industry, and that we are likely to feel the burden of this special tax, as cars have been sold at contract prices, and the tax will have effect of canceling and delaying sales. The added tax may result in loss of employment. We believe the special tax to be a discrimination, and that this business should not be expected to bear such a heavy burden.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I present a letter addressed to my colleague and myself from the president of the First National Bank of Kalamazoo, the president of Kalamazoo National Bank, the president of the Home Savings Bank of Kalamazoo, and the president of the Kalamazoo City Savings Bank, protesting against the proposed tax of $2 per thousand upon the capital, surplus, and undivided profits of all banks. I ask that the letter be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

KALAMAZOO CITY SAVINGS BANK,
Kalamazoo, Mich., October 4, 1914.

Hon. WILLIAM ALDEN SMITH and
Hon. CHARLES E. TOWNSEND,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: We, the representatives of the banks of the city of Kalamazoo, protest against the enactment into law of the proposed tax of $2 per thousand upon the capital, surplus, and undivided profits of all banks, as contemplated in the so-called war-revenue bill.

We protest not because we are unwilling to bear our share of the burden of Government maintenance but because this tax is not laid alike upon the capital, surplus, and profits of all corporations.

We respectfully ask you to oppose this injustice with all the strength at your command.

Yours, respectfully,

FIRST NATIONAL BANK,
C. S. CAMPBELL, President.
KALAMAZOO NATIONAL BANK,
E. J. PHELPS, President.
HOME SAVINGS BANK.
V. T. BARKER, President.
KALAMAZOO CITY SAVINGS BANK,
HERBERT JOHNSON, President.

Mr. WARREN. I have received a great number of telegrams concerning the proposed tax on the horsepower of motor cars. I will simply ask that the briefest one of the lot, which consists of but two lines, may be printed in the RECORD. I will state that I have here several hundred telegrams to the same purport.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RAWLINS, WYO., October 6, 1914.

Hon. F. E. WARREN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Urge you protest against proposed tax on horsepower on motor cars. Will seriously affect our business and sale of cars.

Mr. OLIVER presented memorials of sundry citizens of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the proposed tax on life-insurance policies, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of the High Grade Oil Refining Co., of Bruin, Pa., remonstrating against the proposed tax on gasoline and other motor lubricants, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the proposed tax on automobiles, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ROOT presented memorials from sundry merchandise brokers of the State of New York, remonstrating against the passage of the proposed war-revenue bill, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PERKINS presented memorials of the California Bankers' Association, of San Francisco; the Security Bank, of Oakland; and the First National Bank of Holtville, all in the State of California, remonstrating against the proposed tax on capital, surplus, and undivided profits of banks, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented memorials of the San Francisco Life Insurance Co., of San Francisco, and the Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Co., of Oakland, all in the State of California, remonstrating against the proposed stamp tax on insurance companies, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of the Automobile Dealers' Association of Fresno, Cal., remonstrating against the proposed tax on automobiles, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of Liberty Lodge, No. 11, Knights of Pythias, of Oakland, Cal., praying for the enactment of legislation to grant pensions to civil-service employees, which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

He also presented the memorial of R. K. Madsen, of Parlier, Cal., remonstrating against the proposed war tax on dry wine used for vinegar, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the memorial of J. Allec, of San Francisco, Cal., remonstrating against the proposed tax on gasoline, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of eight banks of California, remonstrating against the proposed tax on capital and surplus of banks, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I present and ask to have read a resolution adopted by the West End Citizens' Association, of Washington, D. C., with reference to a bill which has been introduced by me to fix the salary of the auditor of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. It is a short resolution. I will say, and I ask that it be read and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

There being no objection, the resolution was read and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, as follows:

WEST END CITIZENS' ASSOCIATION,
Washington, D. C., October 3, 1914.

Hon. JAMES E. MARTINE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The following resolution was unanimously adopted at the September meeting of our association, held last Monday evening, and ordered referred to you for the consideration of the Congress:

"Resolved, That the West End Citizens' Association approved House bill No. 17097, to fix the salary of the auditor of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, and petitions the United States Senate its early enactment into law. We recommend that that official receive a fixed salary not exceeding $5,000 per annum, and that all necessary expenses of maintaining the office be paid out of the fees received from litigants and others, and that the surplus, if any, be deposited in the United States Treasury to the credit of the District of Columbia, the latter being required to pay all expenses incidental thereto."

Respectfully,

GEORGE W. EVANS, President.

Attest:

LUTHER W. LINKINS, Secretary.

EMPLOYEES OF RAILWAY MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, on September 23 I presented some petitions, letters, and newspaper clippings with reference to a certain bill, being Senate bill 5826, to prevent the use of the stop watch or other time-measuring devices on Government works, and so forth, and they were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor. Since presenting those petitions I have received a number of letters and telegrams asking that certain names be taken from the petitions, and so forth. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw those petitions from the Senate files.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 9270) for the relief of John M. Gray, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 807) thereon.

Mr. MYERS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 6484) to provide for the nonmineral entry of lands withdrawn, classified, or reported as containing coal, phosphate, nitrate, potash, oil, gas, or asphaltic minerals in Alaska, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 806) thereon.

NAVAL WAR COLLEGE OF BRAZIL.

Mr. THORNTON. In behalf of the Committee on Naval Affairs I present a favorable report on the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 193) to authorize the President to grant leave of absence to two commissioned officers of the line of the Navy for the purpose of accepting an appointment under the Government of Brazil as instructors in naval strategy and tactics in the Naval War College of Brazil, which I ask to have read, and I will ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the joint resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Whereas the Republic of Brazil has recently established the Naval War College of Brazil at Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, and is desirous that two commissioned officers of the line of the Navy of the United States experienced in naval war college work be permitted to serve therein as instructors in naval strategy and tactics; and

Whereas the United States of America wishes to show its friendly feeling for the Republic of Brazil by complying with its desire: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to grant leave of absence to not more than two commissioned officers of the line of the Navy of the United States to assist the Republic of Brazil as instructors in naval strategy and tactics in the Naval War College of Brazil, in pursuance of an arrangement to be made between such officers so detailed and the Government of Brazil; and that such officers while absent on such leave be, and they are hereby, authorized to accept from the Government of Brazil the said employment with compensation from the said Government: Provided, however, That the permission so given shall be held to terminate at such date as the President may determine. To insure the continuance of this work during such time as may be desirable, the President may have the power of substitution in case of the termination of the detail of an officer for any cause; and that the officers, while so absent in the service of the Republic of Brazil, shall receive no pay or allowances from the United States Government.

Mr. THORNTON. I ask that the letter of the Secretary of the Navy, which is attached to the joint resolution, may be read. It gives the reasons why the department desires the passage of the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, October 2, 1914.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: The department has been informed that by virtue of the act of January 3, 1914, the Government of Brazil has established the Naval War College of Brazil at Rio de Janeiro, Brazil. An executive decree of February 25, 1914, promulgated the regulations governing this naval school, as follows:

"Chapter 2, article 5, section 3: Services of the general staff. Preparation of the navy for war. Conferences by an officer of a foreign navy with whom a contract shall be made or by an officer of the Brazilian Navy.

"Chapter 2, article 5, section 14: Strategy, tactics, and the naval war game. Course under the direction of a foreign professor with whom a contract shall be made or an officer of the Brazilian Navy."

The minister of marine of the Government of Brazil has suggested that contracts be made with two officers of the American Navy to act as instructors in naval strategy and tactics in the Naval War College of Brazil. This flattering proposal meets with the approval of this department. It is believed that such a detail will tend to develop the friendly relations between the Government of the United States and that of Brazil, and that the experience which will be gained by the naval officers so employed will redound to the advantage of both the American and Brazilian Navies.

The desired detail can not, in the absence of appropriate legislation, be made, in view of the explicit prohibition contained in the Constitution, Article I, section 9, clause 8, which reads as follows:

"No title of nobility shall be granted by the United States; and no person holding any office of profit or trust under them shall, without the consent of the Congress, accept of any present, emolument, office, or title of any kind whatever from any king, prince, or foreign State."

The department, therefore, has drafted and submits herewith, with its strong recommendation for your immediate and favorable consideration, a joint resolution conferring upon the President the discretionary power to grant leave of absence to not more than two naval officers for the purpose of assisting the Republic of Brazil in the work of the Naval War College of Brazil. It will be noted that the officers so absent on leave are authorized to accept employment from the Government of Brazil, with such compensation as may be agreed upon, and that while they are so absent in the service of that country they shall receive no pay or allowances from the United States Government. In order to assure the continuance of this work during such time as may be desirable, it is proposed to confer upon the President the power of substitution in case it becomes necessary for any reason to terminate the detail of an officer so employed.

As the department understands that the work of the Naval War College of Brazil is to be taken up in the immediate future, I have the honor to request that you expedite, as far as practicable, the consideration of the inclosed proposed joint resolution.

Faithfully, yours,

JOSEPHUS DANIELS,
Secretary of the Navy.

The CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Mr. THORNTON. If there be no objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution, I should like to have it considered at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

A bill (S. 6601) granting an increase of pension to Eli C. Walton (with accompaying papers); and
A bill (S. 6602) granting a pension to Oscar Gray (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

TRADE WITH FOREIGN NATIONS.

Mr. FLETCHER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 18666) to authorize the United States, acting through a shipping board, to subscribe to the capital stock of a corporation to be organized under the laws of the United States or of a State thereof or of the District of Columbia to purchase, construct, equip, maintain, and operate merchant vessels in the foreign trade of the United States, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

ADDRESS BY HON. N. J. BACHELDER (S. DOC. NO. 587).

Mr. McCUMBER. I have here an address by Hon. N. J. Bachelder, former master of the National Grange and former governor of New Hampshire, delivered at the agricultural fair at Rye, N. H., October 1, 1914. It is replete with strong and important suggestions relative to the whole agricultural question. I should like to have it printed as a public document. It would be fair to say, however, before offering it as a public document that he would be dull indeed who would not observe from the general contents that it favors the Republican policies in reference to agricultural products.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

LITTLE KANAWHA RIVER RAILROAD, WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. CHILTON. I submit a resolution and ask for its immediate consideration. It simply calls upon the Interstate Commerce Commission for some information concerning the management and ownership of the Little Kanawha River Railroad, a railroad running up the Little Kanawha River in West Virginia. I hope there will be no objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I believe there is on the desk a resolution which comes over from a preceding day. I should like to have that resolution disposed of. Then I shall have no objection to the consideration of the resolution submitted by the Senator from West Virginia. The resolution to which I refer has been objected to once or twice, and I should like to have it considered at this time.

Mr. CHILTON. I did not object to the Senator's resolution.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I know the Senator did not.

Mr. CHILTON. Why not consider this resolution now?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I prefer to have the other resolution first considered.

Mr. CHILTON. Then the Senator from Michigan objects to the consideration of this resolution?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do object at this time.

Mr. CHILTON. Then, Mr. President, I submit the resolution and ask that it be referred to the proper committee.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I shall not object to the resolution being considered when it comes up in its regular order.

Mr. CHILTON. But does the Senator object at this time?

Mr. TOWNSEND. At this time; yes. When we get to the regular order I shall not object.

Mr. CHILTON. I do not understand the Senator.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I shall not object to the resolution when it comes up in regular order after the morning business has been disposed of. I shall then have no objection to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. CHILTON. I submit the resolution, and ask that it take the usual course.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution submitted by the Senator from West Virginia.

The resolution (S. Res. 462) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission be, and it is hereby, requested to investigate and report to the Senate as soon as possible the following:

First. What persons, firms, or corporations own the stock of the railroad running up the Little Kanawha River, in the State of West Virginia, from Parkersburg to Elizabeth, and whether or not the control of such stock is in the hands of any combination of railroads or of any trust or syndicate controlled by railroads engaged in interstate commerce.

Second. Whether or not any combination of interstate railroads, or any combination under control of interstate railroads, control the said Little Kanawha Railroad; and if so, how; and whether or not said railroad is being held for any purpose other than as a legitimate branch of commerce.

Third. All of the facts concerning the ownership, control, and management of said railroad, and whether or not it is now being held by interstate railroads for legitimate transportation purpose or is being held to tie up and prevent the development of the Little Kanawha Valley.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I withdraw my objection to the consideration of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 241) for the appointment of four members of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers. I asked unanimous consent for its present consideration the other day, and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] objected. I do not know whether or not he still objects.

Mr. BURTON. I am not disposed to object to the consideration of the joint resolution to-day. I think, however, my colleague [Mr. POMERENE] desires to be present when it is disposed of.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I understand the Senator's colleague is satisfied. I will say to the Senator that if it should appear that there is any objection, I shall subsequently be too glad to have the action of the Senate reconsidered.

Mr. BURTON. My colleague on one occasion did object to the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. He does not now object.

Mr. BURTON. Do I understand an amendment is to be proposed inserting the name of George H. Wood as one of the Board of Managers of the Home?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; that amendment will be proposed, I will say to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BURTON. I should like to address the Senate very briefly when the joint resolution comes up, but I shall occupy no long time in doing so.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I am going to ask for the regular order.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Let me say to the Senator from Michigan that this joint resolution simply provides for the naming of the members of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I understand that, and there is no Senator in this body that I should more like to accommodate than the Senator from Oregon; but the resolution for which I desire consideration will take only a minute unless there is to be discussion of it, and if there is to be discussion it ought to be disposed of in some way. If I can have my request for the regular order granted, we can in some way dispose of the resolution in which I am interested.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order has been called for. Are there further concurrent or other resolutions?

COAL LANDS IN ALASKA.

Mr. MYERS. I submit a conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (H. R. 14233) to provide for the leasing of coal lands in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes. (S. Doc. No. 586.)

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the report be printed and lie over until to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will lie over and be printed.

The report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14233) to provide for the leasing of coal lands in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate insert the following:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to survey the lands of the United States in the Territory of Alaska known to be valuable for their deposits of coal, preference to be given first in favor of surveying lands within those areas commonly known as the Bering River, Matanuska, and Nenana coal fields, and thereafter to such areas or coal fields as lie tributary to established settlements or existing or proposed rail or water transportation lines: Provided, That such surveys shall be executed in accordance with existing laws and rules and regulations governing the survey of public lands. There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $100,000 for the purpose of making the surveys herein provided for, to continue available until expended: Provided, That any surveys heretofore made under the authority or by the approval of the Department of the Interior may be adopted and used for the purposes of this act.

"SEC. 2. That the President of the United States shall designate and reserve from use, location, sale, lease, or disposition not exceeding 5,120 acres of coal-bearing land in the Bering River field and not exceeding 7,680 acres of coal-bearing land in the Matanuska field, and not to exceed one-half of the other coal lands in Alaska: Provided, That the coal deposits in such reserved areas may be mined under the direction of the President when, in his opinion, the mining of such coal in such reserved areas, under the direction of the President, becomes necessary, by reason of an insufficient supply of coal at a reasonable price for the requirements of Government works, construction and operation of Government railroads, for the Navy, for national protection, or for relief from monopoly or oppressive conditions.

"SEC. 3. That the unreserved coal lands and coal deposits shall be divided by the Secretary of the Interior into leasing blocks or tracts of 40 acres each, or multiples thereof, and in such form as in the opinion of the Secretary will permit the most economical mining of the coal in such blocks, but in no case exceeding 2,560 acres in any one leasing block or tract; and thereafter, the Secretary shall offer such blocks or tracts and the coal, lignite, and associated minerals therein for leasing, and may award leases thereof through advertisement, competitive bidding, or such other methods as he may by general regulations adopt, to any person above the age of 21 years who is a citizen of the United States, or to any association of such persons, or to any corporation organized under the laws of the United States or of any State or Territory thereof: Provided, That a majority of the stock of such corporation shall at all times be owned and held by citizens of the United States: And provided further, That no railroad or common carrier shall be permitted to take or acquire through lease or permit under this act any coal or coal lands in excess of such area or quantity as may be required and used solely for its own use, and such limitation of use shall be expressed in all leases or permits issued to railroads or common carriers hereunder: And provided further, That any person, association, or corporation qualified to become a lessee under this act and owning any pending claim under the public-land laws to any coal lands in Alaska may, within one year from the passage of this act, enter into an arrangement with the Secretary of the Interior by which such claim shall be fully relinquished to the United States; and if, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior, the circumstances connected with such claim justify so doing, the moneys paid by the claimant or claimants to the United States on account of such claim shall, by direction of the Secretary of the Interior, be returned and paid over to such person, association, or corporation as a consideration for such relinquishment.

"All claims of existing rights to any of such lands in which final proof has been submitted and which are now pending before the Commissioner of the General Land Office or the Secretary of the Interior for decision shall be adjudicated within one year from the passage of this act.

"SEC. 4. That a person, association, or corporation holding a lease of coal lands under this act may, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior and through the same procedure and upon the same terms and conditions as in the case of an original lease under this act, secure a further or new lease covering additional lands contiguous to those embraced in the original lease, but in no event shall the total area embraced in such original and new leases exceed in the aggregate 2,560 acres.

"That upon satisfactory showing by any lessee to the Secretary of the Interior that all of the workable deposits of coal within a tract covered by his or its lease will be exhausted, worked out, or removed within three years thereafter, the Secretary of the Interior may, within his decretion, lease to such lessee an additional tract of land or coal deposits, which, including the coal area remaining in the original lease, shall not exceed 2,560 acres, through the same procedure and under the same competitive conditions as in case of an original lease.

"SEC. 5. That, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, lessees holding under leases small blocks or areas may consolidate their said leases or holdings so as to include in a single holding not to exceed 2,560 acres of contiguous lands.

"SEC. 6. That each lease shall be for such leasing block or tract of land as may be offered or applied for, not exceeding in area 2,560 acres of land, to be described by the subdivisions of the survey, and no person, association, or corporation, except as hereinafter provided, shall be permitted to take or hold any interest as a stockholder or otherwise in more than one such lease under this act, and any interest held in violation of this proviso shall be forfeited to the United States by appropriate proceedings instituted by the Attorney General for that purpose in any court of competent jurisdiction, except tnat any such ownership and interest hereby forbidden which may be acquired by descent, will, judgment, or decree may be held for one year, and not longer, after its acquisition.

"SEC. 7. That any person who shall purchase, acquire, or hold any interest in two or more such leases, except as herein provided, or who shall knowingly purchase, acquire, or hold any stock in a corporation having an interest in two or more such leases, or who shall knowingly sell or transfer to one disqualified to purchase, or except as in this act specifically provided, disqualified to acquire, any such interest, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than three years and by a fine not exceeding $1,000: Provided, That any such ownership and interest hereby forbidden which may be acquired by descent, will, judgment, or decree may be held two years after its acquisition and not longer, and in case of minority or other disability such time as the court may decree.

"SEC. 8. That any director, trustee, officer, or agent of any corporation holding any interest in such a lease who shall, on behalf of such corporation, act in the purchase of any interest in another lease, or who shall knowingly act on behalf of such corporation in the sale or transfer of any such interest in any lease held by such corporation to any corporation or individual holding any interest in any such a lease, except as herein provided, shall be guilty of a felony and shall be subject to imprisonment for a term of not exceeding three years and a fine of not exceeding $1,000.

"SEC. 8a. If any of the lands or deposits leased under the provisions of this act shall be subleased, trusteed, possessed, or controlled by any device permanently, temporarily, directly, indirectly, tacitly, or in any manner whatsoever, so that they form part of or are in anywise controlled by any combination in the form of an unlawful trust, with consent of lessee, or form the subject of any contract or conspiracy in restraint of trade in the mining or selling of coal, entered into by the lessee, or of any holding of such lands by any individual, partnership, association, corporation, or control, in excess of 2,560 acres in the Territory of Alaska, the lease thereof shall be forfeited by appropriate court proceedings.

"SEC. 9. That for the privilege of mining and extracting and disposing of the coal in the lands covered by his lease the lessee shall pay to the United States such royalties as may be specified in the lease, which shall not be less than 2 cents per ton, due and payable at the end of each month succeeding that of the shipment of the coal from the mine, and an annual rental, payable at the beginning of each year, on the lands covered by such lease, at the rate of 25 cents per acre for the first year thereafter, 50 cents per acre for the second, third, fourth, and fifth years, and $1 per acre for each and every year thereafter during the continuance of the lease, except that such rental for any year shall be credited against the royalties as they accrue for that year. Leases may be for periods of not more than 50 years each, subject to renewal, on such terms and conditions as may be authorized by law at the time of such renewal.

"SEC. 10. That in order to provide for the supply of strictly local and domestic needs for fuel the Secretary of the Interior may, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe in advance, issue to any applicant qualified under section 3 of this act a limited license or permit granting the right to prospect for, mine, and dispose of coal belonging to the United States on specified tracts not to exceed 10 acres to any one person or association of persons in any one coal field for a period of not exceeding 10 years, on such conditions not inconsistent with this act as in his opinion will safeguard the public interest, without payment of royalty for the coal mined or for the land occupied: Provided, That the acquisition or holding of a lease under the preceding sections of this act shall be no bar to the acquisition, holding, or operating under the limited license in this section permitted. And the holding of such a license shall be no bar to the acquisition or holding of such a lease or interest therein.

"SEC. 11. That any lease, entry, location, occupation, or use permitted under this act shall reserve to the Government of the United States the right to grant or use such easements in, over, through, or upon the land leased, entered, located, occupied, or used as may be necessary or appropriate to the working of the same or other coal lands by or under authority of the Government and for other purposes: Provided, That said Secretary, in his discretion, in making any lease under this act, may reserve to the United States the right to lease, sell, or otherwise dispose of the surface of the lands embraced within such lease under existing law or laws hereafter enacted in so far as said surface is not necessary for use by the lessee in extracting and removing the deposits of coal therein. If such reservation is made, it shall be so determined before the offering of such lease.

"That the said Secretary during the life of the lease is authorized to issue such permits for easements herein provided to be reserved, and to permit the use of such other public lands in the Territory of Alaska as may be necessary for the construction and maintenance of coal washeries or other works incident to the mining or treatment of coal, which lands may be occupied and used jointly or severally by lessees or permittees, as may be determined by said Secretary.

"SEC. 12. That no lease issued under authority of this act shall be assigned or sublet except with the consent of the Secretary of the Interior. Each lease shall contain provisions for the purpose of insuring the exercise of reasonable diligence, skill, and care in the operation of said property, and for the safety and welfare of the miners and for the prevention of undue waste, including a restriction of the workday to not exceeding eight hours in any one day for underground workers, except in cases of emergency; provisions securing the workers complete freedom of purchase, requiring the payment of wages at least twice a month in lawful money of the United States, and providing proper rules and regulations to secure fair and just weighing or measurement of the coal mined by each miner, and such other provisions as are needed for the protection of the interests of the United States, for the prevention of monopoly, and for the safeguarding of the public welfare.

"SEC. 13. That the possession of any lessee of the land or coal deposits leased under this act for all purposes involving adverse claims to the leased property shall be deemed the possession of the United States, and for such purposes the lessee shall occupy the same relation to the property leased as if operated directly by the United States.

"SEC. 14. That any such lease may be forfeited and canceled by appropriate proceeding in a court of competent jurisdiction whenever the lessee fails to comply with any provision of the lease or of general regulations promulgated under this act: Provided, That the possession of any lessee of any lands covered by his lease and the operation of the mines and other works thereon or the title of the product thereof, shall not be interfered with by the Secretary of the Interior except after an appropriate proceeding in the district court of Alaska instituted for the purpose of securing a forfeiture or termination of such lease, and such forfeiture or termination shall take effect only from the date of entry of final judgment declaring such forfeiture or termination: Provided further, That such court proceedings must be instituted within 90 days after notice to the lessee of the facts constituting such cause of action, or the same shall be forever barred.

"SEC. 15. That on and after the approval of this act no lands in Alaska containing deposits of coal withdrawn from entry or sale shall be disposed of or acquired in any manner except as provided in this act: Provided, That the passage of this act shall not affect any proceeding now pending in the Department of the Interior, and any such proceeding may be carried to a final determination in said department notwithstanding the passage hereof: Provided further, That no lease shall be made, under the provisions hereof, of any land, a claim for which is pending in the Department of the Interior at the date of the passage of this act, until and unless such claim is finally disposed of by the department adversely to the claimant.

"SEC. 16. That all statements, representations, or reports required, unless otherwise specified, by the Secretary of the Interior under this act shall be upon oath and in such form and upon such blanks as the Secretary of the Interior may require.

"SEC. 17. That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to prescribe the necessary and proper rules and regulations and to do any and all things necessary to carry out and accomplish the purposes of this act.

"SEC. 18. That all acts and parts of acts in conflict herewith are hereby repealed."

And the Senate agree to the same.

AUTO TRUCKS FOR THE POSTAL SERVICE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a preceding day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 459) submitted by Mr. TOWNSEND September 28 (calendar day October 2, 1914), as follows:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be, and hereby is, directed to send to the Senate at the earliest possible date, all information in his possession or in the possession of the Post Office Department in any manner bearing upon the action of the department in inviting the manufacturers of auto trucks, some time prior to the 8th day of September, 1914, to submit bids for supplying such trucks for the use of said department.

Such information to include the department's invitation to bidders; copies or originals of the respective bids received; the action of the department in forming a committee to pass upon the bids; how, by whom appointed, and under what instructions the committee acted, as well as the names of the individuals composing said committee; the full report of the committee and the reasons for its award of contract or contracts to other than the lowest responsible bidder, if such awards were made, and all correspondence or facts that will tend to give the fullest possible information regarding this transaction.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Michigan what is the purpose of this resolution? Has the Senator reason to believe that anything wrong has been done in the letting of contracts by the department?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan has reason to believe that things were done in reference to the letting of this contract which, with such information as the public now possesses, are very difficult to understand.

The fact of the matter is, as I understand and as I learned from the purchasing agent, that some time ago bids were invited for the furnishing of a certain number of automobile trucks for the Post Office Department. Specifications were sent out with the clear understanding that the lowest responsible bidder would receive the award. The bids were opened on the 8th day of September, as I recall. There were forty-odd bidders. Agents came here from all over the United States to be present at the opening of the bids. They were submitted to a committee of five, one from each of the divisions of the Post Office Department and one from the purchasing agent's office. Report has it that this committee submitted their findings to the Postmaster General, and that he did not follow its recommendations; that the findings were sent back to the committee; that another report was made; that half of that was rejected; and that the contract was let to the White Co., of New York or Cleveland. The bid of the White Co. for one class of cars was eighteenth above that of the lowest bidder, and in another class it was twenty-eighth, as I recall it, above that of the lowest bidder. I am speaking largely from statements that have come to me from the bidders and from what I have gleaned from the purchasing agent, who knew nothing personally about the awards, as the matter was not left in his hands.

I did not care to discuss this matter or to cast any reflections at all until full information was obtained. All I wanted was the facts, in order to be able to answer the people who have a right to know what course the department followed in letting this contract. That the award was irregular I have no doubt. I hope the record will show nothing worse.

Mr. BRYAN. Has the Senator made any inquiry of the department?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I wrote a letter to the department asking about this matter, and it admitted that the contract had been let to the White Co. It stated that there were a number of White machines in the service now, and that the department thought it best to purchase other machines of the same company. They did not answer my question as to why they had put the manufacturers of automobile trucks all over the country to thousands of dollars of expense—and it amounted to that—to come down here to be present at the opening of bids when it was predetermined that the contract would be awarded not to the lowest bidder but to the White Co., which was far from the lowest bidder. There was no explanation of the apparent fact that several thousand dollars more had been paid for the White trucks than would have been necessary to purchase trucks of exactly similar specifications from other responsible companies.

Mr. BRYAN. How many trucks were purchased?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I believe six were finally purchased.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 241) for the appointment of four members of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to call attention to a matter before the morning hour shall close; but if the Senator from Oregon has a resolution which he desires to dispose of, I will give way for a moment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say to the Senator that the urgency for the consideration of the joint resolution grows out of the fact that the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers is incomplete now, and can not transact business.

Mr. BORAH. Will there be any discussion of the joint resolution?

Mr. BURTON. I wish to be heard briefly upon it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. How long will the Senator take?

Mr. BURTON. Not over 5 minutes.

Mr. BORAH. I will yield in order that the Senator from Oregon may secure consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee on the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 241) for the appointment of four members of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There are two or three amendments I desire to propose to the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 3, after the name "Illinois," it is proposed to strike out "George H. Wood, of Ohio," and to insert "John C. Nelson, of Indiana."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to state that that was the committee amendment. I am authorized to move to further amend the committee amendment, but I presume the motion will be in order after the committee amendment has been adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Oh, no.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Senator will pardon me, in this plan is it contemplated by the Senator from Oregon that efficient, honorable, and painstaking representatives who are now on this board shall be succeeded by Democrats?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If the Senator will listen to the amendments to be proposed, he will find that the name of Mr. George H. Wood will be restored to the joint resolution; and in addition to that——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is he one of the present managers?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No; he is not.

Mr. BURTON. He is not one of the members of the present board.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The purpose of the amendment is to increase the membership to five by inserting the name of Mr. Wood.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the Senator name the other gentleman whose name is to be inserted?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The other gentleman named in the proposed amendment of the committee is John C. Nelson.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does the Senator know the new man? Is he a Democrat?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say to the Senator that I really do not know the politics of any of these men. The joint resolution came from the House containing the names of James S. Catherwood, George H. Wood, Frederick J. Close, and Thomas S. Bridgham. Those were the names in the joint resolution as it came over to us from the House, and those names were selected by the House.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What I say about this matter is not intended to reveal any hostility to Democrats as such, but, Mr. President, I should dislike very much to see this board made partisan. I do not think that would be to our credit and I would not consent to such a plan.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am frank to say to the Senator that I do not know the politics of any of these gentlemen. They were named in the House; the joint resolution came to the Senate, and the Senate committee amended it by striking out the name of George H. Wood and inserting the name of John C. Nelson. I will say to the Senator it is now proposed to reinsert the name of George H. Wood and to add the name of John C. Nelson, so that there will be five appointees instead of four as provided for in the joint resolution as passed by the House.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Have these names been chosen by the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. They were chosen by the House.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The House Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And concurred in by the Senate Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The resolution when it came from the House was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not wish to intrude into the affairs of the Military Committee; I have no doubt its members are actuated by very worthy motives; but I think that we are getting a pretty strong representation of partisans on most of the boards which have recently been authorized.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Does the Senator know the politics of any of these gentlemen? I do not.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; but we have just created the Federal Reserve Board, supposed to be nonpartisan, whose functions rise far above the political horizon and relate to the welfare of the whole country, and I have been looking very diligently to find the Republican representation on that board. Partisanship is unbecoming in such a sphere, and I regret to see the President fill these places with Democrats alone.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I should like to suggest that I have been looking rather carefully to ascertain whether or not Democrats have had much representation on them.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They were appointed by the President from among his most active supporters.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, may I say a word?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. So far as I am able to do so, I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The gentleman appointed from the State of New York on the Federal Reserve Board testified that his political activities, whatever they had been, had always been for the Republican Party. I refer to Mr. Warburg.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think he also said that he never had been active.

Mr. SMOOT. And had never voted.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. As my recollection goes, he said he had never even take the trouble to vote, although he is able and honorable.

Mr. O'GORMAN. My impression is that he had aided the Republican Party in other ways.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Was he rewarded in this manner for his silence and failure to comply with the usual duties of citizenship, or was it because he was the only man who could be found to answer to that description, or because of the contributions of his firm to the Wilson campaign fund?

Mr. O'GORMAN. No; he was selected, I believe, because of his peculiar qualifications for the work in question; and in making the selection the President was not influenced by partisan considerations.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Michigan will not interject that question in here, because this is really an urgent matter.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I would not inject any partisanship into this matter if I could, and I have no disposition to do so to-day when everything seems to be running along so harmoniously on the other side of the Chamber. I do not know that I shall object to the passage of the joint resolution, but I would object very seriously to its passage if an attempt is made to make this board which has the control and direction of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers partisan.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Let me say to the Senator that the only question that has held up this joint resolution for so long is a sort of dispute between the Senators from Indiana and the Senators from Ohio. We thought we had overcome the difficulty by an amendment which would meet their objection. I will say that I have not heard the politics of any of these gentlemen discussed at any time.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator mean they got the men whom they desired appointed named in the joint resolution?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is unfair for the Senator to suggest that. The fact is the Senators from Ohio thought that Mr. Wood ought to be on the board, and there arose a dispute about it. There is no reason why both men should not be on the board, as they are both good men.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, if the Senator from Oregon will permit me, so far as I am concerned there has been no controversy in regard to the men. I do not look with favor on the proposed change in the personnel of the board, and I wish to be heard briefly on it at the proper time.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. KERN. The controversy grew up somewhat in this way: Col. Nelson, of Indiana, was named originally by the House committee. He was a distinguished Union soldier, who served throughout the war with the rank of captain, one of the leading citizens of Logansport, a man who has taken no interest in politics for years. The last I heard of him was in 1896, when he was a gold Democrat. I understand, however, that he generally affiliates with the Democratic Party, but he is a man whom no one regards as a politician. He is a high-grade, honorable gentleman, and a representative Union soldier. The proposition then was to substitute the name of a Spanish War veteran, Col. Wood, of Ohio, a very estimable man, in place of Col. Nelson, and that was finally done by the House. I insisted that this gallant old Union veteran, one of the best citizens of Indiana, should not be sidetracked for a soldier of a later war, against whom nothing in the world could be said, and so finally it was agreed that the service would not be impaired in any way by appointing both men on the board.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, may I ask a question of my colleague on the committee? I was out for a moment when the joint resolution was called up. How many appointees are proposed by the joint resolution?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. As it is proposed to be amended it names five.

Mr. WARREN. What will be the total number?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There will be seven on the full board.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator probably remembers—I want to refresh my memory about it—the legislation had a year or two ago, which proposed to do away with this board, and, which, if I remember rightly, provided that as each member's time expired the office should cease, and at the end it should be turned over to the War Department for management under the Secretary of War. Am I correct about that?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The report calls attention to that resolution.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will bear with me—I did not happen to be present when this resolution was considered in the committee—what are the terms of these appointees?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I really forget the terms of office. I did know at the time the joint resolution was considered by the committee, but I do not now recall the number.

Mr. WARREN. Do these appointments agree with the movement that was made in the legislation suggested a year or two ago?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I hardly think so, because that resolution provided that when the board was finally reduced to five there should not be any members in excess of that number; but the effect of this resolution, if passed, would be to repeal that, by implication, at least, and to appoint these men.

Mr. BORAH. Since our good friends on the other side have limited us to an hour to transact the business this morning, if it is their purpose to consume that hour I hope they will be so generous as to extend the time for 10 or 15 minutes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not think there will be any objection to that from this side.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to make one more inquiry. The old system provided for one member for each of the great national homes. After great discussion, especially in conference between the House and the Senate over this movement, it was determined, or, at least, that was the idea of the legislation, that unless there was a continuance of a member for each home—and so far as the old soldiers of the Civil War were concerned, they were getting to be very few—the number ought to be cut down, and finally have it lodged with the Secretary of War. Does the Senator think, if we are going to enlarge the number and amend that law, that we ought to stop short of the original number, the 10?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think we could do that. It is just a question of policy.

Mr. WEST. Is any salary carried by this appointment?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The members are only paid their expenses, I think, except the president of the board, who is really the acting head of it.

Mr. WARREN. That is correct.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the first amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask that the first amendment be not agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 3, after the word "Illinois," it is proposed to strike out "George H. Wood, of Ohio," and insert "John C. Nelson, of Indiana."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. On page 1, line 4, after the words "of Ohio," I move to insert "John C. Nelson, of Indiana."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There is another amendment on page 2 of the bill.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 1, after the word "Provided," it is proposed to strike out "Four" and insert "Five"; and after the word "members," to strike out "of said board," so as to read:

Provided, Five members shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business at any regular or special meeting thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should like to have inserted, after the word "accepted," on page 2, line 1, the words "and John M. Holley, deceased."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "accepted," in line 1, page 2, it is proposed to insert the words "and John M. Holley, deceased."

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution is in Committee of the Whole and still open to amendment.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I do not at all question the good faith of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate, and there is no doubt that the members selected for the Board of Managers of the Soldiers' Homes are men of excellent character and ability; but this proposed action, coming to us in the form of a resolution from the House, is certainly open to the charge of partisanship.

In the selection of the Board of Managers of the Soldiers' Home in the past no political considerations have been allowed to have weight. It is true that the majority of the members have been Republicans. There was at least one member, however, from my own State—Gen. Anderson—who held office not only for the allotted six years but until his death, who was prominent in Democratic politics. But what appears here? Three Republicans, well known as such—Oscar M. Gottschall, of Ohio; William Warner, of Missouri, for six years a Member of this body; and Franklin Murphy, of New Jersey, formerly governor, all of them Republicans—together with another member, who is deceased, whose politics I do not know, are to be superseded by four Democrats, one of them an appointee of the Democratic governor of Ohio.

I recognize that it is in the power of the Democratic majority to pass this resolution. They have the responsibility for appointments and the general conduct of affairs, and while at times I have objected to this resolution, I am not disposed to continue my objection. I do wish, at least, to state, however, that the course of this board of managers will be very carefully scrutinized in future. It would be in their power, now that there is a Democratic majority, to reorganize the official force in the respective soldiers' homes. I think in the soldiers' home in my own State, at Dayton, there are as many as 500 employees. I have received a promise from one of the prospective members who is to be appointed here that he will entirely ignore political considerations; that he will not listen to the dictates of any Democratic boss or leader in the making of appointments. Certainly in the years in which I have been associated with politics in Ohio I do not recall ever having made a recommendation for an appointment in that soldiers' home, and I trust the same standard may be observed now that the board of managers is under the control of Democrats.

I do not so much object to their politics, but I have some degree of apprehension that this selection of four Democrats means a reorganization of the respective soldiers' homes, in their management, along political lines. I wish to state here that the course of the management, in the performance of the duties intrusted to them, certainly will be very carefully watched.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I think the Secretary and I did not understand each other. After the word "Provided," I proposed the following amendment:

Said board, after the passage of this resolution, shall be composed of seven members, and.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert, on page 2, line 1, after the word "Provided," the following words:

Said board, after the passage of this resolution, shall be composed of seven members, and.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A joint resolution for the appointment of five members of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers."

COTTON SITUATION IN THE SOUTH.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I gave notice that I would address the Senate to-day, immediately after the morning business, on the cotton situation in the South. Inasmuch as the Senate has decided to adjourn at 1 o'clock, I desire to give notice that on to-morrow, immediately after the conclusion of the morning business, I shall address the Senate.

HOUR OF ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. BORAH. I ask the Senator from Indiana if he will not move for a reconsideration of his motion, so that we may have until half past 1 o'clock to-day.

Mr. KERN. I move that the vote be reconsidered by which the Senate agreed to adjourn at 1 o'clock to-day.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. KERN. I will say that the motion is made with the understanding that as soon as the Senator from Idaho concludes his remarks the Senate will adjourn. That is the understanding.

WILHELMINA ROHE.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 11166. It gives a pensionable status to Mrs. Wilhelmina Rohe, the widow of a soldier who lost his life in Japan 13 years ago. He was a private. He disappeared, and some few days afterwards a body was found near by. There was some question as to whether it was that of the missing soldier. The department has no objection to the passage of the bill. It has been passed by the House, and has the recommendation of the Committee on Military Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws John Rohe shall be hereafter held and considered to have been drowned in Nagasaki Harbor, Japan, on the 20th day of March, 1901, in line of duty and while in the service of the United States as a private in Company M, Twenty-sixth Regiment United States Volunteer Infantry.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, has the Senator read the report of the department containing a letter from The Adjutant General?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I have it before me.

Mr. BRYAN. Does the Senator find any place there where it is made evident that the body found was the body of this soldier?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I read from next to the last paragraph of a letter sent by Gen. Andrews, The Adjutant General:

A consideration of the facts recited indicates that there is merit in the case, and that the matter may be so presented to Congress as to warrant the favorable action desired.

Then, in the last sentence of the last paragraph, it is stated, in substance, that a bill proposing legislation to the effect that the principal "shall hereafter be held and considered" to have been discharged or killed or drowned, as the case may be, has not been found to be objectionable.

Mr. BRYAN. I think I shall have to object to the consideration of the bill at this time.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I am very sorry the Senator takes that attitude, particularly after the Military Affairs Committee has unanimously approved the bill.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, it has been some time since I read the report of the committee, but there is no evidence at all there to show whether this man deserted or was drowned or was killed or what became of him. He may be living yet, a deserter from the Army of the United States, and we are solemnly to declare here that he shall be considered to have been drowned.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. BRYAN. We do not know whether he was drowned or not. There is no evidence here to show that he has been drowned. There is no evidence but that he is living to-day.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The fact is that he was reported missing on March 20, 1901, from the camp occupied by the Twenty-sixth United States Infantry at Japan. He has not been seen since. On April 3 following, about two weeks later, a man's body was found clad in a United States soldier's uniform in the bay near Nagasaki, close to the point where he disappeared. While the body was not actually identified as being that of Rohe, its state of decomposition making it impossible definitely to recognize the body, the indications were that the body was that of the missing soldier.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator from New York yield to me for a moment?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I yield.

Mr. WARREN. I desire to say, in regard to this case, that the evidence was carefully examined by the subcommittee having it in charge, and every circumstance seemed to indicate the death of the soldier by drowning.

In the first place, it was discovered that the soldier whose body was found had on a nearly new uniform, and the records show that Rohe had drawn a new uniform but a short time before that.

In the next place, it was shown that he was on the vessel with other troops prior to this time; that no other soldier of that command was missing; and while the withdrawal of those troops of course left it so that direct evidence from his comrades could not be had, the later advices from his comrades after they arrived on this side, the short time that elapsed between the time he was known to be in the service and the time of his disappearance, the fact of his new uniform, and the fact that no other soldier was missing at the time, give every presumption that the man was drowned, as set forth in the report.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from New York if it is not a fact that under the common law, in case of absence for seven years without being heard from, the person is presumed to be dead?

Mr. O'GORMAN. That presumption is indulged in and respected by nearly every court in this country.

Mr. BRYAN. Suppose he is dead; where is the evidence that he was drowned? Where is the evidence that he died in the line of duty? If he died in the line of duty we do not need to pass any legislation. The department will pay his widow a pension. This bill comes here because the department can not see its way clear to arrive at the conclusion that he was drowned. That is the trouble.

You have two difficulties here. In the first place, there is a question whether the body found was the body of this soldier. Upon that question it is said that the soldier had on practically new clothes and that the clothes found upon this body were new clothes; but, going further to identify him, it is said that Rohe had sound teeth, while there were 10 teeth missing from the body of the man that was found. Then, again, a Japanese officer reported that the death of the individual whose body was found was accidental and occurred about March 22, 1901.

The origin of death was not certain; probably it was by suicide. So you have not identification sufficient to show that the man is dead at all; and then, again, there is no proof whatever that he died in the line of duty. If he was a suicide, as a matter of course his widow is not entitled to a pension. That is the reason why I object to the consideration of the bill. I do not think the case is made. If he did die by drowning and the department can justly come to that conclusion, there is no necessity for this bill.

Mr. WARREN. No; the department can not come to that conclusion. It states that this can only be effected by legislation.

Mr. BRYAN. What is the reason? The department says:

The department has not undertaken to decide that the body found was not the body of Rohe, but it has taken the ground that in the absence of definite and conclusive evidence of the identity of the remains as those of Rohe, and of his death while in the line of his duty as a soldier, it is not justified by any process of elimination or otherwise in reaching the conclusion that the charge of desertion recorded against him is erroneous, or that he died while in the military service of the United States.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I desire to repeat the statement made by The Adjutant General, who examined into this case:

From evidence presented to this department it appears that there is considerable reason for believing that the body found was that of Rohe,

The soldier was missing for 10 or 15 days before the discovery of the body.

This matter has received the attention of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House; it has received the approval of that committee and of the House itself; it has been investigated by the Committee on Military Affairs of this body and has had its approval, and it is difficult to discover anything to justify opposition to the passage of such a meritorious bill under the circumstances as disclosed by this record.

Mr. BRYAN. Of course, the bill never had any business to go to the Committee on Military Affairs of the House or the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate. It is purely a bill providing for a pension. It may be supposed that the Committee on Pensions, liberal as they are, could not see their way clear to do this, and it was taken to another committee. But it does not make any difference what committee reports it, there is no evidence here upon which we can base a vote in its favor. I do not think the bill ought to pass.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Do I understand that the Senator from Florida has withdrawn his objection to the consideration of the bill? If the Senator has not withdrawn objection to unanimous consent, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New York.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 11166) for the relief of Wilhelmina Rohe.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill has been read. If there be no amendment, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, just one word. I have not had time to look at the report and I have only heard partially what has been said this morning, but if it is a bill placing the widow of a soldier on the pension roll it ought to have been sent to the Committee on Pensions. It has no right to be considered by any other committee.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator from Utah allow me?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. This bill is to correct the military record, and such bills always go to the Committee on Military Affairs. When it comes to the matter of a pension the department will pass upon the question whether there ought to be a pension granted or not. If the bill passes, the Pension Bureau will look after that, and if it should again come before Congress as a bill pensioning the widow it would naturally go to the Committee on Pensions. This bill has no possible relation to the Committee on Pensions, in the first instance, because it is a matter of correcting the military record.

Mr. SMOOT. As I said, I have not had time even to read the bill, and I inferred from what I heard of the discussion that it is purely a pension matter. If so, it should have gone, of course, to the Committee on Pensions. I will admit that what the Senator from Wyoming says is true, that if it is to correct the military record of a soldier it should go to the Committee on Military Affairs. Therefore, what I was going to say, if that be the case, will be unnecessary at this time.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, in justification of what I have said I want to say that the letter of The Adjutant General states that there were two members of the regiment who left the ship, and it was supposed that they had deserted. Rohe never rejoined it. The Adjutant General does not say whether the other man ever did or not. Instead of saying "shall be hereafter held and considered to have been drowned" I think it would be more justifiable to say "to have died in the line of duty." There is no evidence at all that he was drowned. But the effect will be the same, and I will not make a motion to amend the bill. The widow will get a pension whether he was drowned or not, and whether he is dead or not.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EMPLOYEES OF RAILWAY MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, a few days ago I called the attention of the Senate to what purported to be a statement upon the part of Alexander H. Stephens, General Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service, in a speech which he delivered at Indianapolis, Ind. I expressed some doubt at the time as to whether or not Mr. Stephens had been correctly reported. The statement seemed exceptional and almost incredible. But since that time I have received a copy of the Railway Post Office, a monthly published by the Railway Mail Association, at Cleveland, Ohio, and under date of September 19, 1914, there appears to be a complete report of his speech. I no longer have any doubt as to the fact that he used this language, and I shall act upon that conviction until the language is disavowed or disproved.

This incident arises from the signing of petitions on the part of employees of the Railway Mail Service concerning a certain bill which is now pending before the Senate, or rather which has been introduced and is now before the committee. In view of the language of Mr. Stephens and his conduct, I wish to read the body of this petition. I think the Senate will see that it is expressed in moderate terms and could be offensive to no one. I will say, however, that I did not draw this petition, neither did I know it was being circulated, but it is a petition which, as I take it, is clothed in proper language. It could not offend the most sensitive. It could only disturb those who have no answer but power to punish those who differ from them.

To the Members of the United States Senate in Congress assembled:

We, the undersigned, members of the Railway Mail Service, desire to call your attention and ask your support of a bill introduced by Senator WILLIAM E. BORAH (Senate bill 5826) to do away with "speeding up," or, as he has put it, "stop-watch methods," in the Government service.

We have been furnishing data on "speed tests" for some time, and while we do not object seriously to the extra work involved in getting this data for the records of the Post Office Department, we do object to having it used to our own disadvantage. That it is going to be so used is evident from the fact that we are charged with demerit marks if we do not show a certain speed.

In our service the amount of work to be done on any trip is influenced by so many and such varying conditions that no fixed standard amount of work can avoid working hardships on the clerks and to the detriment of the service.

Senator BORAH'S bill, if passed, will make it impossible for the department to establish such a standard.

We assure you that the passing of this law will lessen the feeling of uneasiness and discontent in our branch of the Government service.

That is the petition in its entirety. In discussing this matter Mr. Stephens is reported in this speech as having said:

And let me tell you that anybody that signs that petition with that statement is up before the general superintendent of this service for removal for lying. Tell your fellow clerks that. I do not think any of you gentlemen in Indianapolis have signed that petition, but whoever signs it is going to come up before the general superintendent for removal.

Again he says—and I invite the particular attention of those who may be in close communication with the Postmaster General to this statement:

I have the power and the authority and the inclination and the decision to remove that man from the service.

I do not assume, of course, that the Postmaster General has authorized Mr. Stephens to make any such statement, but I am wondering where Mr. Stephens got authority to say that he has "the power and the authority and the inclination and the decision" to remove the man from the service for the mere fact of signing a respectfully written petition concerning a measure in which the particular individual signing the petition might be himself interested. It would be in violation of the civil-service law, in defiance of both the letter and spirit, and he would not assume to have any such authority, it would seem, unless he had been authorized by those above him who would protect him. Mr. Stephens's language can have no other construction than that the Postmaster General will connive at and aid in violating the civil-service law and in punishing employees for the exercise of a most fundamental right of citizenship.

I do not know that that is true; but either Mr. Stephens should explain his language and disavow this statement or the inference must follow that the Postmaster General has authorized him to make such a statement.

Mr. President, since this address was delivered I have received a great many letters from different parties who signed the petition, and while I am not going to insert the names signed to these letters and subject these men to the surveillance and to the impudent interference of this tyrannizing satellite of bureaucracy, I am going to read enough of them to show the effect his statement has had. This letter says:

I am taking the liberty of writing you in regard to the bill relating to doing away with the speed test in the Railway Mail Service. My name appears on what I now believe may be one of those petitions, and I take this means of respectfully asking you to strike my name off the petition. I am inclosing you a stock envelope by which I hope to be favored with a propitious reply.

Another writer from another State says:

Recently petitions to Congress urging the enactment into law of your bill, Senate bill No. 5826, which would do away with "speed tests" that are being applied to the Government service, were circulated among railway postal clerks.

I signed one of these petitions, because I felt sure that the speed test would not be a practical demonstration of a clerk's ability, as it was proposed and is administered. Subsequent events have only strengthened my convictions. The speed test is a theory that works well on paper but not in actual practice.

However, our general superintendent, A. H. Stephens, in a recent speech to railway postal clerks, which is published in our official organ, the Railway Post Office, for the month of September, says he has "the power and the authority and the inclination and the decision" to remove from the service every clerk who signed the petition. Although

I deny the general superintendent's charge that the petition is a lie and while I deny that he has any just cause for my removal, still I believe that he has the whip hand and could remove me on one charge or another, fancied, if not real.

Therefore you will please remove my name from the said petition.

While my sympathies are with your bill and I hope it becomes law, yet I can ill afford to lose my position.

For that reason and that reason alone I desire you to at least withhold my name.

Wishing you success, I am,

Very respectfully—

And so forth.

Another letter from a different part of the country reads as follows:

DEAR SIR: I would most respectfully request that my name be erased from a recent petition forwarded you in support of your bill to abolish what is known as the speed test in the Railway Mail Service.

Not that I am not in full sympathy with and indorse your bill, but recent public statements of the General Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service places in jeopardy the position of every clerk who attaches his name to the petition sent you. While I feel fully satisfied that the Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service will not directly remove a man for exercising a right guaranteed him by the Constitution of the United States and vouchsafed by a recent act of Congress, yet when once in possession of the names of the clerks who signed the petition in question, methods could be devised to secure their removal without the necessity of having to give the signing of this petition as a reason therefor. Against such a contingency, what chance has a clerk to feel sure of his position?

I have given the best part of my life—and my record will show that I have given it faithfully and conscientiously—to the Railway Mail Service, and with a wife and family dependent upon me for support I can not afford to take the chance of being summarily removed.

For these reasons alone I wish to withdraw my name.

Mr. President, could anything be more intolerable or indefensible than just that condition of affairs? We have upon the statute books of the United States an express provision of law providing that these employees and similar employees may have the right to petition Congress. It would hardly be supposed that it would ever be necessary to place that rule in the crystallized form of a statute in view of the fundamental and essential principles of our Government and the charter under which we live. But, nevertheless, we did as an additional guaranty and an additional safeguard enact into the law of August 24, 1912, that they should have this right, the inference and the logic being that they should not be interfered with or disturbed by reason of the exercise of the right. Yet by the signing of a most respectfully couched petition concerning a matter in which they are gravely interested, and about which their judgment ought to be always considered, they are informed by the Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service that he is authorized, not only authorized but determined, to remove them.

But we not only have, Mr. President, this statute and the law of the land, but I am also going to read an expression of view from one of the noted works of modern fiction—the Democratic platform. It says, as adopted at Baltimore:

We also recognize the right of direct petition to Congress by employees for the redress of grievances.

Mr. President, there are numerous letters here which I might insert in the RECORD, but I have read enough to show the situation. I introduce these in the RECORD for the purpose of inviting to its reading the attention of the Postmaster General, and I further put them in the RECORD for the purpose of inviting the attention of the President of the United States. If this remains unchallenged, and this language of Mr. Stephens is not disavowed, if it is permitted to stand as it now is, we must accept the proposition that this administration is willing, in the face of the plainest and most uncontroverted principles of free government and in the face of their platform pledges, to see men thus harassed and punished and denied their simplest rights. I shall wait with interest, for this is not a trivial matter and will not be permitted to rest unless disavowed.

It is difficult to realize that we have traveled thus far already, Mr. President, on this blighting, vicious, undermining, sapping system of bureaucracy. Citizens of a great Republic, interested in a matter of proposed legislation, are deprived of their right to express themselves concerning it, even in a most orderly and respectable way, and are deprived of that right by a mere petty, impudent, time-serving, slavish, coarse-grained, cowardly attaché of bureaucracy. These men, as one can not doubt from their letters, feel sincerely in regard to this matter, and the fact that they may be right or may be wrong as to their views can not, on the question of their right to express themselves, have any relevancy whatever. But notwithstanding their interests and their views, they feel that they can not risk annoyance and punishment, can not risk being pushed out of a position and their families subjected to want and suffering, and therefore yield to the situation—give up their right to have a say or a voice in the matter of deepest concern to them as citizens. They are in effect disfranchised; they are robbed of their first right as citizens, as supporters and taxpayers of the Government, as law-abiding, home-loving citizens, and robbed of this right by an arbitrary, bullying, vicious, and unconscionable overemployee of the Government.

The first impulse and the first instinct of a gentleman is to be considerate, thoughtful, and tolerant of the interests and views of those who chance to be below him in the struggle of life. No man unmindful of the rights of his fellow man or intolerant as to the plainest privileges of citizenship has sufficient moral fiber left in his being to represent this Republic in any capacity whatever.

A man loyal to our institutions, sensitive in the slightest degree to the admonitions which come to those who would see them preserved, will respect the rights of the humblest and most dependent as quickly as the rights of the strong and the powerful. One who would brutalize the feelings of those who can not except at great cost protect their interests is to be distrusted, for he possesses neither the sense of justice nor the conception of manhood indispensable to a trusted employee of the Government. These men, sir, are under him; they are at his mercy. The civil-service law would be futile to protect them. For entertaining such narrow, vicious, and vindictive feelings there is no falsehood he would not father, no slander he would not propagate to bring them within the rules of the civil service and within the pale of his splenetic and revengeful purpose.

Now, Mr. President, these employees need take no further risk. Their situation is fully understood; whatever merit this bill has will be fully presented and made known. If it has sufficient merit to commend itself to the Congress, it will become a law. If there is any one argument, however, which stands out more strongly in its favor than any other, it is that these men are to be speeded up and tested under the supervision and gaze of a man who seems to think that they are slaves and subjects, the despised dumb cogs in a vast machine, to be worked to the limit, and when worn and broken to be kicked into a junk pile as refuse and waste.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Senate adjourn until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Twelve o'clock or 11 o'clock?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Some Senator has suggested 12 o'clock, and I move that the Senate adjourn until that hour.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, October 8, 1914, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, October 7, 1914.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord our God and our Father, humbly and reverently we bow before Thee that our souls may receive that uplift of the spirit which comes through personal contact with Thee; that the demands of our higher and better nature may be subserved, and Thy will be done in us, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the Journal.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] makes the point of order that there is no quorum present, and evidently there is not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this call 266 Members, a quorum, have answered to their names.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors, and the Clerk will read the Journal.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence, for 15 days, owing to sickness in his family.

ANTITRUST LEGISLATION.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the conference report on the antitrust bill.

The conference report was read, as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 1168).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 25, 35, 38, 42, 45, 46, 47, 53, 56, 59, 63, 80, 93, and 94.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 3, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 17, 19, 20, 21, 23, 24, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 36, 37, 40, 44, 48, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 75, 79, 81, 82, 83, 85, 87, and 88; and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 2: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out by said amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 2. That it shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, either directly or indirectly, to discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities, which commodities are sold for use, consumption, or resale within the United States or any Territory thereof or the District of Columbia or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States, where the effect of such discrimination may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent discrimination in price between purchasers of commodities on account of differences in the grade, quality, or quantity of the commodity sold, or that makes only due allowance for difference in the cost of selling or transportation, or discrimination in price in the same or different communities made in good faith to meet competition: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall prevent persons engaged in selling goods, wares, or merchandise in commerce from selecting their own customers in bona fide transactions and not in restraint of trade."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 4: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 3. That it shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, to lease or make a sale or contract for sale of goods, wares, merchandise, machinery, supplies, or other commodities, whether patented or unpatented, for use, consumption, or resale within the United States or any Territory thereof, or the District of Columbia or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States, or fix a price charged therefor, or discount from, or rebate upon, such price, on the condition, agreement, or understanding that the lessee or purchaser thereof shall not use or deal in the goods, wares, merchandise, machinery, supplies, or other commodities of a competitor or competitors of the lessor or seller, where the effect of such lease, sale, or contract for sale or such condition, agreement, or understanding may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 5: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the figure "3" inserted by said amendment insert the figure "4"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 6: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 5. That a final judgment or decree hereafter rendered in any criminal prosecution or in any suit or proceeding in equity brought by or on behalf of the United States under the antitrust laws to the effect that a defendant has violated said laws shall be prima facie evidence against such defendant in any suit or proceeding brought by any other party against such defendant under said laws as to all matters respecting which said judgment or decree would be an estoppel as between the parties thereto: Provided, This section shall not apply to consent judgments or decrees entered before any testimony has been taken: Provided further, This section shall not apply to consent judgments or decrees rendered in criminal proceedings or suits in equity, now pending, in which the taking of testimony has been commenced but has not been concluded, provided such judgments or decrees are rendered before any further testimony is taken.

"Whenever any suit or proceeding in equity or criminal prosecution is instituted by the United States to prevent, restrain, or punish violations of any of the antitrust laws, the running of the statute of limitations in respect of each and every private right of action arising under said laws and based in whole or in part on any matter complained of in said suit or proceeding shall be suspended during the pendency thereof."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 7: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 7, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the figure "5" inserted by said amendment insert the figure "6"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 16: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 16, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the figure "6" inserted by said amendment insert the figure "7"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 18: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 18, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the words stricken out by said amendment insert the word "substantially"; after the word "acquisition" and the comma thereafter, in line 16, page 7, insert "or to restrain such commerce in any section or community"; and after the word "or," in line 16, page 7, insert the word "tend"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 22: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 22, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the words stricken out by said amendment insert the word "substantially"; after the word "acquired" and the comma thereafter, in line 24, page 7, insert "or to restrain such commerce in any section or community"; and after the word "or," in line 1, page 8, insert the word "tend"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 39: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 39, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the word "thereof" at the end of said amendment add the words "or the civil remedies therein provided"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 41: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 41, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out by said amendment strike out only the matter contained in lines 16 to 24, inclusive, page 9, and lines 1 to 17, inclusive, page 10; at the beginning of line 18, page 10, insert "SEC. 8"; after the word "association," in line 21, page 10, strike out the comma, and after the word "company," in the same line, insert a comma; after the words "United States," in line 22, page 10, insert a comma; strike out the figures "$2,500,000," in line 24, page 10, and in line 3, page 11, and insert in lieu thereof in each instance the figures "$5,000,000"; in line 16, page 11, after the word "association," strike out the comma, and in the same line, after the word "company," insert a comma; in line 17, page 11, after the words "United States," insert a comma; strike out the word "one," in line 18, page 11, and insert in lieu thereof the word "two"; and after the word "association," in line 23, page 11, strike out the comma; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 43: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 43, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 16, page 12, after the word "than," insert the following: "banks, banking associations, trust companies and"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 49: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 49, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Change "SEC. 8" to "SEC. 9"; and after the words "accruing from" in said amendment insert the following: ", or used in,"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 50: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 50, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 11. That authority to enforce compliance with sections 2, 3, 7 and 8 of this act by the persons respectively subject thereto is hereby vested: In the Interstate Commerce Commission where applicable to common carriers, in the Federal Reserve Board where applicable to banks, banking associations, and trust companies, and in the Federal trade commission where applicable to all other character of commerce, to be exercised as follows:

"Whenever the commission or board vested with jurisdiction thereof shall have reason to believe that any person is violating or has violated any of the provisions of sections 2, 3, 7 and 8 of this act, it shall issue and serve upon such person a complaint stating its charges in that respect, and containing a notice of a hearing upon a day and at a place therein fixed at least 30 days after the service of said complaint. The person so complained of shall have the right to appear at the place and time so fixed and show cause why an order should not be entered by the commission or board requiring such person to cease and desist from the violation of the law so charged in said complaint. Any person may make application, and upon good cause shown may be allowed by the commission or board, to intervene and appear in said proceeding by counsel or in person. The testimony in any such proceeding shall be reduced to writing and filed in the office of the commission or board. If upon such hearing the commission or board, as the case may be, shall be of the opinion that any of the provisions of said sections have been or are being violated, it shall make a report in writing in which it shall state its findings as to the facts, and shall issue and cause to be served on such person an order requiring such person to cease and desist from such violations, and divest itself of the stock held or rid itself of the directors chosen contrary to the provisions of sections 7 and 8 of this act, if any there be, in the manner and within the time fixed by said order. Until a transcript of the record in such hearing shall have been filed in a circuit court of appeals of the United States, as hereinafter provided, the commission or board may at any time, upon such notice and in such manner as it shall deem proper, modify or set aside, in whole or in part, any report or any order made or issued by it under this section.

"If such person fails or neglects to obey such order of the commission or board while the same is in effect, the commission or board may apply to the circuit court of appeals of the United States, within any circuit where the violation complained of was or is being committed or where such person resides or carries on business, for the enforcement of its order, and shall certify and file with its application a transcript of the entire record in the proceeding, including all the testimony taken and the report and order of the commission or board. Upon such filing of the application and transcript the court shall cause notice thereof to be served upon such person and thereupon shall have jurisdiction of the proceeding and of the question determined therein, and shall have power to make and enter upon the pleadings, testimony, and proceedings set forth in such transcript a decree affirming, modifying, or setting aside the order of the commission or board. The findings of the commission or board as to the facts, if supported by testimony, shall be conclusive. If either party shall apply to the court for leave to adduce additional evidence, and shall show to the satisfaction of the court that such additional evidence is material and that there were reasonable grounds for the failure to adduce such evidence in the proceeding before the commission or board, the court may order such additional evidence to be taken before the commission or board and to be adduced upon the hearing in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as to the court may seem proper. The commission or board may modify its findings as to the facts, or make new findings, by reason of the additional evidence so taken, and it shall file such modified or new findings, which, if supported by testimony, shall be conclusive, and its recommendation, if any, for the modification or setting aside of its original order, with the return of such additional evidence. The judgment and decree of the court shall be final, except that the same shall be subject to review by the Supreme Court upon certiorari as provided in section 240 of the Judicial Code.

"Any party required by such order of the commission or board to cease and desist from a violation charged may obtain a review of such order in said circuit court of appeals by filing in the court a written petition praying that the order of the commission or board be set aside. A copy of such petition shall be forthwith served upon the commission or board, and thereupon the commission or board forthwith shall certify and file in the court a transcript of the record as hereinbefore provided. Upon the filing of the transcript the court shall have the same jurisdiction to affirm, set aside, or modify the order of the commission or board as in the case of an application by the commission or board for the enforcement of its order, and the findings of the commission or board as to the facts, if supported by testimony, shall in like manner be conclusive.

"The jurisdiction of the circuit court of appeals of the United States to enforce, set aside, or modify orders of the commission or board shall be exclusive.

"Such proceedings in the circuit court of appeals shall be given precedence over other cases pending therein, and shall be in every way expedited. No order of the commission or board or the judgment of the court to enforce the same shall in any wise relieve or absolve any person from any liability under the antitrust acts.

"Complaints, orders, and other processes of the commission or board under this section may be served by anyone duly authorized by the commission or board, either (a) by delivering a copy thereof to the person to be served, or to a member of the partnership to be served, or to the president, secretary, or other executive officer or a director of the corporation to be served; or (b) by leaving a copy thereof at the principal office or place of business of such person; or (c) by registering and mailing a copy thereof addressed to such person at his principal office or place of business. The verified return by the person so serving said complaint, order, or other process setting forth the manner of said service shall be proof of the same, and the return post-office receipt for said complaint, order, or other process registered and mailed as aforesaid shall be proof of the service of the same."

And transpose the same to follow amendment 51.

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 51: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 51, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 10. That after two years from the approval of this act no common carrier engaged in commerce shall have any dealings in securities, supplies, or other articles of commerce, or shall make or have any contracts for construction or maintenance of any kind, to the amount of more than $50,000, in the aggregate, in any one year, with another corporation, firm, partnership, or association when the said common carrier shall have upon its board of directors or as its president, manager, or as its purchasing or selling officer, or agent in the particular transaction, any person who is at the same time a director, manager, or purchasing or selling officer of, or who has any substantial interest in, such other corporation, firm, partnership, or association, unless and except such purchases shall be made from, or such dealings shall be with, the bidder whose bid is the most favorable to such common carrier, to be ascertained by competitive bidding under regulations to be prescribed by rule or otherwise by the Interstate Commerce Commission. No bid shall be received unless the name and address of the bidder or the names and addresses of the officers, directors, and general managers thereof, if the bidder be a corporation, or of the members, if it be a partnership or firm, be given with the bid.

"Any person who shall, directly or indirectly, do or attempt to do anything to prevent anyone from bidding or shall do any act to prevent free and fair competition among the bidders or those desiring to bid shall be punished as prescribed in this section in the case of an officer or director.

"Every such common carrier having any such transactions or making any such purchases shall within 30 days after making the same file with the Interstate Commerce Commission a full and detailed statement of the transaction showing the manner of the competitive bidding, who were the bidders, and the names and addresses of the directors and officers of the corporations and the members of the firm or partnership bidding; and whenever the said commission shall, after investigation or hearing, have reason to believe that the law has been violated in and about the said purchases or transactions it shall transmit all papers and documents and its own views or findings regarding the transaction to the Attorney General.

"If any common carrier shall violate this section it shall be fined not exceeding $25,000; and every such director, agent, manager, or officer thereof who shall have knowingly voted for or directed the act constituting such violation or who shall have aided or abetted in such violation shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be fined not exceeding $5,000, or confined in jail not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court."

And transpose the same to follow line 23, page 13.

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 52: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 52, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the figure "11" inserted by said amendment insert the figure "12"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 55: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 55, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the figure "12" inserted by said amendment insert the figure "13"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 57: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 57, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the figure "13" inserted by said amendment insert the figure "14"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 58: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 58, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Reinsert the matter stricken out by said amendment and insert the word "penal" after the words "any of the" and before the word "provisions," in line 15, page 14, and omit the matter inserted by said amendment; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 60: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 60, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the figure "14" inserted by said amendment insert the figure "15"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 61: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 61, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the figure "15" inserted by said amendment insert the figure "16"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 64: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 64, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the figure "16" inserted by said amendment insert the figure "17"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 71: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 71, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the figure "17" inserted by said amendment insert the figure "18"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 72: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 72, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Reinsert the matter stricken out by said amendment, inserting the word "sixteen" in lieu of the word "fourteen," in line 5, page 18; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 73: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 73, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the figure "18" inserted by said amendment insert the figure "19"; and the Senate agree to the same.

The statement is as follows:

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes, submit the following detailed statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report as to each of the amendments of the Senate, namely:

Amendment No. 1: This amendment provides that nothing in this act shall apply to the Philippine Islands.

Amendment No. 2: This amendment is a substitute agreed upon in conference as section 2, to take the place of section 2 in the bill as passed by the House. It eliminates the penalty of the original House bill, but declares the acts therein forbidden to be unlawful. It is as follows:

SEC. 2. That it shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, either directly or indirectly, to discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities, which commodities are sold for use, consumption, or resale within the United States or any Territory thereof or the District of Columbia or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States, where the effect of such discrimination may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent discrimination in price between purchasers of commodities on account of differences in the grade, quality, or quantity of the commodity sold, or that makes only due allowance for difference in the cost of selling or transportation, or discrimination in price in the same or different commodities made in good faith to meet competition: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall prevent persons engaged in selling goods, wares, or merchandise in commerce from selecting their own customers in bona fide transactions and not in restraint of trade.

Amendment No. 3: This amendment strikes out the original House section 3, providing against the arbitrary refusal to sell certain commodities and the penalty therefor.

Amendment No. 4: This amendment strikes out section 4 of the original House bill, providing against lease or sale, upon condition, of goods, wares, etc., with condition, agreement, or understanding that the lessee or purchaser shall not use or deal in the goods, etc., of a competitor and the penalty prescribed therein. It also strikes out section 2 as proposed by the Senate, dealing with the same subject, and the following is agreed to in conference as a substitute therefor:

SEC. 3. That it shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, to lease or make a sale or contract for sale of goods, wares, merchandise, machinery, supplies, or other commodities, whether patented or unpatented, for use, consumption, or resale within the United States or any Territory thereof or the District of Columbia or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States, or fix a price charged therefor, or discount from, or rebate upon, such price, on the condition, agreement, or understanding that the lessee or purchaser thereof shall not use or deal in the goods, wares, merchandise, machinery, supplies, or other commodities of a competitor or competitors of the lessor or seller, where the effect of such lease, sale, or contract for sale, or such condition, agreement, or understanding may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce.

Amendment No. 5: This amendment changes the number of this section from section 5 to section 4 to conform to other changes.

Amendment No. 6: This amendment strikes out section 6 of the original House bill, granting the benefit of the issues found in favor of the Government to individual suitors in actions or proceedings brought under or involving the provisions of any of the antitrust laws; also strikes out the amendment proposed by the Senate as section 4 of the Senate bill, relating to the same subject, and inserts in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 5. That a final judgment or decree hereafter rendered in any criminal prosecution or in any suit or proceeding in equity brought by or on behalf of the United States under the antitrust laws, to the effect that a defendant has violated said laws, shall be prima facie evidence against such defendant in any suit or proceeding brought by any other party against such defendant under said laws, as to all matters respecting which said judgment or decree would be an estoppel as between the parties thereto: Provided, This section shall not apply to consent judgments or decrees entered before any testimony has been taken: Provided further, This section shall not apply to consent judgments or decrees rendered in criminal proceedings or suits in equity now pending in which the taking of testimony has been commenced but has not been concluded, provided such judgments or decrees are rendered before any further testimony is taken.

Whenever any suit or proceeding in equity or criminal prosecution is instituted by the United States to prevent, restrain, or punish violations of any of the antitrust laws, the running of the statute of limitations in respect of each and every private right of action arising under said laws and based in whole or in part on any matter complained of in said suit or proceeding shall be suspended during the pendency thereof.

Amendment No. 7: This amendment changes the number of this section from section 7 to section 6 to make it conform to other changes.

Amendment No. 8: This amendment transposes the word "nothing" in the original House bill, section 7, and adopts the Senate amendment therefor by adding that "the labor of a human being is not a commodity or article of commerce."

Amendment No. 9: Strikes out the word "fraternal" in section 7 of House bill.

Amendment No. 10: Strikes out the word "consumers" in House bill, section 7.

Amendment No. 11: Strikes out of section 7 of House bill the words "orders or associations."

Amendment No. 12: Strikes out of section 7 of the House bill the words "orders, or associations."

Amendment No. 13: This amendment adopts the Senate amendment by adding in section 7 of the House bill the word "lawfully," making this part of the sentence read: "from lawfully carrying out the legitimate objects thereof."

Amendment No. 14: This amendment strikes out the words "orders, or associations," agreeably to the Senate amendment to section 7 of the House bill.

Amendment No. 15: The House here recedes and agrees to the Senate amendment to strike out all of the second paragraph of section 7 of the House bill, which part exempts from the antitrust laws associations in traffic and operating officers of common carriers in making agreements, etc., subject to the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Amendment No. 16: This amendment changes the number of this section from section 8 to section 7 to make it conform to other changes.

Amendment No. 17: This amendment strikes out the word "is" in the House bill and inserts in lieu thereof the words "may be."

Amendment No. 18: This amendment strikes out the words "eliminate or," and inserts after the word "acquisition" the words "or to restrain such commerce in any section or community," and after the word "or" the further word "tend."

Amendment No. 19: This amendment strikes out the word "trade" and inserts in lieu thereof the word "commerce."

Amendment No. 20: This amendment strikes out the words "in any section or community."

Amendments Nos. 17, 18, 19, and 20 make this portion of section 8 of House bill read as follows:

where the effect of such acquisition may be to substantially lessen competition between the corporation whose stock is so acquired and the corporation making the acquisition, or to restrain such commerce in any section or community, or tend to create a monopoly of any line of commerce.

Amendment No. 21: This amendment strikes out the word "is" and inserts in lieu thereof the words "may be."

Amendment No. 22: This amendment strikes out the words "eliminate or," and inserts after the word "acquired" the words "or to restrain such commerce in any section or community," and after the word "or" the word "tend."

Amendment No. 23: This amendment strikes out the word "trade" and inserts in lieu thereof the word "commerce."

Amendment No. 24: This amendment strikes out the words "in any section or community." These last words stricken out were inserted earlier in this section.

Amendments Nos. 21, 22, 23, and 24 make the part of this paragraph of section 8 of the House bill read as follows:

may be to substantially lessen competition between such corporations, or any of them, whose stock or other share capital is so acquired, or to restrain such commerce in any section or community, or tend to create a monopoly of any line of commerce.

Amendment No. 25: This amendment restores the word "substantial," as originally contained in House bill.

Amendment No. 26: This amendment strikes out the words "eliminate or."

Amendment No. 27: This amendment strikes out the following:

Nothing contained in this section shall be held to affect or impair any right heretofore legally acquired: Provided, That nothing in this paragraph shall make stock-holding relations between corporations legal when such relations constitute violations of the antitrust laws.

Amendment No. 28: This amendment strikes out the words "railroad corporation" and inserts in lieu thereof the words "common carriers subject to the laws to regulate commerce."

Amendment No. 29: This amendment strikes out the word "branch" and inserts in lieu thereof the word "branches."

Amendment No. 30: This amendment strikes out the word "line" and inserts in lieu thereof the word "lines."

Amendment No. 31: This amendment strikes out the word "railroads."

Amendment No. 32: This amendment strikes out the word "line" and inserts in lieu thereof the word "lines."

Amendment No. 33: This amendment strikes out the words "railroad corporation" and inserts in lieu thereof the words "such common carrier."

Amendment No. 34: This amendment strikes out the word "railroad."

Amendment No. 35: This amendment restores the word "substantial."

Amendment No. 36: This amendment strikes out the words "any railroad company and inserts in lieu thereof the words "such common carrier."

Amendment No. 37: This amendment strikes out the words "railroad company" and inserts in lieu thereof the words "such common carrier."

Amendment No. 38: This amendment restores the word "substantial," which had been stricken out by the Senate.

Amendment No. 39: This amendment adds a new paragraph to section 8 of the House bill, as follows:

Nothing contained in this section shall be held to affect or impair any right heretofore legally acquired: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be held or construed to authorize or make lawful anything heretofore prohibited or made illegal by the antitrust laws, nor to exempt any person from the penal provisions thereof or the civil remedies therein provided.

Amendment No. 40: This amendment strikes out the following paragraph of section 8 of the House bill:

A violation of any of the provisions of this section shall be deemed a misdemeanor and shall be punishable by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both, in the discretion of the court.

Amendment No. 41: The Senate amendment to the House bill struck out all of section 9, and in the conference all of this section was restored with the exception of the first paragraph thereof, which prohibited interlocking directorates between supply companies, etc., and common carriers. The restored part of this section was numbered section 8 and was further amended as follows: By inserting in lieu of "$2,500,000," wherever it appears therein, the figures "$5,000,000." The effect of this amendment is to permit interlocking directors and other officers or employees of banks, banking associations, and trust companies where the aggregate deposits, capital, surplus, and undivided profits do not amount to more than $5,000,000.

And further amended said section by striking out the word "one" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "two," making said section read in part as follows:

No bank, banking association, or trust company, organized or operating under the laws of the United States, in any city or incorporated town or village of more than 200,000 inhabitants, as shown, etc.

Amendment No. 42: This amendment strikes out the words "Sec. 7" and makes section 7 of the House bill a part of section 8, as agreed to.

Amendment No. 43: This amendment strikes out the word "either" and inserts in lieu thereof the words "any one," and adds the words "banks, banking associations, trust companies, and" after the word "than" and before the words "common carriers."

Amendment No. 44: This amendment strikes out the word "an" and inserts in lieu thereof the word "the."

Amendments Nos. 45, 46, and 47: These amendments restore the words "bank or other," in relation to corporations, which had been stricken out by the Senate.

Amendment No. 48: This amendment strikes out all of the following paragraph, originally contained in the House bill:

That any person who shall violate any of the provisions of this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be punished by a fine of not exceeding $100 a day for each day of the continuance of such violation, or by imprisonment for such period as the court may designate, not exceeding one year, or by both, in the discretion of the court.

Amendment No. 49: This amendment inserts a new section, numbered 9, as follows:

SEC. 9. Every president, director, officer, or manager of any firm, association, or corporation engaged in commerce as a common carrier, who embezzles, steals, abstracts, or willfully misapplies, or willfully permits to be misapplied, any of the moneys, funds, credits, securities, property, or assets of such firm, association, or corporation, arising or accruing from, or used in, such commerce, in whole or in part, or willfully or knowingly converts the same to his own use or to the use of another, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction shall be fined not less than $500 or confined in the penitentiary not less than 1 year nor more than 10 years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

Prosecutions hereunder may be in the district court of the United States for the district wherein the offense may have been committed.

That nothing in this section shall be held to take away or impair the jurisdiction of the courts of the several States under the laws thereof; and a judgment of conviction or acquittal on the merits under the laws of any State shall be a bar to any prosecution hereunder for the same act or acts.

Amendment No. 50: This amendment was a new section inserted by the Senate as section 9, which was redrafted in conference and renumbered section 11 to conform to other changes, and vests jurisdiction in the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Federal Reserve Board, and the Federal Trade Commission to enforce the provisions of sections 2, 3, 7, and 8 of this act. This section also contains other provisions for the enforcement of this law.

Amendment No. 51: This amendment was a new section inserted by the Senate as section 11, which was redrafted in conference and relates to a common carrier dealing with a company engaged in selling securities or supplies where they have common directors, and renumbered as section 10.

Amendment No. 52: This amendment renumbers section 10 to be section 12.

Amendment No. 53: This amendment strikes out the following words which had been inserted by the Senate: "or against officers of a corporation by stockholders thereof."

Amendment No. 54: This amendment strikes out the words "has an agent" and inserts in lieu thereof the following: "transacts business; and all process in such cases may be served in the district of which it is an inhabitant, or wherever it may be found."

Amendment No. 55: This amendment changes the number of this section from section 11 to section 13.

Amendment No. 56: This amendment restores the proviso which had been stricken out by the Senate providing against the issuance of writs of subpœna for witnesses living out of the district in which the court is held and more than 100 miles from the place of holding court without the permission of the trial court.

Amendment No. 57: This amendment changes the number of this section from section 12 to section 14.

Amendment No. 58: The first part of section 12 of the House bill, down to and including the word "violation," was stricken out by the Senate, but in conference was restored with the addition of the word "penal" before the word "provisions" in the second line of the section.

This relates to the penal liability of individual directors, officers, or agents of corporations violating antitrust laws.

Amendment No. 59: This amendment strikes out the words "guilty of," which were inserted by the Senate.

Amendment No. 60: This amendment changes the number of this section from section 13 to section 15.

Amendment No. 61: This amendment changes the number of this section from section 14 to section 16.

Amendment No. 62: This amendment adds, after the word "laws," the following: "including sections 2, 3, 7, and 8 of this act."

Amendment No. 63: The Senate struck out the proviso contained in section 14 of the House bill. This was receded from in conference by the Senate.

Amendment No. 64: This amendment changes the number of this section from section 15 to section 17.

Amendment No. 65: This amendment strikes out the following words: "property or a property right of."

Amendment No. 66: This amendment strikes out the word "could" and inserts in lieu thereof the word "can."

Amendment No. 67: This amendment strikes out the word "or" and inserts in lieu thereof the words "and a."

Amendment No. 68: This amendment adds, after the word "fix," the following: "unless within the time so fixed the order is extended for a like period for good cause shown, and the reasons for such extension shall be entered of record."

Amendments Nos. 69 and 70: These amendments strike out the word "his" and insert in lieu thereof the word "the."

Amendment No. 71: This amendment changes the number of this section from section 16 to section 18.

Amendment No. 72: The following language, which was stricken out in the Senate, was restored in conference, with the word "sixteen" inserted in place of the word "fourteen": "except as otherwise provided in section 16 of this act."

Amendment No. 73: This amendment changes the number of this section from section 17 to section 19.

Amendment No. 74: This amendment adds the word "officers," making it read "their officers, agents, servants, employees, and attorneys."

Amendment No. 75: This amendment adds the words "or participating," making it read "or those in active concert or participating with them."

Amendment No. 76: This amendment changes the number of this section from section 18 to section 20.

Amendment No. 77: This amendment restores the words "person or persons" which had been stricken out by the Senate, and adds the words "whether singly or in concert."

Amendment No. 78: This amendment strikes out the following:

or from attending at or near a house or place where any person resides or works, or carries on business or happens to be, for the purpose of peacefully obtaining or communicating information—

And inserts in lieu thereof the following:

or from attending at any place where any such person or persons may lawfully be, for the purpose of peacefully obtaining or communicating information.

Amendment No. 79: This amendment strikes out the word "of" and inserts in lieu thereof the word "from," making it read "or from peacefully persuading," etc.

Amendment No. 80: This amendment restores the original House language which was stricken out in the Senate, as follows: "ceasing to patronize or to employ."

Amendment No. 81: This amendment adds, after the word "peaceful," the words "and lawful."

Amendment No. 82: This amendment strikes out, after the word "assembling," the words "at any place."

Amendment No. 83: This amendment strikes out the word "unlawful" and inserts in lieu thereof the words "to be violations of any law of the United States."

Amendment No. 84: This amendment changes the number of this section from section 19 to section 21.

Amendment No. 85: This amendment strikes out the words "at common law" and inserts in lieu thereof the following: "under the laws of any State in which the act was committed."

Amendment No. 86: This amendment changes the number of this section from section 20 to section 22.

Amendment No. 87: This amendment strikes out the word "person," making the sentence read "where the accused is a body corporate," etc.

Amendment No. 88: This amendment adds the following proviso to section 20 of the House bill:

Provided, That in any case the court or a judge thereof may, for good cause shown, by affidavit or proof taken in open court or before such judge and filed with the papers in the case, dispense with the rule to show cause, and may issue an attachment for the arrest of the person charged with contempt; in which event such person, when arrested, shall be brought before such court or a judge thereof without unnecessary delay and shall be admitted to bail in a reasonable penalty for his appearance to answer to the charge or for trial for the contempt; and thereafter the proceedings shall be the same as provided herein in case the rule had issued in the first instance.

Amendment No. 89: This amendment changes the number of this section from section 21 to section 23.

Amendment No. 90: This amendment changes the number of this section from section 22 to section 24.

Amendment No. 91: This amendment strikes out the word "nineteen" and inserts in lieu thereof the word "twenty-one," in order to make it conform to the renumbered section.

Amendment No. 92: This amendment changes the number of this section from section 23 to section 25.

Amendment No. 93: The Senate added an amendment designated as section 25, directing the court in certain cases to decree the dissolution of the monopoly in restraint of trade and to appoint receivers and cause its assets to be sold. The Senate receded from this amendment in conference.

Amendment No. 94: The Senate added an amendment designated as section 26, as follows:

It shall be unlawful for any corporation engaged in commerce to do any business in any State contrary to the laws of the State under which said corporation was created or contrary to the laws of the State in which it may be doing business. The District of Columbia shall be deemed a State within the meaning of this section.

The Senate receded from this amendment in conference.

Amendment No. 95: This amendment adds the following additional section to the bill:

SEC. 26. If any clause, sentence, paragraph, or part of this act shall, for any reason, be adjudged by any court of competent jurisdiction to be invalid, such judgment shall not affect, impair, or invalidate the remainder thereof, but shall be confined in its operation to the clause, sentence, paragraph, or part thereof directly involved in the controversy in which such judgment shall have been rendered.

E. Y. WEBB,
C. C. CARLIN,
J. C. FLOYD,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order against the conference report in that the conferees exceeded their jurisdiction by changing the text of the bill which was agreed to by both Houses and which was not in disagreement and not before the conference committee. The conferees state on page 4 of the conference report:

Amendment numbered 43: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 43, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 16, page 12, after the word "than," insert the following: "banks, banking associations, trust companies and"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 43 is an amendment to section 7 of the bill as it passed the House. It is found on page 14 of the House print of the bill with the Senate amendments, which, of course, is not the print referred to in the conference report. Section 7 of the bill is a section in reference to interlocking directorates and provides:

That from and after two years from the date of the approval of this act no person at the same time shall be a director in two or more corporations, either of which has capital, surplus, and undivided profits aggregating more than $1,000,000, engaged in whole or in part in commerce, other than common carriers subject to the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, if such corporations are, or shall have been theretofore, by virtue of their business and location of operation, competitors, so that an elimination of competition by agreement between them would constitute a violation of any of the provisions of any of the antitrust laws.

The Senate amendment numbered 43 was a mere grammatical correction. The language referred to two or more corporations, and the House said "either of which had capital." The Senate struck out "either" and inserted "any one," making proper grammar. That was the only matter in dispute in that part of this bill between the two Houses.

The House had passed section 7, prohibiting interlocking directorates of all corporations having a capital of over a million dollars, except those subject to the act to regulate commerce, if it affected competition or if they were competitors, and the Senate agreed to identically the same language, except the mere grammatical correction. What the conferees have done is to eliminate from this section all banking corporations. The language which the conferees have now inserted would make the section read:

Any one of which has capital, surplus, and undivided profits aggregating more than $1,000,000, engaged in whole or in part in commerce, other than banks, banking associations, trust companies, and common carriers subject to the act to regulate commerce.

We have heard a great deal in reference to interlocking directorates of banks to stifle competition. Here was a proposition presented to the Congress where the House, by the language which it agreed to, forbade interlocking directorates of banks where competition was affected, and the Senate agreed to identically the same language, and yet the conferees by their report undertake to eliminate from this prohibition of interlocking directorates not only the railroads subject to the act to regulate commerce but also of banks, banking institutions, and trust companies.

On page 243 of the manual, paragraph 539, this language occurs:

The managers of a conference must confine themselves to the differences committed to them and may not include subjects not within the disagreements, even though germane to a question in issue.

And, again:

Managers may not change the text to which both Houses have agreed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman a question in order to get this matter straight.

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. The report says in line 16——

Mr. MANN. That is, line 16 of the print of the Senate amendment; but it comes in where I have indicated in the House print of the bill with the Senate amendment. It comes in on line 21, page 14, after the word "than." That is the way the conference report was originally prepared and the way it was originally submitted to the Senate, but as the references were not to the engrossed copy, the conferees properly made the change.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman may proceed. The Chair thought that was it.

Mr. MANN. In 1904 the House passed a legislative appropriation bill containing this language:

No part of any money appropriated by this act shall be available for paying expenses of horses and carriages, or drivers therefor, for the personal use of any officer provided for herein other than the President of the United States, the heads of executive departments, and the Secretary to the President.

I am reading from volume 5 of Hinds' Precedents, paragraph 6417.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wishes the gentleman would repeat that reference.

Mr. MANN. Volume 5 of Hinds' Precedents, paragraph 6417.

The language in that bill as passed by the House related only to money appropriated by that act, and forbidding the use of money appropriated by that act, being made available for paying the expenses of horses or carriages or drivers therefor for the personal use of any officer except those excepted. The Senate amended the provision by making it read:

By this or any other act.

And further provided in the same paragraph—

For the personal use of any officer provided for by this or any other act.

And the question at issue between the two bodies was whether the forbidding of the use of the money appropriated should be confined to the money appropriated by that act or any other act. And it only related to the personal use. The conferees made a report in which they inserted in the text of the bill, after the word "personal," the words "or official," so that the prohibition would extend to the use of money by all officers of the Government except those excepted, for the personal or official use of any officer of the Government.

I remember the occasion quite well. There was a very bitter fight both in the Senate and in the House, and a great deal of feeling on the subject of carriages being owned by the Government and used by the officials. And the act was passed by the House to only contain, except subject to a point of order, the limitation of money appropriated by that act.

The Senate made it "any other act," and that was the point. But it only applied to personal use, and the conferees inserted "official" in the text, so that it would read for the "personal or official" use of any officer. The point of order was made on the conference report by myself, as I see here. Mr. Cannon was the Speaker. He had been chairman of the Committee on Appropriations for a great many years, and had an exaggerated idea of reports made by the Committee on Appropriations. I made an argument before Mr. Speaker Cannon, who had said before the argument was made, "There is no use of discussing that. I will overrule the point of order." But I asked to be heard and was heard.

After hearing, the Chair took it under advisement and had the conference report laid over a day, and he secured the valuable asistance of one of the ablest parliamentarians who has ever lived, in my judgment, Mr. HINDS, and the Speaker came into the House next day and sustained the point of order, and made quite an elaborate ruling on the subject, going over the precedents, and deciding that the conferees, having before them certain amendments which were in disagreement, could not go outside of those amendments and start in to rewrite the text which had been agreed to by both bodies.

Among other things the Chair said:

This provision in the conference report inserts legislation that never was before the House or before the Senate, and it was quite competent for the conferees, if they could do this, to have stricken out the whole paragraph and inserted anything that was germane.

In other words, if the conferees were empowered to change the text at all, they were empowered to rewrite the bill. That is a function not conferred upon conferees.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman tell me the page from which he is reading and the volume?

Mr. MANN. I am reading from page 674, volume 5, of Hinds' Precedents, paragraph 6417.

Now, in paragraph 6420, page 729, in 1907, Mr. James W. Wadsworth, father of the next Senator from New York State [applause on the Republican side], presented a conference report on the agricultural appropriation bill, whereupon the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] made a point of order. This was the point of order:

I wish to make the point of order against the conference report on the ground that the conferees have inserted on page 40 language in an item which was not in dispute between the two Houses. On page 40, line 24, the conferees have changed the text in the language agreed to by both Houses by inserting after the word "forest" the words "in the District of Columbia or elsewhere."

There was a matter where the text had been agreed to by both Houses and the conferees had inserted language in the text to carry out what they may be presumed to have thought was the intent of the two Houses, but intent not expressed in the bill. The Speaker held, sustaining the point of order made by Mr. FITZGERALD:

The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] makes the point of order that the conferees have exceeded their authority by changing the text to which both Houses have agreed by inserting after the word "forest" the words "in the District of Columbia or elsewhere." And the report states that such is the case. * * * The Chair sustains the point of order.

In the conference report on the railroad bill in 1906—the Hepburn law—there was included in the conference report certain language changing the text of the bill. No point of order was made in the House upon that. It was stated by the conferees that they had done this, and it was subject to a point if anybody desired to make the point of order. In the Senate the same statement was made. Senator TILLMAN was one of the managers of the Senate presenting the report. I refer to Hinds' Precedents, paragraph 6431. He said:

If Senators will kindly follow me, each Senator can learn what we have done and what we had no rightful power to do. On top of page 12 of the last print, June 2, the words "transportation or facilities" were inserted after the word "traffic" at the end of the preceding line. It is not necessary to state the reason why those words were put in, but it seemed to us that it was necessary to clarify the matter with respect to contracts, agreements, or arrangements which are to be filed with the commission. If the point of order is made against those words in the Senate, or whether or not it is, I think the conferees will take them out. I for one will vote to take them out. We had no right to put them in—

And so forth.

That led to a protracted debate in the Senate, and it was the unanimous opinion, so far as I have gone over it, that the conferees had exceeded their power. But the point of order was dropped. The conferees had stated to both Houses that they had inserted language which would make the conference report subject to a point of order if anybody desired to make it.

The SPEAKER. What became of that point of order in the Senate?

Mr. MANN. It was dropped. No point of order was made.

The SPEAKER. What was it dropped for?

Mr. MANN. The point of order was not pressed. Nobody was objecting to the change that was made, and the conferees had been very frank about it. I remember I was one of the conferees in that case. We were very frank to the House, and stated to the House that it was subject to a point of order.

In 1880, where a question arose as to what the House might do, Speaker Randall held——

The SPEAKER. Where is the gentleman reading from?

Mr. MANN. From paragraph 6436, page 747. I read:

On June 9, 1880, Mr. Speaker Randall held that the House might not consider a proposed concurrent resolution authorizing conferees on the legislative appropriation bill to take into consideration a subject included in the text to which both Houses had agreed. The Speaker said that under the parliamentary law neither House might change the text to which both Houses had agreed, and, in his opinion, conferees might not be endowed with power greater than either of the Houses possessed.

I shall not detain the Speaker with more of the numerous decisions which have been made upon the subject, except to remind the Speaker of the oleomargarine bill, where the House passed a bill and the Senate added a number of amendments to it. Those amendments of the Senate were considered in the House, and it was proposed, upon the consideration of those amendments, to change the text of the bill as it passed the House, where it had not been amended by the Senate. The point of order was sustained that it was not in the power of the House, after it had passed a bill and sent it to the Senate and the Senate had amended it and it had come back to the House, then to change the text which both Houses had agreed to.

Take this case: Supposing this bill, instead of going to conference, had come before the House for the consideration by the House of the Senate amendments. When we reach section 7 we could dispose of amendment numbered 42, which affected the numbering of the section, and the next question would be upon agreeing or disagreeing to the amendment numbered 43, which inserted the words "any one" in place of the word "either," and the next amendment which would be up for consideration would be amendment numbered 44, which proposes to insert the word "the" in place of the word "an." But it would not have been in order to have offered then an amendment to the text of the bill which had been agreed to by the House and agreed to by the Senate. When the House passes the bill and a motion to reconsider is disposed of and the bill has gone from the House it is not within the power of the House then to change the text of the bill; not as a matter of right, but of course it may be done by unanimous consent. So that the conferees in this case have gone beyond their jurisdiction, having proposed amendments to the text in a very vital feature of the bill which was not in dispute between the two Houses. They exceeded their jurisdiction and can not make such a conference report.

I know of nothing more vital which was before the House than the power and the right to prevent interlocking directorates of banks. Here was one of the issues that has been more discussed than any other by the great committee of the House which sat for weeks and months—the so-called Untermeyer committee, or the Pujo committee. That was one of the basic things that the committee made findings on, and when this bill was prepared it provided a prohibition against interlocking directorates of banks. The House passed it in that shape. The Senate passed it in that shape. But the House conferees, without authority and over and beyond any jurisdiction granted to them, have provided that banks shall no longer be controlled by this prohibition of interlocking directorates where banks are in competition.

So I say that the conference report should be rejected as subject to a point of order.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and ninety-one Members are present—not a quorum.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this call 294 Members, a quorum, have answered to their names.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors. The Chair, with the consent of the House, wishes to admonish the Members that the experiences of this week show that Members ought to stay here in their places. [Applause.] These eternal roll calls simply delay the time when we are going to get away from here. [Applause.]

Had the gentleman from Illinois concluded?

Mr. MANN. I had concluded my argument.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I do not profess to be an expert parliamentarian, but I think I have ordinary common sense, which may be applied to this situation. I feel that the point of order which my friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has made against this conference report is purely and entirely technical, just as much so as if he had made the point that we had put a comma at a certain place in a section whereas we ought to have left out the comma, and when we put it in simply for the purpose of making clear the meaning of that particular section. In order that the Speaker may understand the whole situation, section 9 of the House bill provided against three supposed evils. One was to prevent interlocking directorates between common carriers and supply houses. Another was interlocking directorates of banks, and the third was interlocking directorates of industrial corporations. As to banks the House passed a provision forbidding interlocking directorates of banks that had more than $2,500,000 deposits, capital stock, surplus, and undivided profits. The Senate struck out entirely the paragraph in our section 9 with reference to railroads interlocking in their directorates with supply houses. The Senate struck out entirely our paragraph of section 9 with reference to banks. Then it made a new section entirely, called section 7 as it passed the Senate, and inserted the language which we had in paragraph 3 of section 9, forbidding the interlocking directorates of industrials, making the limit $1,000,000.

Now, Mr. Speaker, my friend from Illinois will admit without question that the third paragraph of section 9 as the bill passed the House was never intended to apply to banks, because we had an express paragraph in section 9 which took care of interlocking directorates in banks.

Now, when the Senate struck out paragraphs 1 and 2, with reference to supply houses, common carriers, and banks, and retained for the most part the reference to interlocking directorates of industrial institutions, but later on struck out all reference to banks, and when we came to rewrite this entire section we restored a paragraph as a substitute with reference to interlocking directorates of supply houses and railroads. We restored in almost identical language the reference to banks, only increasing the limit from $2,500,000, as it passed the House, to $5,000,000, but in the very next paragraph we provide with reference to industrials that $1,000,000 shall be the limitation, and that it shall not apply to "banks, banking houses," or common carriers. Now, the point I made is that this is not material, substantial legislation. The conference did put in "banks and banking associations," in order to make perfectly clear what in my opinion is already clear; because in the preceding paragraph we had passed a section with reference to interlocking directorates of banks, and there we made the limitation $5,000,000. Now, it would be idiotic to say that we included also banks and banking associations in the paragraph referring to industrial corporations; and in order to make the paragraph perfectly plain, we inserted "other than banks and banks associations" and common carriers, which had no effect upon the meaning of that section. I contend, Mr. Speaker, that common sense ought to govern the action of this House and the ruling of the Speaker, and I know it will; and if you will read the section preceding the one that my friend excepts to, in which we take care of banks and make the limitation $5,000,000, the Speaker can never conclude, even though the words which my friend excepts to are stricken out, that the interlocking directorates provision with reference to industrials was also intended to cover banks, because we have already taken care of banks in a former section or a former paragraph, and we simply put into this section which my friend objects to that which is necessarily implied and expressed in the bill itself. I imagine this House and the Speaker will not while away the time over technicalities which are not new legislation, which are not substantial legislation, and which in no way change the effect or meaning of either one of these sections.

Mr. Speaker, that is all I care to say on the subject.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, there is not much, if anything, that need be added to the statement of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB]. It needs only a detailed examination of what the House undertook to do in section 9, and what the Senate undertook to do in striking out section 9 and enacting section 7 (Senate print), to come to the conclusion that the conferees had jurisdiction of the matter which they have put into the conference report and which is complained of by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Section 9 starts out by dealing with directors of railroad companies.

The SPEAKER. That is the original bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. The House bill. The first paragraph of section 9 deals with interlocking directorates of railroad companies and supply companies dealing with such railroads. The second paragraph deals with banks, trust companies, and banking associations, and then the latter part of section 9 deals with industrial corporations. Now, the provision as to interlocking directorates of banks was confined to banks having a capital and surplus of $2,500,000. The provision in regard to industrial corporations was confined to corporations having $1,000,000 of capital and surplus. When the Senate came to consider this it concluded to eliminate from the provisions of the act all reference to banking corporations, and it accordingly struck out that part of section 9 which had related to banking corporations. It carried in as a part of section 7 of the Senate bill a provision as to industrial corporations. Now, the last part of section 9 related not only to banking corporations, but to banking, industrial, and common-carrier corporations. In other words, the last part of the section contained general provisions relating to all three of the classes.

The Senate concluded to eliminate one of these classes, which was that of the banks, and carried the language relating to industrials into section 7. In order to emphasize that that was its purpose, when it came to deal with the general provisions of section 9 of the House bill, which it carried into section 7 of the Senate bill, it found it necessary to make another amendment. And so you find the words "bank or other" stricken out where they occur, so that the part of section 7 which was taken from the latter part of section 9 of the House bill reads:

> When any person elected or chosen as a director or officer or selected as an employee of any corporation subject to the provisions of this act,

They had eliminated banks as being subject to the provisions of this act, and therefore it was necessary to strike out, which they did, the words "bank or other." Now, what confronted the conferees? The House had provided that the provisions touching interlocking directorates should apply to three classes—common carriers, banks, and industrial corporations. The Senate had seen fit to eliminate the banks. That left in issue the material point of whether banking corporations should be brought within the provisions of the law prohibiting interlocking directorates. The House insisted on its provision, and was successful in its insistence, with one or two minor changes. The House had limited the provision as to banks by making it apply to banks with a capital stock of two and a half million dollars.

The conferees agreed that it should apply to banks with a capital and surplus of $5,000,000. In other words, the House conceded something by making the group smaller and requiring the banks to have a larger capital and surplus, and the Senate conceded something by including banks in it at all. That was a perfectly proper subject for consideration and determination, but evidently in reading the language of the act as it had been originally passed by the House and as it had been incorporated in part by the Senate in section 7, the question was raised as to whether it was not possible that section 7 might be held to apply to banks.

Now, it is perfectly clear to my mind that no court would have so held, because having expressly dealt with banks with a capital stock of two and a half million dollars, when you come to deal with industrial corporations of $1,000,000 any court would hold that the inclusion by name of banks and trust companies in one instance excluded them from the general provisions in the other, and, in addition, banks and trust companies are not such corporations as "are or shall have been theretofore, by virtue of their business and location of operation, competitors" with industrial corporations. The conferees having redrafted the matter, having gotten away from the language of section 9 of the House and section 7 of the Senate in many particulars, concluded that it would leave no matter of argument touching the language of section 7, and therefore the conferees inserted in the exclusion proviso what would have been held as excluded in the bill agreed to in conference even if not put there, to wit, "banks, banking associations, and trust companies," thus making it plain by the very expression itself that they, along with common carriers, were not within the group outlined as industrial corporations.

The rule touching conference reports is perfectly clear, and we are not at issue with the gentleman from Illinois as to that. Manifestly, matter not in issue between the two Houses can not be dealt with in conference, for the very proper rule that it should not be within the power of a few men representing the two Houses to express an opinion upon a matter which has not been considered previously by either House.

But here is a case where the House had considered the question of banks and what banks should be included in the provision touching interlocking directorates. The Senate had considered the matter to the extent of disagreeing entirely with the House and striking out the House provision. There was a direct issue. To say that it was not within the province of the conference to make it clear that only certain banks should be within the provision touching certain interlocking directorates, and that the provision touching industrial corporations was confined to such industrial corporations and should not by any stretch of construction be held to include banks, is to say what seems to be contrary, as the gentleman from North Carolina says, to the plain common sense of the situation.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], or the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] quite appreciate what the House did in the bill which it passed, and yet they should know more about it than I do. There were several provisions in section 9 as it passed the House. I have referred to section 7, according to the conference report, which was one of those provisions, one of the last provisions in section 7.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman now is speaking of the original bill.

Mr. MANN. The original bill. It is printed as section 7 in the House print, and that is the one I commented on. That provision applies to all corporations except common carriers subject to the act to regulate interstate commerce and forbidding any person to be a director in two corporations either one of which has a capital of over a million dollars. That applies to a director in a bank and a director in a manufacturing institution. That prohibits a director of a bank with a capital of a million dollars in New York City being also a director in the Sugar Trust company or in any other company. That provision would have prevented Mr. Gary, an officer of the United States Steel Corporation, from being a director in a bank. He has recognized that far enough, supposing it would become a law, according to newspaper reports, by resigning from these other directorates. That provision was not limited as to any corporation with a capital of over a million dollars except as to common carriers, and the common-carrier provision is otherwise provided for by law. It extended to banks, to industrial corporations, to all kinds of corporations. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] both said it applied only to industrial corporations. I do not know where they get a warrant for that. It is not in the bill. The language of the bill is:

That from and after two years from the date of the approval of this act no person at the same time shall be a director in any two or more corporations either of which has capital, surplus, and undivided profits aggregating more than $1,000,000.

With the further provision that it only applies where the corporations are in some sense competitive, in whole or in part. That covers the whole case, but applies only in case of competition. If the two corporations are in no sense competitive, in whole or in part, or engaged in commerce in whole or in part, that does not apply.

Let us see what the banking provision in the same section was. The banking provision was a prohibition that no two banks either one of which had a capital of two and a half million dollars should have the same director, if they were in a city of over 100,000 people. It made no difference whether they were competitive or not; it was not a matter of competition. That provision prohibited a bank in Chicago or in New York City from having as a director a man who was a director of a little outlying bank in the same city. Competition had nothing to do with it. The language of the bill made a specific provision, and it applied only to directors of banks. It only prohibited the director of one bank from being a director of another bank in a city of 100,000 inhabitants. There was no place in the bill except section 7 where there was a prohibition against a director of an industrial corporation being also the director of a bank. It certainly will not be contended by anyone on the floor of this House that after the Money Trust investigation, which cost such a large sum of money and which excited so much attention, an antitrust bill was passed through this House without any prohibition against a bank director also controlling an industrial corporation to which his bank was loaning money or that an industrial corporation with deposits in a bank could have as a director in that bank one of its own directors, who should control the supply of money which was being deposited. The whole theory of the antitrust legislation was to separate the control of money in the banks from the control of industrial corporations, so that all industrial corporations applying to banks should apply on even terms without being controlled by interlocking directorates. That provision was carried in the language of the bill passed by the House and agreed to by the Senate. And now the language which the gentleman says covers the subject only applied to directors as between two banks; it only applied to directors as between two banks when one of them had a capital of two and a half million dollars, and it only applied to banks in cities of over 100,000 inhabitants.

The matter that was in dispute between the two Houses was a Senate amendment which struck out that provision applying to banks in cities of 100,000 inhabitants where one of them had a capital of two and a half million dollars. The matter that was not in dispute between the two Houses was a prohibition, universal throughout the United States, that no bank or other corporation with a capital of a million dollars should have a director in any other corporation, whether it was a bank or an industrial corporation, with which it was in competition.

The gentleman practically admits that the conferees have no right to make the change in the text of the bill. They have the Senate amendment striking out the language of the House in reference to banks in cities of 100,000 inhabitants. That is before the conferees, and they can change it in any germane way. If they choose to insert in that a provision, and it should be germane, which wipes out another section of the bill, that would be within their province; but they have no right to change the text of the bill, and in this case the change of the text is not technical. It goes to the whole merits of this legislation. If there be anything needed in the legislation, it is to control the conditions between the people who supply the money and the people who use the money, so that all may be upon even terms; and if ever the teeth were drawn out of any provision of law, this unwarranted insertion in the text of the bill draws the teeth not only out of this bill but out of all propositions to control the supply of money.

Mr. DIFENDERFER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. DIFENDERFER. I would like to ask for information what the effect would be in a case of this kind—where a railroad in the State of Pennsylvania is a stockholder, or the directors of the railroad are stockholders, in a trust company, the same directors being directors in a banking institution. What would be the effect under such a provision such as we are now considering? Take another case, where a large banking institution has directors who are also directors of a large hat-manufacturing institution. What would be the effect in that case?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if the language as perfected by the House and the Senate goes into the law without the change made by the conferees, there would be a provision against men acting as directors of a bank and a hat company if there were any sort of competition. Of course this bill does not apply to railroad companies engaged in commerce.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Illinois one question. Either in the House bill or the Senate amendment is the question of banks, banking associations, and trust companies mentioned?

Mr. MANN. Oh, certainly they are mentioned.

The SPEAKER. Were they cut out because of anything that was done?

Mr. MANN. I did not hear the Chair.

The SPEAKER. Were banks, banking associations, and trust companies cut out entirely from consideration because of anything that was done?

Mr. MANN. No; they were not cut out from consideration. The Senate adopted an amendment. The House bill carried a provision specifically referring to banks, banking associations, and trust companies in cities of over 100,000 inhabitants, and said that in that case no person should act as director of them if one of them had a capital of two and a half million dollars. The Senate struck that out. That amendment, of course, was in conference, and I think the language is subject to any germane amendment by the conferees.

The SPEAKER The Chair is ready to rule. In passing on this point of order, of course, the Chair has nothing to do whatever with the wisdom or advisability of this legislation in whole or in part. The only question is, Did the conferees exceed their authority by this language which they put in it as amendment by the conferees to Senate amendment numbered 43? The words added by the conferees are these: "banks, banking associations, trust companies, and." It is well established, and everybody who has paid any attention to it knows it, that the conferees can not go out and drag in new subjects of legislation. Now, if any gentleman is curious to read the decisions on the subject, if he will read two decisions that the present occupant of the chair himself rendered, in which the Chair collated substantially all decisions on the subject, he will have the whole thing within a small compass. These decisions which the Chair rendered are printed in the back of the rule book. The case at bar is this: Originally the House passed a bill with this paragraph in it. This is one of the paragraphs of section 9:

> That from and after two years from the date of approval of this act no person shall at the same time be a director or other officer or employee of more than one bank, banking association, or trust company organized or operating under the laws of the United States either of which has deposits, capital, surplus, and undivided profits aggregating more than $2,500,000.

The Senate struck it all out. The House never agreed to the Senate amendment striking out the House language. Therefore, in the judgment of the Chair, without elaborating this opinion and simply referring to the others, that subject was lawfully before the conferees. If any gentleman does not like the conference report, he has his remedy—to vote against it. The Chair thinks the conferees did not exceed their authority, and the point of order is overruled.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] has two and a half hours and the gentleman from Minesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] has two and a half hours.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, there has been a great deal of misinformation and misrepresentation about the meaning and effect of the antitrust bill, both as it passed the House and as it passed the Senate and as it came from conference. Some of this misinformation is pitiful ignorance; other of it is downright, deliberate misrepresentation. I noticed in a morning paper in Washington a few mornings ago a long write-up of the trust bill, and in it was this language:

> When the bill came from the Senate it was bristling with teeth.

Another out in Missouri stated that when the bill left the House it was harmless and innocuous and that it had been made strong in the Senate. Now, for just a little while, I want to tell the House in plain, straightforward, undisguised language what has taken place in both the House, Senate, and conference. I also desire to say I have no objection to being interrupted by any gentleman on the floor who wants to ask a question about any section or any amendment. Of course, I shall have to be brief, because we have only two and a half hours, and I am going to make my explanation as rapidly as it is possible for me to be understood clearly. Some one has stated that the House agreed to a great many of the Senate amendments and the Senate receded from very few, and that we receded from a great many more than they did. Now, there were 95 amendments made by the Senate. I think Members ought to realize what it meant to adjust 95 amendments between this House and the other; but, fortunately, most of these amendments—at least a majority of them—were immaterial, and a large number of them were simply a renumbering of sections, and there were a great many verbal amendments, such as changing "and" for "the," and so forth. I shall only mention the material amendments, unless some gentlemen desire to ask me about others. I hope Members of the House appreciate the difficulty under which the conferees began their deliberations. We had a large number of amendments in reference to an important measure. We wanted to do the right thing and the best thing for the people and for this country.

Now, the first amendment we readily agreed to was to except from the operation of this bill the Philippine Islands. We did that because the Sherman antitrust law does not apply to the Philippines. They have a law of their own over there. I suppose there is no objection on the part of the House or any Member of it to that first amendment. Immediately thereafter, Mr. Speaker, we struck trouble. When the bill passed the House it contained sections 2, 3, and 4—section 2 forbidding discrimination in price; section 3 forbidding arbitrary refusal to sell mine products, and so forth; section 4 forbidding tying contracts. That is the way it passed the House. Each one of these sections as it passed the House had a criminal penalty attached to it. When the bill went to the Senate it was referred to the Judiciary Committee, and the Senate Judiciary Committee struck out the criminal penalties in sections 2 and 4 of our bill, and struck out entirely section 3. When the bill was carried to the Senate floor the Senate not only approved striking out the criminal penalties in sections 2 and 4—that is, with reference to discrimination in price and tying contracts—but they also struck out the sections themselves and left these subjects to the trade commission. The House should consider this particular bill that we have under consideration now in connection with the Trade Commission bill and the Sherman antitrust law, because we are trying to wedge in this bill and give it a place somewhere between those two measures. As you know, the Trade Commission bill was passed after this bill passed the House and before the trust bill passed the Senate.

Now, when we assembled in conference we found our tying-clause section, section 4, and we found our discriminating-in-price section, section 2, absolutely eliminated from our bill, and this was done not by the conferees, but by the Senate itself on a roll-call vote. Sections 2 and 4 were stricken out in that way.

Now, there were those who insisted that we ought to have criminal penalties attached to these two sections, 2 and 4. Others, however, took the position that the sections ought to go out entirely, because we had in the meantime passed the Trade Commission bill with section 5 in it which denounced as unlawful unfair methods of competition, and that the Trade Commission could and would take up all the acts denounced in sections 2 and 4, and prevent their further commission. So, between those two ideas the battle raged for nearly three weeks. We finally agreed to the Senate amendments striking out the criminal penalties, but to retain sections 2 and 4 as they went from the House, with an amendment which denounced as unlawful the tying contract and the discrimination in price. But as originally drawn they were criminal sections, and section 2 made it a crime to discriminate in price for the purpose of destroying or injuring a competitor. We thought that was probably too restricted. We agreed, instead of retaining the language "with purpose or intent thereby to destroy or wrongfully injure the business of a competitor," and so forth, to insert this language: "Where the effect of such discrimination may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce." We felt that that would tend to give the section more elasticity and breadth. That is the reason we accepted this amendment, and forbade discriminating in price when the effect of such discrimination might be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly.

We did the same thing with reference to section 4, which forbade the tying contract. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that on the Senate floor Senator WALSH, after section 4 had been stricken out, with reference to tying contracts, offered an amendment which the Senate passed as a substitute for our section 4, prohibiting tying contracts in connection with patented articles, requiring the person with whom the contract is made to use exclusively other unpatented articles. It was evident that that amendment was aimed at the United Shoe Machinery Co. Senator REED offered an amendment making the violation of Senator WALSH'S section a criminal offense. Now, when we came to conference, the Senate having stricken out the criminal penalties of sections 2 and 4, and interlocking directorates of banks, and so forth, we finally agreed to strike out the criminal penalty to Senator WALSH'S amendment, which he agreed ought to be done, and reinstated our section 4, with the additional words "whether patented or unpatented," so that section 4, as we always understood why it passed the House, now covers patented as well as unpatented articles.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman consider that section 3 as agreed upon by the conferees is as strong in its limitations and prohibitions as the Walsh amendment as embodied in section 2 of the Senate bill?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir; in civil remedies.

Mr. STAFFORD. That it will prevent, for instance, the United Shoe Machinery Co. from entering into such binding contracts as now exist with the users of their machinery, that they will be forbidden to use machinery of other competitors, and keep companies, for instance the Dick Co., from forbidding the use of their mimeograph machines with stationery and supplies not furnished by that company.

Mr. WEBB. I will say to my friend that, in my opinion, immediately after the President signs this bill with section 3 in it every such contract made by the United Shoe Machinery Co. will become unlawful, because they may not only lessen substantial competition, but they do it. They not only tend to create monopoly, but they do it.

Mr. STAFFORD. And it is also the gentleman's opinion that it will correct the conditions referred to by Chief Justice White in the Dick case?

Mr. WEBB. I think so. It was intended to do it, and I believe it will.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course there is no question but that the language of the Walsh amendment would do it. The language of that amendment is clear and positive and would cover such cases. The language of the amendment agreed to by the conferees I do not believe is as clear and forceful as the Walsh amendment.

Mr. WEBB. We can be certain of nothing until the Supreme Court passes upon it, but I will say that Senator WALSH, who introduced the amendment, is satisfied that the section as the conference presents it will cover the case it is intended to cover, and I hope it will. I am in favor of repealing the opinion in the case of Dick against Henry. Those are the sections around which such a war has been waged in the last few weeks in the other branch of the Congress.

Now, let us see if these sections are "toothless." It is contended that we have extracted the teeth because we have left out the criminal penalties. But I will tell you, my friends——

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield for just one question?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARDY. If I caught your expressions correctly—and I will ask if I have—one essential change, as I understand it, is that you let the unlawfulness of these contracts hinge not on the purpose of them but on the effect of them?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir; and tendency.

Mr. HARDY. Effect and tendency?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Does not that make the law stronger than if it depended upon the purpose being shown?

Mr. WEBB. Yes. I believe it will be easier to prove a violation in a civil suit.

Mr. HARDY. That is what I thought.

Mr. WEBB. Now, gentlemen, as to the "teeth" that they say have been extracted from this bill. I tell you that there are more "teeth" in these two sections than anyone may imagine, and I am going to show you the "teeth." All through this bill we have provided civil remedies to stop the practices denounced in sections 2 and 3 of the conference report, and I for one was very, very insistent on keeping these two sections in the bill in order that these extraordinary remedies given to the individual might apply.

Now, here is the first "tooth" I will refer you to, and that is in section 4:

That any person who shall be injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws may sue therefor in any district court of the United States in the district in which the defendant resides or is found or has an agent, without respect to the amount in controversy, and shall recover threefold the damages by him sustained, and the cost of suit, including a reasonable attorney's fee.

Now, let a business man somewhere in the United States, or 40 or 50 of them, be damaged by the things that are denounced as unlawful in this section, and let them all bring suit. That is bigger, as my friend from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] says, than a "harrow tooth," and will have a more deterrent effect on the men who practice those things than a mere criminal penalty, and we all know that the disinclination of juries in some quarters to convict men under these criminal sections has resulted in their acquittal. For instance, take the case of the Beef Trust. The average man thought the Beef Trust was a criminal, but the jury in Chicago would not convict them. Now, the next thing is to give the individual who is harmed by these practices—not necessarily restraints of trade or monopolies, but things that lead up to restraints of trade and monopolies—the right to bring suit for any amount he pleases.

But it goes still further—

Mr. BARTLETT. That is the identical provision that the House adopted?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; that is the identical provision that the House adopted, and we kept it in the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Take the case of the shoe manufacturers of the country, where they suffer by reason of the monopoly of the United Shoe Machinery Co. Suppose a shoe manufacturer should go into court and bring suit against the United Shoe Machinery Co. Where would their damages be? They would not be able to prove any damages, because it was based on supposition.

Mr. WEBB. If a man has been damaged and it is not speculative, he can prove it in court.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is speculative entirely, and this will not give him any relief, because you are not punishing the concerns criminally for the offense.

Mr. WEBB. If the gentleman will go with me one step further, I will show him how he can stop it as an individual, and not depend upon the Government of the United States to do so. That is something new. Section 6 of the House bill, which is section 5 of the conference report, provides, among other things, that—

Whenever any suit or proceeding in equity or criminal prosecution is instituted by the United States to prevent, restrain, or punish violations of any of the antitrust laws the running of the statute of limitations in respect of each and every private right of action arising under said laws and based in whole or in part on any matter complained of in said suit or proceeding shall be suspended during the pendency thereof.

Now, I call the attention of my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] and the attention of the House to section 11, which is another "tooth," as reported by the conferees. It reads as follows:

That authority to enforce compliance with sections 2, 3, 7, and 8 of this act by the persons respectively subject thereto is hereby vested in the Interstate Commerce Commission where applicable to common carriers, in the Federal Reserve Board where applicable to banks, banking associations, and trust companies, and in the Federal Trade Commission where applicable to all other character of commerce, to be exercised as follows.

Now, the value of these two sections is this: That they not only give the individual the right to sue for treble damages where he pleases, and we not only suspend the statute of limitations against an individual if a Government suit is brought against a trust, but we also require the Federal Trade Commission to stop these practices and take those guilty of such practices into court.

But that is not all. Some argue that after the Trade Commission takes jurisdiction that excludes individuals from pursuing these other remedies. The bill further provides:

No order of the commission or board or the judgment of the court to enforce the same shall in any wise relieve or absolve any person from any liability under the antitrust acts.

So you have three or four distinct remedies, all of which may be invoked at the same time.

Now, section 12 provides—

That any suit, action, or proceeding under the antitrust laws against a corporation may be brought not only in the judicial district whereof it is an inhabitant, but also in any district wherein it may be found or transacts business; and all process in such cases may be served in the district of which it is an inhabitant or wherever it may be found.

I will say to my friend from Wisconsin that we are liberalizing the procedure in the courts in order to give the individual who is damaged the right to get his damages anywhere—anywhere you can catch the offender, as is suggested by a friend sitting near by. And that is not all. Section 15 provides—

That the several district courts of the United States are hereby invested with jurisdiction to prevent and restrain violations of this act, and it shall be the duty of the several district attorneys of the United States, in their respective districts, under the direction of the Attorney General, to institute proceedings in equity to prevent and restrain such violations. Such proceedings may be by way of petition setting forth the case and praying that such violation shall be enjoined or otherwise prohibited.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir.

Mr. BATHRICK. How does the gentleman construe those words "under the direction of the Attorney General"? Does that mean that a district attorney can not act unless he receives direction from the Attorney General?

Mr. WEBB. Yes. That is the universal rule. The Attorney General, being the head of the Department of Justice of the United States, should be consulted before the bringing of one of these suits.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is the same language as in the Sherman law.

Mr. WEBB. Yes. That is the language in the Sherman law. It extends to the acts denounced in this particular bill, also. But if any district attorney in the United States feels that these sections are being violated, all he has to do is to ask the Attorney General for permission to institute suit, and begin proceedings immediately.

Mr. BATHRICK. If we have some Attorneys General such as we have had in the past, the directions will not be given.

Mr. WEBB. Yes; of course. But we must leave something to the Executive. We can not do everything by legislation. We must leave something to the Department of Justice and the courts. But that is not the only remedy, I will say to my friend. I have narrated three or four. If the Attorney General should be negligent, the individual himself has a wide-open door to go into court and sue. And he can not only do that, but listen to the language of section 16:

SEC. 16. That any person, firm, corporation, or association shall be entitled to sue for and have injunctive relief, in any court of the United States having jurisdiction over the parties, against threatened loss or damage by a violation of the antitrust laws, including sections 2, 3—

These two sections which we are discussing now—

7 and 8 of this act, when and under the same conditions and principles as injunctive relief against threatened conduct that will cause loss or damage is granted by courts of equity, under the rules governing such proceedings, and upon the execution of proper bond against damages for an injunction improvidently granted and a showing that the danger of irreparable loss or damage is immediate, a preliminary injunction may issue.

There are five different distinct civil remedies that are given to individuals, to the Department of Justice, and to the Trade Commission for the purpose of preventing and restraining the acts denounced in sections 2 and 4, which are sections 2 and 3 of the bill under consideration as it came from the conference.

Mr. BATHRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. BATHRICK. Perhaps this elaboration of the gentleman's statement will be correct with respect to the power to pray for an injunction: It means that whereas an injunction can not be issued against a labor organization unless proof is conclusive that irreparable direct damage is imminent, the individual engaged in commerce who is threatened by a trust or combination can also sue for an injunction on the same terms that injunctions are issued or asked for against labor organizations.

Mr. WEBB. There are two different provisions, but the last statement of the gentleman is correct—that anybody who is threatened by any loss or damage by reason of any act denounced in this bill or in the Sherman antitrust law can go into court as an individual and restrain those acts. Heretofore that has been left to the Government of the United States. Heretofore the individual had no power to seek injunctive relief. He was relegated to a mere suit for damages, but now he can go into courts of equity and restrain those acts which seem imminent in threatening him with loss or damage.

Mr. LEVY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. LEVY. Does the bill provide any means by which the business interests of the country can be protected? Suppose a lot of blackmailers bring suit for damages against business men all over the United States. Is there any protection provided for the business interests of the country?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; there is protection for the business man. Somebody may go down and undertake to squat on your magnificent estate in Virginia, but you can put him off. You can not prevent him from squatting, but you can bring a suit and put him off.

Mr. LEVY. But is there nothing to prevent business men from being blackmailed? This bill is all in favor of the complainant.

Mr. WEBB. Before the gentleman gets to his hotel to-night somebody may have him arrested on a charge of murder; but that does not make the gentleman guilty. I do not know any way to stop a man from making accusations or bringing a suit, but people soon get tired of bringing blackmailing suits when they are mulcted in costs, and there are not very many such suits brought.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield, right along that line?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. I know in my own State we have criminal laws against the keepers of disorderly houses and against the renting of premises for such purposes. Those criminal laws were very difficult to enforce; but when we passed also a law authorizing courts to issue injunctions against the renting of houses for such purposes and for the bringing of the parties before the courts in injunction proceedings it grew to be a much more serious matter, and it was much more easily enforced than the criminal law had been. So is there not a possibility that the power of injunction provided in your law may be far more effective than any criminal statute?

Mr. WEBB. I am glad my friend has injected that statement into the RECORD, because in the conference I was insistent on retaining these criminal penalties; but I hope I can be fair, and I believe we have put into this law sections giving private parties injunctive relief which will probably be a far greater deterrent than the right lodged in the Department of Justice alone to bring an indictment.

Mr. HARDY. I wish to supplement that by saying that that injunctive process in the matter I referred to in my State has been manifold more effective than the old criminal statute.

Mr. WEBB. I hope it will be just as effective under this law when it is passed.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Is it not true that the Sherman Act provides criminal penalties?

Mr. WEBB. It does.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. And in a great many of the cases referred to in this act, does it not?

Mr. WEBB. I do not know that I understand my friend.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. I mean in regard to a great many of the acts referred to in this law.

Mr. WEBB. If the acts complained of restrain trade, or attempt to monopolize, then the persons guilty of them subject themselves to criminal penalties under the Sherman law. This bill which we are now considering preserves that right and makes guilt personal, and that is the only way in which we have undertaken to amend the Sherman antitrust law at all—that is, in making guilt personal.

Mr. RUCKER. It provides imprisonment as well as fine.

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. And that is the best part of the whole thing. One term in jail will do more good than a hundred civil suits.

Mr. ALEXANDER. This bill undertakes to prohibit those acts which lead to monopoly which the Sherman antitrust law does not reach. This bill makes those specific acts unlawful, and they may be restrained by civil remedies.

Mr. WEBB. Exactly.

Mr. ALEXANDER. But if they culminate in violation of the Sherman antitrust law, then they may be prosecuted civilly and criminally.

Mr. WEBB. Exactly. That is a fair statement of it, and that is what led a great many Members of the House and Senate to the conclusion that those acts that did not violate the Sherman law should not be denounced as criminal acts in the first instance in a new law. If a number of small links in the chain finally result in violation of the Sherman law, then the person who constructs the chain becomes subject to the pains and penalties of the Sherman law. A person who only builds one link in the chain is denounced here. There are people, and honest people, who thought that we ought not to put a man in jail for making one link, but that we should forbid him from forging other links. The Sherman law takes care of restraints of trade and monopoly. This bill is intended to prevent those individual acts which, if multiplied and persisted in, may lead to a violation of the Sherman law.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. GOULDEN. In the elimination of criminal prosecutions as proposed by the conference, does the gentleman think it will have the same moral effect on the man who is an offender under this law and that you propose to reach by this change?

Mr. WEBB. If I had to choose between the civil remedies provided in this bill and the criminal provisions, I would let the criminal penalties go and keep the civil remedies. Personally, I would like to have seen both kept in the bill.

Mr. GOULDEN. Is it not much simpler and more effective to prosecute for criminal offenses of this character?

Mr. WEBB. No; if a criminal offense, you have to bring one suit through the Department of Justice. Under the civil remedies any man throughout the United States, hundreds and thousands, can bring suit in the various jurisdictions, and thus the offender will begin to open his eyes because you are threatening to take money out of his pocket.

Mr. GOULDEN. And the gentleman does not think it would be more difficult to prosecute under the civil law as now proposed than under the criminal law as originally passed by the House?
